(3.3.) The praise thereof, though it be not of men, who judge according to outward appearance, yet it is of God, God himself will own and accept and crown this sincerity; for he seeth not as man seeth. Fair pretences and a plausible profession may deceive men: but God cannot be so deceived; he sees through shows to realities. This is the true spirit of Christianity. He is not a Christian, that is one outwardly, nor is that baptism, which is outward in the flesh; but he is a Christian, that is inwardly, and baptism is that of the heart, in the spirit, and not in the letter; whose praise is not of men, but of God.

CHAP. III.

The apostle, in this chapter, carries on his discourse concerning justification. He had already proved the guilt both of Gentiles and Jews. Now in this chapter, he answers some objections that might be made against what he had said about the Jews, v. 1, 8. He asserts the guilt and corruption of mankind in common, both Jews and Gentiles, v. 9...18. III. He argues from thence, that justification must needs be by faith, and not by the law; which he gives several reasons for, v. 19, to the end. The many digressions in his writings render his discourse sometimes a little difficult, but his scope is evident.

1. What advantage then hath the Jew? Or what profit is there of circumcision? 2. Much every way: chiefly, because that unto them were committed the oracles of God. 3. For what if some did not believe? Shall their unbelief make the faith of God without effect? 4. God forbid: yea, let God be true, but every man a liar; as it is written, That thou mightest be justified in thy sayings, and mightest overcome when thou art judged. 5. But if our unrighteousness commend the righteousness of God, what shall we say? Is God unrighteous, who taketh vengeance? (I speak as a man.) 6. God forbid: for then how should God judge the world? 7. For if the truth of God hath more abounded through my lie unto his glory; why yet am I also judged as a sinner? 8. And not rather, (as we be slanderously reported, and as some affirm that we say,) Let us do evil, that good may come? whose damnation is just. 9. What then? Are we better than they? No, in no wise: for we have before proved both Jews and Gentiles, that they are all under sin. 10. As it is written, There is none righteous, no, not one: 11. There is none that understandeth, there is none that seeketh after God. 12. They are all gone out of the way, they are together become unprofitable; there is none that doeth good, no, not one. 13. Their throat is an open sepulchre; with their tongues they have used deceit: the poison of asps is under their lips: 14. Whose mouth is full of cursing and bitterness. 15. Their feet are swift to shed blood: 16. Destruction and misery are in their ways: 17. And the way of peace have they not known: 18. There is no fear of God before their eyes.

Here he answers several objections, which might be made, to clear his way. No truth so plain and evident, but wicked wits and corrupt carnal hearts will have something to say against it; but divine truths must be cleared from such objections. Object. I. If Jew and Gentile stand so much upon the same level before God, what advantage then hath the Jew? Hath not God often spoken with a great deal of respect for the Jews, as a nation, people, (Deut. 33, 29.) a holy nation, a peculiar treasure, the seed of Abraham his friend? Did not he institute circumcision as a badge of their church-privilege, and a seal of their covenant relationship to God? Now doth not this levelling doctrine deny them all such prerogatives, and reflect dishonour upon the ordinance of circumcision, as a fruitless insignificant thing?

Answer. The Jews are, notwithstanding this, a people greatly privileged and honoured, have great means and helps, though these be not infallibly saving; (v. 2.) Much every way. The door is open to the Gentiles as well as Jews, but the Jews have a fairer way up to this door, by reason of their church-privileges, which are not to be undervalued, though many that have them perish eternally for not improving them. He reckons up many of the Jews' privileges; (Rom. 9, 4, 5.) he here mentions but one, which is indeed mostominen, that unto them were committed the oracles of God, that is, the scriptures of the Old Testament, especially the law of Moses, which is called the lively oracles, (Acts 7, 38.) and those types, promises, and prophecies, which relate to Christ and the gospel. The scriptures are the oracles of God; they are a divine revelation, they come from heaven, are of infallible truth, and of eternal consequence as oracles. The Septuagint call the Urim and Thummim, the αἱρέσεις—the oracles. The scripture is our breast-plate of judgment. We must have recourse to the law and to the testimony, as to an oracle. The gospel is called the oracles of God, Heb. 5, 12. 1 Pet. 4, 11. Now these oracles were committed to the Jews; the Old Testament was written in their language; Moses and the prophets were of their nation, lived among them, breathed and breathed in and for the Jewish interest. They were committed to them as trustees for succeeding ages and churches. The Old Testament was deposited in their hands, to be carefully preserved pure and uncorrupt, and so transmitted down to posterity.

The Jews were the Christians' library-keepers, were intrusted with that sacred treasure for their own use and benefit in the first place, and then for the advantage of the world; and in preserving the letter of the scripture, they were very faithful to their trust, did not lose one iota or title; in which we are to acknowledge God's gracious care and providence. The Jews had the means of salvation, but they had not the monopoly of salvation.

Now he says with a chieflv—τις τῆς ἱδρυματίας μὴ ἡ τῆς τυχῆς; this was their prime and principal privilege. The enjoyment of God's word and ordinances is the chief happiness of a people, is to be put in the mouth of His advantages, Deut. 4. 8.—33. Ps. 147. 20.

Object. II. Against what he had said of the advantages the Jews had in the lively oracles, some might object the unbelief of many of them. To what purpose were the oracles of God committed to them, when so many of them, notwithstanding these oracles, continue strangers to Christ, and enemies to his gospel? Some did thus believe. Is it not true that some, nay most, of the present Jews, do not believe in Christ; but shall their unbelief make the faith of God without effect? The apostle startles at such a thought; God forbid! The infidelity and obstinacy of the Jews could not invalidate and overthrow those prophecies of the Messiah, which were contained in the oracles committed to them. Christ will be glorious, though Israel be not gathered, Is. 49. 5. God's words shall be accomplished to purposes performed, and all his ends answered, though there be a generation that by their unbelief go about to make God a liar.

Let God be true, but every man a liar; let us abide by this principle, that God is true to every word which he has spoken, and will let none of his oracles fall to the ground, though thereby we give the lie to man; better question and overthrow the credit of all the men in the world than doubt of the faithfulness of God.

What David said in his haste, (Ps. 116. 11.) that all men are liars, Paul here asserts deliberately. Lying is a limb of that old man which we every one of us come into the world clothed with. All men are fickle, and mutable, and given to change; vanity and a lie, (Ps. 62. 9.) altogether vanity, Ps. 39. 5. All men are liars, compared with God. It is very comfortable, when we find every man a liar; no faith in man, that God is faithful. When they speak vanity even one with his neighbour, it is very comfortable to think, that the words of the Lord are pure words, Ps. 12. 2, 6.

For the further proof of this, he quotes Ps. 51. 4. That thou mightest be justified. The design of which is to shew, 1. That God doth and will preserve his own honour in the world, notwithstanding the sins of men. 2. That it is our duty, contrary to the corruptions concerning ourselves and others, to justify God, and to assert and maintain his justice, truth, and goodness, however it goes. David lays a load upon himself in his confession, that he might justify God, and acquit him from any injustice. So here, Let the credit and reputation of man shift for itself, the matter is not great whether it sink or swim; let us hold fast this conclusion, how specious soever the promises may be to purposes, that the Lord is righteous in all his ways, and holy in all his works. It is God justified in his sayings, and cleared when he judges, (as it is Ps. 51. 4.) or, when he is judged, as it is here rendered. When men presume to quarrel with God and his proceedings, we may be sure the sentence will go on God's side.

Object. III. Carnal hearts might from hence take occasion to encourage themselves in sin. He had said, God's word and ordinances are the chief happiness of a people, is to be put in the mouth of His advantages, Deut. 4. 8.—33. Ps. 147. 20. If all our sin be so far from overthrowing God's honour, that it commends it, and his ends are secured, so that there is no harm done, is it not unjust for God to punish our sin and unbelief so severely? If the unrighteousness of the Jews gave occasion to the calling in of the Gentiles, and so to God's greater glory, why are the Jews so much censured? (v. 5.) If our unrighteousness commend the righteousness of God, what shall we say? What inference may be drawn from thence? Is God unrighteous? (v. 6.) Is not God unrighteous, (so it may be read, more in the form of an objection,) to take advantage of our unrighteousness, and thereby glut the anger of his adversaries? Is God unrighteous if he gladly take any occasion to quarrel with the equity of God's proceedings, and so condemn him that is most just, Job 34. 17. I speak as a man, that is, I object this as the language of carnal hearts; it is suggested like a man, a vain foolish proud creature.

Answer. God forbid. Far be it from us to imagine such a thing. Suggestions that reflect dishonour upon God's justice and holiness, and would have been started at than parlied with, Get thee behind me, Satan; never entertain such a thought. For then how shall God judge the world? v. 6. The argument is much the same with that of Abraham, (Gen. 18. 25.) Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right? No doubt, he shall. If he was not infinitely just and righteous, he would be unfit to be judge of all the earth. Shall even he that hateth right judge a man? Job 17. 20. Ps. 19. 3. The sin has never the less of malignity and demerit in it, though God bring glory to himself out of it. It is only accidentally that sin commends God's righteousness. No thanks to the sinner for that, who intends no such thing.

The consideration of God's judging the world should for ever silence all our doubtings of, and reflections upon, his justice and equity. It is not for us to quarrel the proceedings of such an absolute Sovereign. The sentence of the supreme court, whence lies no appeal, is not to be called in question.

Object. IV. The former objection is repeated and prosecuted; (v. 7, 8.) for proud hearts will hardly be beaten out of their refuge of lies, but will hold fast the deceit. But his setting off the objection in its own colours, is sufficient to answer it; If the truth of God has more aboundeth through my lie. He supposes the sophists to follow their objection thus, "If my lie, my sin," for there is something of a lie in every sin, especially in the sins of professors; "have occasioned the glorifying of God's truth and faithfulness, why should I be judged, and condemned as a sinner, and not rather then encourage to go on in my sin, that grace may abound?"

An inference which at first sight appears too black to be argued, and too bad to cast out with unblushing. Forging sinners take occasion to house and maintain, because the goodness of God endures continually, Ps. 52. 1. Let us do evil, that good may come, is often in the heart than in the mouth of sinners, so justifying themselves in their wicked ways. Mentioning this wicked thought, he observes, in a parenthesis, that there were those who charged such doctrines as this upon Paul and his fellow-ministers; some saying that we were the apostles of Christ's cross, 2 Cor. 11. 6. Further cautioning the best of God's people and ministers to be charged with holding and teaching such things as they do most detest and abhor; and it is not to be thought strange, when our Master himself was said to be in league with Beelzebub. Many have been reproached as if they had said that, the contrary of which they maintain: it is an old artifice of Satan thus to cast dirt upon Christ's ministers.

But another way to prevent this: Let sinner thickly on, for some will be sure to fix. The best men and the best truths are subject to slander. Bishop Sanderson makes a further remark upon this, as we are slanderously reported—διασκεισθημεν. Blasphemy in scripture usually signifies the highest degree of slander, speaking ill of God. The slander of a minister and his regular doctrine, is a more than ordinary slander, it is a kind of blasphemy, not for his person's sake, but for his calling's sake, and his work's sake.

Answer. He says no more by way of confutation, but that, whatever they themselves may argue, the damnation of those is just. Some understand it of the slanderers; God will justly condemn those who unjustly condemn his truth. Or rather it is to be applied to those who make themselves in sin, under the pretense of God's glory to himself out of it. Those who deliberately do evil, that good may come of it, will be so far from escaping, under the shelter of that excuse, that it will rather justify their damnation, and render them the more inexcusable; for sinning upon such a surmise, and in such a confidence, argues a great deal both of the wit and of the will in the sin; a wicked will deliberatively to choose the evil, and a wicked wit to make it with the pretence of good arising from it: therefore their damnation is just; and whatever excuses of this kind they may now please themselves with, they will none of them stand good in the great day; but God will be justified in his proceedings, and all flesh, even the proud flesh that now lifts up itself against him, shall be silent before him.

Some think Paul here refers to the approaching ruin of the Jewish church and nation, which their obstinacy and self-justification in their unbelief hastened upon them apace.

Paul, having removed these objections, next revives his assertion of the general guilt and corruption of mankind in common, both of Jews and Gentiles, v. 9-18.

"Are we better than they, we Jews, to whom were committed the oracles of God? Does that recommend us to God, or will that justify us? No, by no means." Or, "Are we Christians (Jews and Gentiles) so much better antecedently than the unbelieving part, as to have merited God's grace? Alas! no: before free grace made the difference, those of us that had been Jews, and those of those that had been Gentiles, were all alike corrupted.

They are all under sin. 1. Under the guilt of sin: under it as under a sentence; under it as under a bond, by which they are bound over to eternal ruin and damnation; under it as under a burthen (Ps. 38. 4.) that will sink them to the lowest hell: we are guilty before God, v. 19. 2. Under the government and dominion of sin: under it as under a tyrant and cruel task-master; enslaved to it; under it as under a yoke; under the power of it, sold to work wickedness.

And this he had proved, sponsoring it. It is a law term; we have charged them with it, and have made good our charge; we have proved the indictment, we have convinced them by the notorious evidence of the fact.

This charge and conviction he here further illustrates by several scriptures out of the Old Testament, which describe the corrupt depraved state of all men, till grace should come, and change them: so that here they are in a glass we may all of us behold our natural face. The 10th, 11th, and 12th verses are taken from Ps. 14. 1-3. which are repeated as a very weighty truth, Ps. 53. 1-3. The rest that follows here, is found in the Septuagint translation of the 14th Psalm, which some think the apostle chooses to follow as better known: but I rather think that Paul took these last passages from several scripture here referred to; but in later copies of the LXX they were all added in Ps. 14. from this discourse of Paul. It is observable, that to prove the general corruption of nature, he quotes some scriptures which speak of the particular corruptions of particular persons, as of Doeg, (Ps. 140. 3.) of the Jews; (Isa. 59. 7, 8.) which shews, that the same sins that are committed by one, are in the nature of all. The times of David and Isaiah were some of the better times, and yet to their days he refers. What is said Ps. 14. is expressly spoken of all the children of men, and that upon a particular view and inspection made by God himself; the Lord looked down, as upon the old world, Gen. 6. 5. And this judgment of God was according to truth. He who, when himself had made all, looked upon every thing that he had made, and beheld, all was wicked; that man had marred all, looked, and beheld, all was bad. Let us take a view of the particulars. Observe,

[1.] A habitual defect of every thing that is good; There is none righteous, none that has an honest good principle of virtue, or is governed by such a principle, none that retains any thing of that image of God, consisting in righteousness, wherein he was created. It is.Implies, that if there had been but one, God would have found him out. When all the world was corrupt, God had his eye upon one righteous Noah. Even those who through grace are justified and sanctified, were none of them righteous by nature; no righteousness is born with us: the man after God's own heart owns himself conceived in sin.

[2.] None that seeketh after God, none that has any regard to God, any desire after him. Those may justly be reckoned to have no understanding, they do not seek after God. The carnal mind is so far from seeking after God, that really it is enmity against him.

They are together become unprofitable, v. 12. Those that have forsaken God, soon grow good for nothing; useless burthen of the earth. Those that are in a state of sin, are the most unprofitable creatures under the sun; for it follows, There is none that doeth good, no, not a just man upon the earth, that doeth good, and sinneth not, Eccl. 7. 23. Even in those actions of sinners that have some goodness in them, there is a fundamental error in the principle and end; so that it may be said. There is none that doeth good. Matutum oritur ex qualibet defectu—Every defect is the source of evil.

No wonder that those men the right way, who do not seek after God, the highest end. God made man in the way, set him in right, but he hath forsaken it. The corruption of mankind is an apostasy.

(2.) That which is actual. And what good can be expected from such a degenerate race? He instances,

[1.] In their words, (v. 13, 14.) in three things particularly.

First, Cruelty. Their thrust is an open sepulchre; ready to swallow up the poor and innocent; waiting an opportunity to do mischief, like the old serpent seeking to devour, whose name is Abaddon and Apollyon, the destroyer. And when they do not openly avow this cruelty, and vent it publicly, yet they are under that intended mischief; the fear of asps is under their lips, (Jam. 3. 8.) the most venomous and incurable poison, with which they blast the good name of their neighbour by reproaches, and aim at his life by false witness. These passages are borrowed from Ps. 5. 9. and 140. 3.

Secondly, Cheating. With their tongues they have used deceit. Herein they shew themselves the devil's children, for he is a liar, and a father of lies. They have used it; it intimates, that they make a trade of lying; it is their constant practice, especially belying the ways and people of God.
Thirdly, Cursing: reflecting upon God, and blaspheming his holy name; wishing evil to their brethren. Their mouth is full of cursing and bitterness. This is mentioned as one of the great sins of the tongue, Jam. 3. 9. But those that thus love cursing, shall have enough of it, Ps. 109. 17—19. How many, who are called Christians, do, by these sins evidence that they are still under the reign and dominion of sin, still in the condition that they were born in.

[2.] In their ways; (v. 15—17.) Their feet are swift to shed blood, they are very industrious to compass any cruel design, ready to lay hold on all such opportunities. Wherever they go, destruction and misery go along with them; these are their companions; destruction and misery to the people of God, to the country and neighbourhood where they live, to the land and nation, and to themselves at last. Beside the destruction and misery that are at the end of their ways, (death is the end of these things,) destruction and misery are in their ways; their sin is its own punishment: a man needs no more to make him miserable, than to be a slave to his sins. And the way of peace have they not known; they know not how to preserve peace with others, nor how to obtain peace for themselves. They may talk of peace, such a peace as is in the devil’s palace, while he keeps it, but they are strangers to all true peace; they know not the things that belong to their peace. These are quoted from Prov. 1. 16. Isa. 59. 7, 8. [3.] The root of all this we have, (v. 18.) There is no fear of God before their eyes. The fear of God is here put for all practical religion, which consists in an awful and serious regard to the word and will of God as our rule, to the honour and glory of God as our end. Wicked people have not this before their eyes; they do not steer by it; they are governed by other rules, aim at other ends. This is quoted from Ps. 56. 1. Where no fear of God is, no good is to be expected. The fear of God would lay a restraint upon our spirits, and keep them right, Neh. 5. 15. When once fear is cast off, prayer is restrained, (Job 15. 4.) and then all goes to wreck and ruin quickly.

So that we have here a short account of the general depravity and corruption of mankind; and may say, O Adam! what hast thou done? God made man upright, but thus he hath sought out many inventions.

19. Now we know that what things soever the law saith, it saith to them who are under the law: that every mouth may be stopped, and all the world may become guilty before God. 20. Therefore by the deeds of the law there shall no flesh be justified in his sight: for by the law is the knowledge of sin. 21. But now the righteousness of God without the law is manifested, being witnessed by the law and the prophets; 22. Even the righteousness of God which is by faith of Jesus Christ unto all and upon all them that believe: for there is no difference: 23. For all have sinned, and come short of the glory of God; 24. Being justified freely by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus: 25. Whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation through faith in his blood, to declare his righteousness for the remission of sins that are past, through the forbearance of God; 26. To declare, I say, at this time his righteousness: that he might be just, and the justifier of him which believeth in Jesus. 27. Where is boasting then? It is excluded. By what law? Of works? Nay: but by the law of faith. 28. Therefore we conclude that a man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law. 29. Is he the God of the Jews only? Is he not also of the Gentiles? Yes, of the Gentiles also: 30. Seeing it is one God which shall justify the circumcision by faith, and uncircumcision through faith. 31. Do we then make void the law through faith? God forbid: yea, we establish the law.

From all this Paul infers, that it is in vain to look for justification by the works of the law, and that it is to be had only by faith; which is the point he hath been all along proving, from ch. 1. 17. and which he lays down (v. 28.) as the summary of his discourse, with a Q. E. D.—which was to be demonstrated; we conclude, that a man is justified by faith, without the deeds of the law: neither the deeds of the first law of pure innocence, which left no room for repentance; nor the deeds of the law of nature, how highly soever improved; nor the deeds of the ceremonial law; (the blood of bulls and goats could not take away a sin;) nor the deeds of the moral law, which are included; for he speaks of that law by which is the knowledge of sin, and those works which might be matter of boasting. Man, in his depraved state, under the power of such corruption, could never, by any works of his own, gain acceptance with God: but it must be resolved purely into the free grace of God, given through Jesus Christ to all true believers that receive it as a free gift. If we had never sinned, our obedience to the law would have been our righteousness; “Do this, and live:” but having sinned, and being corrupted, nothing that we can do will atone for our former guilt. It was by their obedience to the moral law that the Pharisees looked for justification, Luke 18. 11. Now there are two things from which the apostle here argues—the guiltiness of man, to prove that we cannot be justified by the works of the law; and the glory of God, to prove that we must be justified by faith.

I. He argues from man’s guiltiness, to show the folly of expecting justification by the works of the law. The argument is very plain; we can never be justified and saved by the law that we have broken. A convicted traitor can never come off by pleading the statute of Ed. III. for that law discovers his crime and condemns him as an enemy. Indeed if he had never broken it, he might have been justified by it; but now it is past that he hath broken it, and there is no way of coming off but by pleading the act of indemnity, upon which he hath surrendered and submitted himself, and humbly and penitently claiming the benefit of it, and casting himself upon it.

Now concerning the guiltiness of man, He first assigns this part to the Jews; for they were the men that made their boast of the law, and set up for justification by it. He had quoted several scriptures out of the Old Testament to shew this corruption; Now, says he, (v. 19.) this that the law says, it says to them who are under the law; this conviction belongs to the Jews as well as others, for it is written in their law. The Jews boasted of their being under the law, and he concludes, and shew the confidence in that: “But,” says he, “the law convict and condemns you, you see it does.” That every month may be stopped; that all boasting may be si lenced. See the method that God takes, both in justifying and condemning; he stops every mouth that is not justified, have their mouths stopped by a humble conviction; those that are condemned, have their mouths stopped too; for they shall at last be convinced, (Judg. 15.) and sent speechless to hell, Matt. 22. 12. All iniquity shall stop her mouth, Ps. 107. 42.

2. He extends it in general to all the world—that all the world may become guilty before God. If the world lies in antichrist, (1 John 5. 19.) it is to be proved guilty, May become guilty, may be proved guilty, liable to punishment, all by nature children of wrath, Eph. 2. 3. They must all plead guilty; those that stand most upon their own justification will certainly be cast. Guilty before God is a dreadful word, before an all-seeing God, that is not, nor can be, deceived in his judgment; before a just and righteous Judge, who will by no means clear the guilty. Come short, as the archer comes short of the mark, as the runner comes short of the prize; so come short, as not only not to win, but to be great losers. Come short of the glory of God, and short of glorifying God. See ch. 21. They glorified him not as God. Man was placed in the top of the visible creation, actively to glorify that great Creator whom the inferior creatures could glorify only objectively; but man by sin comes short of this, and instead of glorifying God, dishonours him. It is a very melancholy consideration, to look upon the children of men, that were made to glorify God, and to think how few there be that do it. (2.2) Come short glorifying before God. There is no boast ing of innocency: if we go about to glory before God, to boast of any thing we are, or have, or do, this will be an everlasting estoppel—that we have all sinned, and that will silence us. We may glory before men, who are short-sighted, and cannot search our hearts; who are corrupt, as we are, and well enough pleased with sin; but there is no glorying before God. Come short of the glory of God, and short of glorifying God.

3. Short of being glorified by God. Come short of justification and acceptance with God, which is glory begun; come short of the holiness and sanctification which are the glorious image of God upon man; and have overthrown all hopes and expectations of being glorified with God in heaven, by any righteousness of their own. It is impossible now to get to heaven in the way of spotless innocency; that passage is blocked; all are in a carnal and a fallen state, set to keep that way to the tree of life.

4. Further, to drive us off from expecting justification by the law, he ascribes this conviction to the law; (v. 20.) For by the law is the knowledge of sin. That law which convicts and condemns us, can never justify us. The law is the strict rule; that rectum which is index sui et obliquit that which points out the right and wrong; it is the proper rule and tenderer of the law to open our wound, and therefore not likely to be the remedy. That which is searching, is not sanative. Those that would know sin, must get the knowledge of the law in its strictness, extent, and spiritual nature. If we compare our own hearts and lives with the rule, we shall discover wherein we have turned aside. Paul made use of this law, ch. 7. 9. Therefore by the deeds of the law shall no flesh be justified in his sight. Observe

1. No flesh shall be justified, no man, no corrupted man, (Gen. 6. 3.) for that he also is flesh; sinful and depraved; therefore not justified, because we are flesh. The corruption that remains in our nature, will for ever obstruct any justification by our own works, which, coming from flesh, must needs taste of the cask, Job 14. 4.

2. Not justified in his sight. He does not deny that justification which was by the deeds of the law in the sight of the church; they were, in their church estate, as imbolded in a polity, a holy people, a nation of priests; but as the conscience stands in relation to God, in his sight, we cannot be justified by the deeds of the law. The apostle refers to Ps. 14. 2.

11. He argues from God's glory, to prove that justification must be expected only by faith in Christ's righteousness. There is no justification by the works of the law. Must guilty man then remain eternally under wrath? Is there no hope? Is the wound become incurable because of transgression? No, blessed be God, it is not, (v. 21, 22.) there is another indeed laid up in God, and we have no sinner but the law is manifested now under the gospel. Justification may be obtained without the keeping of Moses's law: and this is called the righteousness of God, righteousness of his ordaining, and providing, and accepting; righteousness which he confers upon us; as the christian armour is called the armour of God, Eph. 6. 11.

Now concerning the righteousness of God, observe

1. That it is manifested. The gospel-way of justification is a high-way, a plain way, it is laid open for us; the brazen serpent is lifted up upon the pole; we are not left to grope our way in the dark, but it is manifested to us.

2. It is without the law. Here he obviates the method of the justifying christians, who would needs join Christ and Moses together; owning Christ for the Messiah, and also the law; here he argues, that keeping up the ceremonies of it, and imposing it upon the Gentiles converts: so, says he, it is without the law. The righteousness that Christ hath brought in, is a complete righteousness.

3. Yet it is witnessed by the law and the prophets; there were types, and prophecies, and promises, in the Old Testament, that pointed at this. The law is so far from justifying us, that it directs us to another way of justification; points at Christ as our Righteousness, to whom bear all the prophets witness. See Acts 10. 43. This might recommend it to the Jews, who were so fond of the law and the prophets.

4. It is by the faith of Jesus Christ, that faith which hath Jesus Christ for its object; an anointed Saviour, so Jesus Christ signifies. Justifying faith respects Christ, and the Saviour in all three anointed offices, as Prophet, Priest, and King; trusting to him, accepting of him, and adhering to him, in all these. It is by this that we become interested in that righteousness which God hath ordained, and which Christ hath brought in.

5. It is to all, and upon all, them that believe. In this expression he inculcates that which he had before harped upon, that Jews and Gentiles, if they believe, stand upon the same level, and are alike welcome to God through Christ; for there is no difference. Or, it is to all; to all, offered to all in general; the gospel excludes none that do not exclude themselves; but it is to all upon all that believe; not only tendered to them, but put upon them as a crown, as a robe; they are, upon their believing, interested in it, and entitled to all the benefits and privileges of it.

But now, how is this for God's glory?

1. It is for the glory of his grace; (v. 24.) Justified freely by his grace,—διὰ τὴν ἕλπίζων σωτηρίαν. It is by his grace, not by the grace wrought in us, as the papists say, confounding justification and sanctification; but by the gracious favour of God to us without any merit in us so much as foreseen. And to make it the more emphatical, he says, it is freely by his grace, to shew that it must be understood of grace in the most proper and genuine sense. It is said that

[Joseph found grace in the sight of his master; (Gen. 39. 4.) but there was a reason; he saw that what he did prospered; there was something in Joseph to invite that grace: but the grace of God communicated to us, comes freely, freely; it is free grace, thing to deserve such favours: no, it is all through the redemption that is in Jesus Christ. It comes freely to us, but Christ bought it, and paid dear for it; which yet is so ordered, as not to derogate from the honour of free grace. Christ's purchase is no bar to the freeness of God grace; for grace provided and accepted this vicarious satisfaction.

(2.) It is the glory of his justice and righteousness; (v. 25, 26.) Whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation, &c. Note, [1.] Jesus Christ is the great propitiation, or propitiatory Sacrifice, typified by the &c., or mercy-seat, under the law. He is our throne of grace, in and through whom atonement is made for sin, and our persons and performances are accepted of God, 1 John 2. 2. He is all in all in our reconciliation, as mercy-seat, but the matter of it, our priest, our sacrifice, our altar, all our God. In Christ, as in his mercy-seat, reconciling the world unto himself.

[2.] God hath set him forth to be so. God, the party offended, makes the first overtures towards a reconciliation, appoints the days-man; προετοιμασα, fore-ordained him to this, in the counsels of his love from eternity, appointed, anointed him to it, qualified him for it, and has exhibited him to a guilty world as their propitiation. See Matt. 3. 17. and 17. 5.

[3.] That by faith in his blood we become interested in this propitiation. Christ is the propitiation, there is the healing plaster provided. Faith is the applying of this plaster to the wounded soul. And this faith in the business of justification hath a special regard to the blood of Christ, as that which makes the propitiation, the fore-ordination of it, the appointment, that without blood there should be no remission, and no blood but his would do it effectually. Here may be an allusion to the sprinkling of the blood of the sacrifices under the law, as Exod. 24. 8. Faith is the bunch of hyssop, and the blood of Christ is the blood of sprinkling.

[4.] That all who by faith are interested in this propitiation, have the remission of their sins that are past. It was for this that Christ was set forth to be a propitiation, in order to remission, to which the repeatives of his patience and forbearance were a very encouraging preface. Through the forbearance of God. Divine patience hath kept us out of hell, that we might have space to repent, and get to heaven.

Some refer the sins that are past, to the sins of the Old Testament saints, which were pardoned for the sake of the atonement which Christ in the fulness of time was to make, which looked backward as well as forward. Past through the forbearance of God. It is owing to the divine forbearance that we are not taken away in the very act of sin. Several Greek copies make ἐν τῷ ὑπηκοόν τῷ θεῷ—through the forbearance of God, to begin v. 26. and they denote two precious fruits of Christ's mercy to our God's grace: 1. Remission: ἴατον τοὺς ἁμαρτήσεις for the remission, and, 2. Repreives, the forbearance of God. It is owing to the master's goodness and the dresser's meditation, that barren trees are let alone in the vineyard; and in both God's righteousness is declared, in that without a mediator and a propitiation he would not only not pardon, but not so much as forbear, not spare a moment; it is owing to Christ, that there is ever a sinner on this side hell.

[5.] That God does in all this declare his righteousness. This he insists upon with a great deal of emphasis; to declare, I say, at this time his righteousness. It is repeated, as that which has in it something surprising. He declares his righteousness.

First, In the propitiation itself. Never was there such a demonstration of the justice and holiness of God, as there was in the death of Christ. It appears that he hates sin, when nothing less than the blood of Christ would satisfy for it. Finding sin, though but imputed, upon his own Son, he did not spare him, because he had made himself sin for us, 2 Cor. 5. 21. The inequities of us all being laid upon him, though he was the Son of his love, yet it pleased the Lord to bruise him, Isa. 53. 10.

Secondly, In the pardon upon that propitiation; so it follows, by way of explanation, that he might be just, and the Justifier of him that believeth. Mercy and truth are so met together, righteousness and peace have so kissed each other, that it is now become not only an act of grace and mercy, but an act of righteousness, in God, to pardon the sins of penitent believers, having accepted the satisfaction that Christ made on their behalf. In this act of mercy, God would not stand with his justice to demand the debt of the principal, when the surety has paid it, and he has accepted that payment in full satisfaction. See 1 John 1. 9. He is just, faithful to his word.

(3.) It is for God's glory; for boasting is thus excluded, v. 27. God will have the great work of the justification and salvation of sinners carried on from first to last in such a way as would exclude boasting, that no flesh might glory in his presence, 1 Cor. 1. 29—31. Now if justification were by the works of the law, boasting would not be excluded. How should it? If we were saved by our own works, we might put the crown upon our own heads. But the law of faith, the way of justification by faith, doth for ever exclude boasting; for faith is a depending, self-emptying, self-denying grace, and casts every crown before the throne: therefore it is most for God's glory, that thus we should be justified. Observe, He speaks of the law of faith. Believers are not left lawless; faith is a law, it is a working grace, wherever it is in truth; and yet, because it acts in a strict and close dependence upon Jesus Christ, it excludes boasting.

From all this he draws this conclusion, (v. 28.) That a man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law. Lastly, In the close of the chapter, he shews the extent of this privilege of justification by faith, and that it is not the peculiar privilege of the Jews, but pertains to the Gentiles also; for he had said, (v. 22.) that there is no difference; and as to this,

1. He asserts and proves it; (v. 29, 30.) Is he the God of the Jews only? He is the God of all nations? He is not a supposition, but a supposition. Can it be imagined that a God of infinite love and mercy should limit and confine his favours to that little perverse people of the Jews, leaving all the rest of the children of men in a condition eternally desperate? That would by no means agree with the idea we have of the divine goodness, for his tender mercies are over all his works; therefore it is in consequence of God's love and grace, that he pleases by faith, and the unmeritedness through faith, that is, both in one and the same way: however the Jews, in favour of themselves, will needs fancy a difference, really there is no more difference than between by and through, that is, no difference at all.

2. He obviates an objection, (v. 31.) as if this doctrine did nullify the law, which, they knew, came from God; 'No,' says he, 'though we do say that the law will not justify us, yet we do not therefore say that it was given in vain, or is of no use to us; no, we establish the right use of the law, and secure its standing, by fixing it on the right basis. The law is still of use to convince us of what is past, and to direct us for the future; though we cannot be saved by it as a covenant, yet we own it, and submit to it, as a revealed truth, to the Mediator, subordinating the law of grace; and so are far from overthrowing, that we establish the law." Let those consider this, who deny the obligation of the moral law on believers.

CHAP. IV.

The great gospel doctrine of justification by faith without the works of the law, was so very contrary to the notions the Jews had learnt from those that sat in Moses's chair, that it would hardly go down with them; and therefore the apostle insists very largely upon it, and labours much in the confirmation and illustration of it.

He had before proved it by reason and argument, now in this chapter he proves it by example, which in some places serves for confirmation as well as instruction. The example he pitches upon, is that of Abraham, whom he chooses to mention, because the Jews gloried much in their relation to Abraham, put it in the first rank of their external privileges, that they were Abraham's seed, and truly, they had Abraham to their father. Therefore this instance was likely to be more taking and convincing to the Jews than any other. His argument stands thus, "All that are saved are justified in the same way as Abraham was and Abraham was justified by faith, and not by works; therefore all that are saved are so justified;" for it would easily be acknowledged that Abraham was the father of the faithful.

Now this is an argument, not only a pari—from an equal case, as they say, but a fortiori—from a stronger case. If Abraham, a man so famous for works, so eminent in holiness and obedience, could be declared justified by faith only, and not by those works; how much less can any other, especially any of those that spring from him, and come so far short of him in works, set up for a justification by the same works? And to this, Abraham, so eminent, so abundantly, the more abundantly, as some observe, that we are not justified, no by those good works which flow from faith, as the matter of our righteousness; for such were Abraham's works, and are we better than he?

The whole chapter is taken up with his discourse upon this instance, and there is this in it, which hath a particular reference to the close of the foregoing chapter, where he had declared, that in the business of justification, Jews and Gentiles stand upon the same level.

Now in this chapter, with a great deal of cogency of argument, 1. He proves that Abraham was justified not by works, but by faith; and also, how and why he was so justified, v. 9. 17. III. He describes what he was and what he was not; and commends that faith of his, v. 17. 22. IV. He applies all this to us, v. 22. 25. And if he had now been in the school of Tyrammus, he could not have disputed more argumentatively.

1. WHAT shall we then say that Abraham, our father as pertaining to the flesh, hath found? 2. For if Abraham were justified by works, he hath whereof to glory; but not before God. 3. For what saith the scripture? Abraham believed God, and it was counted unto him for righteousness. 4. Now to him that worketh is the reward reckoned not of grace, but of debt. 5. But to him that worketh not, but believeth on him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith is counted for righteousness. 6. Even as David describeth the blessedness of the man, unto whom God imputeth righteousness without works. 7. Saying, Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven, and whose sins are covered. 8. Blessed is the man to whom the Lord will not impute sin.

Here the apostle proves that Abraham was justified not by works, but by faith. Those that of all men contended most vigorously for a share in righteousness by the privileges they enjoyed, and the works they performed, were the Jews, and there for he especially considers the case of Abraham their father, and puts his own name to the reason given by the prophet of the Hebrews; Abraham our father. Now surely his preposterous must needs be as great as their, who claim it as his seed according to the flesh.

Now what hath he found? All the world is seeking; but the most are wearing themselves for very vanity, none can be truly reckoned to have found, but those who are justified before God; and thus Abraham, like a wise merchant, seeking goodly pearls, found this one pearl of great price.

What hath he found? He did so pertaining to the flesh, that is, by circumcision and his external privileges and performances? Those the apostle calls flesh, Phil. 3. 3. Now what did he get by these? Was he justified by them? Was it the merit of his works that recommended him to God's acceptance? He had none, for he had none; which he proves by several arguments.

1. If he was justified by works, room would be left for boasting, which must for ever be excluded. If so, he hath whereof to glory, (v. 2.) which is not to be allowed. "But," might the Jews say, "was not his name made great, (Gen. 12. 2.) and then might not he glory?" Yes, but not before God; he might deserve well of men, but he could never merit of God. Paul himself had whereof to glory before men, and we have him sometimes glorying in it, yet with humility; but nothing to glory in before God, 1 Cor. 4. 4. Phil. 3. 8. 9. So Abraham. Observe, He takes it for granted, that man must not pretend to glory in any thing before God; no, not Abraham, great and good a man as he was; and therefore he fethces an argument from it; it would be absurd for him that gloried, to glory in any but the Lord.

II. It is expressly said, that Abraham's faith was counted to him for righteousness. What saith the scripture? v. 3. If all controversies in religion must be our question, What saith the scripture? It is not what this great man, and the other good man, say, but What saith the scripture? Ask counsel at this, Abel. He did not have the matter, 2 Sam. 20. 18. To the law, and to the testimony; (Isa. 8. 20.) thither is the last appeal.

Now the scripture saith, that Abraham believed, and that was counted to him for righteousness; (Gen. 15. 6.) therefore he had not whereof to glory before God, it being purely of free grace that it was so imputed, and having not in itself any thing of the formal nature of righteousness, further than as God himself was graciously pleased to count it to him. It is mentioned in Genesis, upon occasion of a very signal and remarkable act of faith concerning the promised seed; and the more observable, in that it followed upon a grievous conflict he had had with unbelief; his faith was now a victorious faith, newly returned from the battle. It is not the perfect faith which is required to justification, (there may be acceptable faith, when there are remainders of unbelief,) but the prevailing faith, the faith that has the upper-hand of unbelief.

III. If he were justified by works, the reward would have been of debt, and not of grace; which is not to be imagined. This is his argument; (v. 4. 5.) Abraham's reward was God himself; so he had told him but just before, Gen. 15. 1. I am thy exceeding great reward. Now if Abraham had merited this by the perfection of his obedience, it had not been an act of grace in God, but Abraham might have demanded it with as much confidence as ever any labourer in the vineyard demanded the penny he had earned. But this cannot be; it is impossible for man, much more guilty man, to make God a debtor. Rom. xi. 33. No, God will have a free grace to have all the glory, grace for grace's sake, John 1. 16. And therefore to him that worketh not, that can pretend to no such merit, nor shew any worth or value in his work, which may answer such a reward, but disclaiming any such pretension, casts himself wholly upon the free grace of God in Christ, by a lively, active, obedient faith; to such an one faith is counted for righteousness, is accepted of God as the qualification required in all those that shall be pardoned and saved.

He that justifieth the ungodly, that is, him that was before ungodly. His former ungodliness was no bar to his justification upon his believing; συνδέομαι that ungodly one, that is, Abraham, who, before his conversion, it should seem, was carried down the stream of the Chaldean idolatry, Josh. 24. 2. Not through the manner of his death, though God clears him of the imputation of guilt, yet through Christ he justifies the ungodly.

IV. He further illustrates this, by a passage out of the Psalms, where David speaks of the remission of sins, the prime branch of justification, as constituting the happiness and blessedness of a man; pronouncing him blessed, not that has no sin, or none which deserved death, (for then, while man is so sinful, and God so righteous and holy, how can the blessed man?) but the man to whom the Lord imputeth not sin; who though he cannot plead Not guilty, pleads the act of indeminy, and his plea is allowed. It is quoted from Ps. 32. 1, 2, where observe,

1. The nature of forgiveness. It is the remission of a debt or a crime; it is the covering of sin, as a faithful thing, and God's righteousness and shame of the sinner. God is said to cast sin behind his back, to hide the face of it; which, and the like expressions, imply, that the ground of our blessedness is not our innocency, or our not having sinned, (a thing is, and is filthy, though covered,) justification does not make the sin not to have been, or not to have been sin, but God's not laying it to our charge; as it follows here; it is God's not imputing of sin, (v. 8.) which implies act of grace, not having to deal with us in strict justice, as we have deserved; not entering into judgment; not marking iniquities; all which being purely acts of grace, the acceptance and the reward cannot be expected as due debts; and therefore Paul infers, (v. 6.) that it is the imputing of righteousness without works.

2. The blessedness of it; Blessed are they, When it is said, Blessed are the undefiled in the way. Blessed is he that walketh not in the counsel of the wicked, the design is to shew the characters of those that are blessed; but when it is said, Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven, the design is to shew what that blessedness is, and what is the ground and foundation of it. Pardoned people are the only blessed people. The sentiments of the word are admirably happy, that have a clear estate, and are out of debt to God by the act of grace.

There are, that have their debts to God discharged. O, how much is it our interest to make it sure to ourselves that our sins are pardoned! For that is the foundation of all other blessings. So and so I will do for them; for I will be merciful, Heb. 8. 12.

9. Cometh this blessedness then upon the circumcision only, or upon the uncircumcision also? For we say that faith was reckoned to Abraham for righteousness.

10. How was it then reckoned? When he was in circumcision, or in uncircumcision? Not in circumcision, but in uncircumcision.

11. And he received the sign of circumcision, a seal of the righteousness of the faith which he had yet being uncircumcised. That he might be the father of all them that believe, though they be not circumcised; that righteousness might be imputed unto them also.

12. And the father of circumcision to them who are of the circumcision only, but who also walk in the steps of that faith of our father Abraham, which he had being yet uncircumcised. For the promise, that he should be the heir of the world, was not to Abraham, or to his seed, through the law, but through the righteousness of faith.

14. For if they which are of the law be heirs, faith is made void, and the promise made of none effect:

15. Because the law worketh wrath: for where no law is, there is no transgression. 16. Therefore is it of faith, that it might be by grace; to the end the promise might be sure to all the seed; not to that only which is of the law, but to that also which is of the faith of Abraham; who is the father of us all,

17. (As it is written, I have made thee a father of many nations.)

St. Paul observes in this paragraph, when and why Abraham was thus justified; for he hath several things to remark upon that. It was before he was circumcised, and before the giving of the law; and there was a reason for both.

1. It was before he was circumcised; (v. 10.) His faith was counted to him for righteousness, while he was in uncircumcision. It was imputed, (Gen. 15. 6.) and he was not circumcised till ch. 7. Abraham is expressly said to be justified by faith fourteen years, some say twenty-five years, before he was circumcised. Now this the apostle takes notice of, in answer to the question, (v. 9.) Cometh this blessedness then on the circumcision only, or on the uncircumcision also? Abraham was pardoned and accepted in uncircumcision; a note which, as it might silence the fears of the poor uncircumcised Gentiles, so it might lower the pride and conceit of the Jew, who glorieth in their circumcision, as if they had the monopoly of all happiness.

Here are two reasons why Abraham was justified by faith in uncircumcision.

1. That circumcision might be a seal of the righteousness of faith, v. 11. The tenor of the covenants must first be settled, before the seal can be annexed. Sealing supposes a bargain-precedent, which is confirmed by the ceremony. After Abraham's justification by faith had continued several years only a grant by parole, for the confirmation of Abraham's faith, God was pleased to appoint a sealing ordinance; and Abraham received it; though it was a bloody ordinance, yet he submitted to it, and even received it as a special favour, the sign of, &c. Now we may draw from hence observe.

1. The nature of sacraments in general; they are signs, and seals; signs to represent and instruct; seals to ratify and confirm; they are signs of absolute grace and favour; they are seals of the condi tional promises: nay, they are mutual seals; God does in the sacraments seal to us to be a God, and we do therein seal to him to be a him a people. (2.) The nature of circumcision in particular; it was the initiating sacrament of the Old Testament; and it is here said to be,

[1.] A sign; a sign of that original corruption which we are all born with, and which is cut off by when the children of God are called the seed of Abraham, God's covenant with Abraham; a distinguishing sign between Jews and Gentiles; a sign of admission into the visible church; a sign prefigurating baptism, which comes in the room of circumcision, now under the gospel, when (the blood of Christ being shed) all bloody ordinances are abolished; it was an outward and sensible sign of an inward and spiritual. [2.] A seal of the righteousness of the faith. In general, it was a seal of the covenant of grace, particularly of justification by faith; the covenant of grace, called the righteousness which is of faith, (ch. 10. 6.) and it refers to an Old Testament promise, Deut. 30. 12.

Now if infants were then capable of receiving a seal of the covenant of grace, which proves that they are capable of faith, and yet that covenant, how they come to be now cast out of the covenant, and incapable of the seal, and by what severe sentence they were thus rejected and incapacitated, those are concerned to make out, that not only reject, but nullify and reproach, the baptism of the seed of believers.

2. That he might be the father of all them that believe. Not but that there were those that were justified by faith before Abraham; but of Abraham first it is particularly observed, and in him commenced a much clearer and fuller dispensation of the covenant of grace than any that had been before extant; and therefore he is called the father of all that believe, because he was so eminent a believer, and so eminently justified by faith; as Jabal was the father of shepherds, and Jubal of musicians, Gen. 4. 20, 21. The father of all them that believe, a standing pattern of faith; as parents are examples to their children, and a drug precedent of justification by faith; as the liberties, privileges, honours, and estates, of the fathers descend to their children. Abraham was the father of believers, because to him particularly the magna charta was renewed.

(1.) The father of believing Gentiles, though they be not circumcised. Zaccheus, a publican, if he believe, is reckoned a son of Abraham, Luke 19. 9. Abraham being himself uncircumcised when he was justified by faith, uncircumcision can never be a bar. Thus were the doubts and fears of the poor Gentiles anticipated, and no room left to question but that righteousness might be imputed to them also, Col. 3. 11. Gal. 5. 6.

(2.) The father of believing Jews, not merely as circumcised, and of the seed of Abraham according to the flesh: for Abraham was as much the father of the nations that were not of the circumcision only, as not only circumcised, but walk in the steps of that faith; have not only the sign, but the thing signified; not only are of Abraham's family, but follow the example of Abraham's faith. See here who are the genuine children and lawful successors of those that were the church's fathers: not those that sit in their chairs, and bear their names, but those that tread in their steps; this is the line of succession, which holds, notwithstanding interruptions. It seems then, those were most loud and forward to call Abraham father, that had least title to the honours and privileges of his children. Thus they have most reason to call Christ Father, not that bear his name in being christians in profession, but that tread in his steps.

II. It was before the giving of the law, v. 13—16. The former observation was levelled against those that confined justification to the circumcision, this to those that expected it by the law; now the promise was made to Abraham long before the law. Compare Gal. 3. 17, 18. Now observe, 1. What that promise was—that he should be the heir of the world, that is, of the land of Canaan, the choicest spot of ground in the world; or the father of many nations, that is, having a son to be the head of a new world, who springing from him, beside the Israelites; or the heir of the covenant of the life which now is. The neck are said to inherit the earth, and the world is their's. Though Abraham had so little of the world in possession, yet he was heir of it all. Or rather, it points at Christ, the Seed here mentioned; compare Gal. 3. 16. To thy seed, which is Christ. Now Christ is the heir of the world, and the transcendence of the earth is his possessions, and it is in him that Abraham was so. And it refers to that promise, (Gen. 12. 3.) In thee shall all the families of the earth be blessed.

2. How it was made to him, not through the law, but through the righteousness of faith; not through the law, for that was not yet given; but it was upon that believing which was counted to him for righteousness; it was upon his trusting God, in his leaving his own country when God bid him, Heb. 11. 8. Now being by faith, it could not be by the law; which he proves by the opposition that is between them; (v. 14, 15.) If they who are of the law be heirs, they, and they only, and they by virtue of the law; the Jews did, and still do, boast, that they are the rightful heirs of the world, because to them the law was given; but if so, then faith is made void; for if it were requisite to an interest in the promise, that there should be a perfect performance of the whole law, then the promise can never take its effect, nor is it to any purpose for us to depend upon it, since the way to life by perfect obedience to the law, and apostles, unless innocency, is wholly blocked up, and the law in itself opens no other way. This he proves, v. 15. The law worketh wrath in us to God; it irritates and provokes that carnal mind which is enmity to God, as the damming up of a stream makes it swell—after the time. What it works this, it discovers it; or our breach of the law works it. Now it is certain that we can never expect the inheritance by a law that worketh wrath.

How the law works wrath, he shews very concisely in the latter part of the verse; Where no law is, there is no transgression; an acknowledged maxim, which implies, Where there is a law, there is transgression, and that transgression is provoking, and so the law worketh wrath.

3. Why the promise was made to him by faith; for three reasons, v. 16.

(1.) That it might be by grace, that grace might have the honour of it, by grace, and not by the law; by grace, and not of debt, not of merit; that Grace, grace, might be cried to every stone, especially to the top-stones of the pillars, Eph. 2. 8. Grace is no other than a figurative reference to grace granting, as grace hath reference to faith receiving. By grace, and therefore through faith, Eph. 2. 8. For God will have every crown thrown at the feet of grace, free grace, and every song in heaven sung to that tune, Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but unto thy name be the praise.

(2.) That the promise might be sure. The first covenant, being a covenant of works, was not sure; but, through man's failure, the benefits designed by it were cut off; and therefore, the more effectually to ascertain and ensure the conveyance of the new covenant, there is another way found out, not by works, (were it so, the promise would not be sure, because of the continual frailty and infirmity of the flesh,) but by faith, which receives all from Christ, and acts in a continual dependence upon him, as the great trustee of our salvation, and in whose keeping it is safe. The covenant is therefore sure, because it is so well ordered in all things, 2 Sam. 23. 5.

(3.) That it might be sure to all the seed. If it had been by the law, it had been limited to the Jews, to whom pertained the glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the law, (ch. 9. 4.) but therefore it was by faith, that Gentiles as well as Jews might become interested in it; the spiritual as well as the natural seed of faithful Abraham. God would contrive the promise in such a way as might make it most extensive, to comprehend all true believers, that circumcision and uncircumcision might break no squares; and for this, (v. 17.) he refers us to Gen. 17. 5. where the reason of this new covenant with Abraham is given. From Abraham—a high father, to Abraham—the high father of a multitude, is thus rendered; For a father of many nations have I made thee; that is, all believers, both before and since the coming of Christ in the flesh, should take Abraham for their pattern, and call him father. The Jews say, that Abraham was the father of all proselytes to the Jewish religion. Behold, he is the father of all the world, which are gathered under the wings of the Divine Majesty. Maimonides.

17. — Before him whom he believed, even God, who quickeneth the dead, and calleth those things which be not as though they were. 18. Who against hope believed in hope, that he might become the father of many nations, according to that which was spoken, So shall thy seed be. 19. And being not weak in faith, he considered not his own body now dead, when he was about an hundred years old, neither yet the deadness of Sarah's womb: 20. He staggered not at the promise of God through unbelief; but was strong in faith, giving glory to God; 21. And being fully persuaded that, what he had promised, he was able also to perform. 22. And therefore it was imputed to him for righteousness.

Having observed when Abraham was justified by faith, and why, for the honour of Abraham, and for example to us who call him father, the apostle here describes and commends the faith of Abraham; where observe,

1. Whom he believed; God who quickeneth. It is God himself that faith fastens upon; other foundation can no man lay. Now observe, what in God Abraham's faith had an eye to—to that, certainly, which would be most likely to confirm his faith concerning the things promised:

1. God who quickeneth the dead. It was promised that he should be the father of many nations, when he and his wife were now as good as dead; (Heb. 11. 11, 12.) and therefore he looks upon God as a giving of any new law. Now observe, what in God Abraham's faith had an eye to—to that, certainly, which would be most likely to confirm his faith concerning the things promised:

1. God who quickeneth the dead. It was promised that he should be the father of many nations, when he and his wife were now as good as dead; (Heb. 11. 11, 12.) and therefore he looks upon God as a giving of any new law. Now observe, what in God Abraham's faith had an eye to—to that, certainly, which would be most likely to confirm his faith concerning the things promised:

Now observe, what in God Abraham's faith had an eye to—to that, certainly, which would be most likely to confirm his faith concerning the things promised:
3. He staggered not at the promise of God through unbelief, (v. 20.) and he therefore staggered not, because he considered not the frowns and discouragements of second causes; 2.432. he disputed not; he did not hold any self-consultation about it, did not take time to consider whether he should close with it or no, did not hesitate or stumble at it, but by a strong faith and boldness ventured all upon the promise. He took it not for a point that would admit of argument or debate, but presently determined it as a ruled case, did not at all hang in suspense about it; he staggered not through unbelief. Unbelief is at the bottom of all our staggerings at God's promises. It is not the promise that fails, but our faith that fails when we stagger.

4. He was strong in faith, giving glory to God, (v. 20.) he doubted not— he was strengthened in faith, his faith got ground by exercise—crecit cundo. Though weak faith shall not be rejected, the bruised reed not broken, the smoking flax not quenched, yet strong faith shall be commended and honoured. The strength of his faith appeared in the victory it won over his fears.

And hereby he gave glory to God, for as unbelief dishonours God, by making him a liar, (1 John 5. 10.) so faith honours God, by setting to its seal, that he is true, John 3. 33. Abraham's faith gave God the glory of his wisdom, power, holiness, goodness, and especially of his faithfulness, resting upon the word that he had spoken. Among men we say, 'He that trusts another, gives him credit, and honours him by taking his word,' thus Abraham gave glory to God by trusting him. We ever hear our Lord Jesus commending anything so much as great faith; (Matt. 8. 10. and 15. 28.) therefore God gives honour to faith, great faith, because faith, great faith, gives honour to God.

5. He was fully persuaded that what God had promised he was able also to perform, πεπεσείνειν εἰς αὐτὸν συν οἰκείοις—was carried on with the greatest confidence and assurance; it is a metaphor taken from ships that come into the harbour with full sail, Abraham saw the storms of doubts and fears and temptations likely to rise against the promise, upon which many a one would have shrunk back, and lain by for fairer days, and waited a smiling gale of sense and reason. But Abraham, having taken God for his pilot, and the promise for his card and compass, resolves to weather his point, and like a bold adventurer sets up all his sails, breaks through all the difficulties, regards neither winds nor clouds, but trusts to the strength of his bottom and the wisdom and faithfulness of his pilot, and bravely makes to the harbour, and comes home an unspeakable gainer. Such was his full persuasion, and it was built on the omnipotence of God: he was able. Our wavering is mainly from our distrust of the divine power; and therefore to fix us, it is requisite we believe not only that he is faithful, but that he is able, that he has promised. And therefore it was imputed to him for righteousness, v. 22. Because with such a confidence he ventured his all in the divine promise, God graciously accepted him; and not only answered, but outdid, his expectation. This way of glorifying God by a firm reliance on his bare promise, was so very agreeable to God's design, and so very conducive to his honour, that he graciously accepted it as a righteousness, and justified him, though there was no merit in that in the thing itself, which could merit such an acceptance. This shows why faith is chosen to be the prime condition of our justification, because it is a grace that of all others gives glory to God.

ed, if we believe on him that raised up Jesus our Lord from the dead; 25. Who was delivered for our offences, and was raised again for our justification.

In the close of the chapter, he applies all to us; and having abundantly proved that Abraham was justified by faith, he here concludes that his justification was to be the pattern or sample of our own. It was not written for his sake alone. It was not intended only for an historical commendation of Abraham, or a relation of something peculiar to him: (as some antipapists will needs understand that circumcision was a seal of the righteousness of the faith, (v. 11.) only to Abraham himself, and no other;) no, the scrip are not intended hereby to describe some singular way of justification that belonged to Abraham as his prerogative. The accounts we have of the Old Testament saints were not intended for histories only, barely to inform and divert us, but for precedents to direct us, for examples, (2 Cor. 10. 11.) for our learning, ch. 15. 4. And this particularly concerning Abraham was written for us also, to assure us what that righteousness is, which God requireth and accepteth to our salvation; for us also, therefore we have mean and vile, that come so far short of Abraham in his purity and performances; us Gentiles as well as the Jews, for the blessing of Abraham comes upon the Gentiles through Christ; for us on whom the ends of the world are come, as well as for the patriarchs; for the grace of God is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever.

His application is but short. Only we may observe,

1. Our common privilege; it shall be imputed to us, that is, righteousness shall; the gospel-way of justification is by an imputed righteousness, μετριοτέτοι—that it shall be imputed; he uses a future verb, to signify the continuation of this mercy in the church, that as it is the same now, so it will be while God has a church in the world, and there are any of the children of men to be justified; for there is a fountain opened that is inexhaustible.

2. Our common duty, the condition of this privilege, and that is believing. The proper object of this believing is a divine revelation: the revelation to Abraham was concerning a Christ to come, the revelation to us is concerning a Christ already come, which difference in the revelation does not alter the case.

Abraham believed the power of God in raising up an Isaac from the dead womb of Sarah; we are to believe the same power exerted in a higher instance, the resurrection of Christ from the dead. The resurrection of Isaac was in a figure, (Heb. 11. 19.) the resurrection of Christ was real. Now we are to believe on him that raised up Christ; not only believe his power, that he could do it, but depend upon his grace in raising up Christ as our surety; so he explains it, v. 25., where he gives a brief account of the meaning of Christ's death and resurrection which are the two main hinges on which the door of salvation turns.

1. (1.) He was delivered for our offences. God the Father delivered him, he delivered himself as a sacrifice for sin; he died indeed as a malefactor, because he died for sin; but it was not his own sin, but the sins of the people he died to make atonement for our sins, to expiate our guilt, to satisfy divine justice.

2. (2.) He was raised again for our justification, for the perfecting and completing of our justification. By the merit of his death he paid our debt, in his resurrection he took out our acquittance; when he was buried he lay a prisoner in execution for our but the matter and maintainer, of our peace, Co. 1. 20.
11. We have access by faith into this grace wherein we stand, v. 2. This is a further privilege, not only peace, but grace, this grace, this favour, this access, which pleads the debt paid, or else we would never have released the prisoner: and therefore the apostle puts this tree of life are exceeding precious, which was the truth that Paul in this and the following chapter had been fixing as the great spring and foundation of all our comfort.

CHAP. V.

The apostle, having made his point, and fully proved justification by faith, in this chapter proceeds in the explication, illustration, and application, of that truth. 1. He shews the foundation and fountaine and foundation of justification in the death of Jesus Christ, which he discourses of at large in the rest of the chapter.

1. THEREFORE being justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ: 2. By whom also we have access by faith into this grace—wherein we stand, and rejoice in hope of the glory of God. 3. And not only so, but we glory in tribulations also: knowing that tribulation worketh patience; 4. And patience, experience; and experience, hope: 5. And hope maketh not ashamed; because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost, which is given unto us.

The precious benefits and privileges which flow from justification, are as such should quicken us all, to give diligence to make it sure to ourselves that we are justified, and then to take the comfort it renders to us, and to do the duty it calls for from us. The fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, patience, longsuffering, kindness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance.

1. We have peace with God, v. 1. It is sin that breeds the quarrel between us and God, creates not only a strangerseness, but an enmity; the holy righteous God cannot in honour be at peace with a sinner, while he continues under the guilt of sin. Justification takes away the guilt, and so makes way for peace. And such are the benignity and good will of God to man, that, immediately upon the removing of this obstruction, peace (Ps. 118. 15) follows, and we lay hold on God's arm, and on his strength, and so are at peace, Isa. 27. 4, 5. There is more in this peace than barely a cessation of enmity, there is friendship and loving-kindness, for God is either the worst enemy or the best friend.

Abraham, being justified by faith, was called the friend of God, (Gen. 2. 23.) which was his honour, by his being such an one: Christ has charged his disciples friends, John 15. 15-17. And surely a man needs no more to make him happy than to have God his friend!

But this is through our Lord Jesus Christ; through him as the great Peace-maker, the Mediator between God and man, that blessed Day's-man that has laid his hand upon us both. Adam, in innocency, had peace with God immediately; there needed no such mediator; but to guilty sinful man it is a very dreadful thing to think of God out of Christ; for he is our peace, Eph. 2. 14. not only the maker, poor undeserving creatures as we are could pretend to; and yet it is not only so, there are more instances of our happiness; we glory in tribulations also; especially tribulation for righteousness' sake; which seemed the greatest objection against the saints' happiness; whereas really their happiness did not only consist with, but take rise from, these tribulations. It is very reasonable that they were counted worthy to suffer, Acts 5. 41.

This being the hardest point, he sets himself to shew the grounds and reasons of it. How come we to glory in tribulations? Why, because tribulations, by a chain of causes, greatly befriended hope; which he shews in the method of its influence.

1. Tribulation worketh patience, not in and of itself, but the powerful grace of God working in and with the tribulation. It proves, and, by proving, improves patience; as parts and gifts increase by exercise. It is not the efficient cause, but yields the occasion, as steel is hardened by the fire. See how God brings meat out of the eater, and sweetness out of the strong! That which worketh patience, is matter of joy; for patience does us more good than tribulations can do us hurt. Tribulation in itself worketh impatience; but, as it is sanctified to the saints, it worketh patience.

2. Patience, experience, v. 4. It works an experience of God, and the songs he gives in the night; the patient sufferers have the greatest experience of the divine consolations, which abound as afflictions abound. It works an experience of ourselves. It is by tribulation that we make an experiment of our own sincerity, and therefore such tribulations are called trials. It works, James—an approbation, as he is approved, that has passed the test. Thus Job's tribulation wrought patience, and that patience produced an approbation, that still he holds fast his integrity, Job 2. 3.

3. Experience, hope. He who, being thus tried, comes forth as gold, will thereby be encouraged to hope. This experiment, or approbation, is not so much the ground, as the evidence, of our hope, and a special friend to it. Experience of God is a prop to our hope; he that hath delivered, doth and will. Experience of ourselves helps to evidence our sincerity.

4. This hope maketh not ashamed, it is a hope that will not deceive us. Nothing confounds more than disappointment. Everlasting shame and confusion will be caused by the piercing of the expectation of the wicked, but the hope of the righteous shall be gladness, Prov. 10. 29. See Ps. 22. 5; 72. 1. Or, It maketh not ashamed of our sufferings. Though we are counted as the offscouring of all things, and trodden under foot as the mire in the streets; yet, having hopes of glory, we are not ashamed of these sufferings. It is in a good cause, for a good master, and in good hope; and therefore we are not ashamed. We will never think ourselves disparaged by sufferings that are likely to end so well.

Because the love of God is shed abroad. This hope will not disappoint us, because it is sealed with the Holy Spirit as a Spirit of love. It is the gracious work of the blessed Spirit to shed abroad the love of God in the hearts of all the saints. The love of God, that is, the sense of God's love to us, drawing out love in us to him again. Or, The great effects of his love: (1.) Special grace; and, (2.) The pleasant gust or sense of it. It is shed abroad, as sweet ointment, permeating and soaking in, and making it fruitful; the ground of all our comfort and holiness, and perseverance in both, is laid in the shedding abroad of the love of God in our hearts; it is that which constrains us, 2 Cor. 5. 14. Thus are we drawn and held by the bonds of love, Sense of God's love to us, will make us not ashamed, either of our hope in him, or our sufferings for him.

6. For when we were yet without strength, in due time Christ died for the ungodly. 7. For scarcely for a righteous man will one die; yet peradventure for a good man some would even dare to die. 8. But God commendeth his love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us. 9. Much more then, being now justified by his blood, we shall be saved from wrath through him. 10. For if, when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son, much more, being reconciled, we shall be saved by his life. 11. And not only so, but we also joy in God through our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom we have now received the atonement. 12. Wherefore, as by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned: 13. (For until the law sin was in the world: but sin is not imputed when there is no law. 14. Nevertheless death reigned from Adam to Moses, even over them that had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression, who is the figure of him that was to come. 15. But not as it was by one that sinned, so is the gift: for the judgment was upon one the works, but the free gift is of many offences unto justification. 17. For if by one man's offence death reigned by one; much more they which receive abundance of grace and of the gift of righteousness shall reign in life by one, Jesus Christ.) 18. Therefore as by the offence of one judgment came upon all men to condemnation, even so by the righteousness of one the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life. 19. For as by one man's disobedience many were made sinners, so by the obedience of one shall many be made righteous. 20. Moreover the law entered, that the offence might abound. But where sin abounded, grace did much more abound: 21. That as sin hath reigned unto death, even so might grace reign through righteousness unto eternal life, by Jesus Christ our Lord.

The apostle here describes the fountain and foundation of justification, laid in the death of the Lord Jesus. The streams are very sweet, but if you run them up to the spring-head, you will find it to be Christ's dying for us; it is in the precious stream of Christ's blood that all these privileges come flowing to us: and therefore he enlarges upon the instance of that love of God, which is shed abroad.
Three things he takes notice of for the explication and illustration of this doctrine.
1. The persons he died for, v. 6—8.
2. The precious fruits of his death, v. 9—11.
3. The parallel he runs between the communication of sin and death by the first Adam, and of righteousness and life by the second Adam, v. 12. to the end.

I. The character we were under when Christ died for us:

1. We were without strength, (v. 6.) in a sad condition; and, which is worse, altogether unable to help ourselves out of that condition; lost, and no visible prospect of any recovery; our condition deplorable, and in a manner desperate; and therefore our salvation is here said to come in due time. God's time to help and save is when those that are to be saved are without strength, that his own power and grace may be the more magnified, Deut. 32. 36. It is the manner of God to help at a dead lift.

2. He died for the ungodly: not only helpless creatures, and therefore likely to perish, but guilty sinful creatures, and therefore deserving to perish; not only mean and worthless, but vile and obnoxious; unworthy of such favour with the holy God. Being ungodly, they had need of one to die for them, to satisfy for guilt, and to bring in a righteousness. This he illustrates (v. 7, 8.) as an unparalleled instance of love; herein God's thoughts and ways were above our's. Compare John 15. 13, 14. Greater love has no man.

(1.) One would hardly die for a righteous man, that is, an innocent man, one that is unjustly condemned; every body would pity such a one, but few will put such a value upon his life, as either to hazard, or much less, to deposit, their own in his stead.

(2.) It may be, one might perhaps be persuaded to die for a good man, that is, a useful man, that is more than barely a righteous man. Many that are good themselves, yet do but little good to others; but those that are useful, commonly get themselves well beloved, and meet with some that in a case of necessity would venture to be their διανόμειον—would engage life for life, would be their bail, body for body. Paul was, in this sense, a very good man, one that was very useful, and he met with some, that for his life laid down their own necks, ch. 16. 4. And yet observe how he qualifies this; it is but some that would do so, and it is a daring act if they did; for it is, as shall be seen venturing soul; and after all, it is but a heradventure.

(3.) But Christ died for sinners; (v. 8.) neither righteous nor good; not only such as arc useless, but such as were guilty and obnoxious; not only such as there would be no loss of, should they perish, but such whose destruction would greatly redound to the glory of God's justice, being malefactors and criminals that ought to die.

Some think he alludes to a common distinction the Jews had of their people into רָשָׁע—righteous, רַשׁ—merciful, (compare Isa. 57. 1.) and רַשׁ—wicked.

Now wherein God commended his love, not only proved and evidenced his love, (he might have done that at a cheaper rate,) but he magnified it, and made it illustrious. This circumstance did magnify greatly and advance his love, not only put it past dispute, but rendered it the object of the greatest wonder and admiration; "Now my creatures shall see that I love them, I will give them such an instance, that upon full examination, it shall appear parallel." Commendeth his love, as merchants commend their goods when they would put them off. This commending of his love was in order to the shedding abroad of his love in our hearts by the Holy Ghost. He evidences his love in the most winning, affecting, endearing way imaginable.

While we were yet sinners, implying, that we were not to be always sinners; they should be change wrought; for he died to save us, not in our sins, but from our sins; but we were yet sinners when he died for us.

(4.) Nay, which is more, we were enemies, (v. 10.) not only malefactors, but traitors and rebels; in arms against the government; the worst kind of malefactors, and of all others the most obnoxious. The carnal mind is not only an enemy to God, but enmity itself, ch. 1. 20. This enmity is a mutual enmity; God loathing the sinner, and the sinner loathing God, Zech. 11. 8. And that for such as this Christ should die, is such a mystery, such a paradox, such an unprecedented instance of love, that it may well be our business to eternity, to adore and wonder at it! This is a commendation of love indeed! Justly might he who had thus loved us, make it one of the laws of his kingdom, that we should love our enemies.

II. The precious fruits of his death:

1. Justification and reconciliation are the first and primary fruit of the death of Christ; We are justified by his blood, (v. 9.) reconciled by his death, v. 10. Sin is pardoned, the sinner accepted as righteous, the quarrel taken up, the enmity slain, an end made of iniquity, and an everlasting righteousness brought in. This is done, that is, Christ has done all that we could not do, Christ has done it, as some bold venture one, herunto, and immediately upon our believing, we are actually put into a state of justification and reconciliation.

Justified by his blood. Our justification is ascribed to the blood of Christ, because without blood there is no remission, Heb. 9. 22. The blood is the life, and that must go to make atonement. In all the parallel sacrificial "The spring life of the lamb was of the essence of the sacrifice. It was the blood that made an atonement for the soul, Lev. 17. 11.

2. From hence results salvation from wrath; saved from wrath, (v. 9.) saved by his life, v. 10. When that which hinders our salvation is taken away, the salvation must needs follow. Nay, the argument holds very strongly; if God justified and reconciled us when we were enemies, and put himself in our stead, to do what we could not do, and what we were not able to do, when we are justified and reconciled, He that has done the greater, which is, of enemies to make us friends, will certainly do the lesser, which is, when we are friends to use us friendly, and to be kind to us. And therefore the apostle, once and again, speaks of it with a much more. He that hath digged so deep to lay the foundation, will, no doubt, build upon that foundation.

We shall be saved from wrath, from hell and damnation. It is the wrath of God that is the fire of hell; the wrath to come, so it is called, 1 Thess. 1. 10. The final justification and absolution of believers at the great day, together with the fitting and preparing of them for it, are the salvation from wrath here spoken of; it is the perfecting of the work of grace.

Reconciled by his death, saved by his life. His life here spoken of, is not to be understood of his life in the flesh, but his life in heaven, that life which ensued after his death. Compare ch. 14. 9. He was dead, and is alive, Rev. 1. 18. We are reconciled by Christ humbled, we are saved by Christ exalted.

The dying Jesus laid the foundation, in satisfying for sin, and slaying the enmity, and so making us salvation; then he went into heaven, and took possession, a preparation made, and the attendant reversed; but it is the living Jesus that perfects the work, he lives to make intercession, Heb. 7. 25. It is Christ in his exaltation, that by his word and Spirit effectually calls and changes, and reconciles us to God, is our Advocate with the Father, and so completes and consummates our salvation. Compare chs. 4. 23. and 8. 34. Christ dying was the testator, who bequeathed us the legacy; but Christ living is the executor, who pays it. Now the arguing is very strong: He that puts himself to the charge of purchasing our salvation, and the payment of the sin of applying it.

3. All this produces, as a further privilege, our joy in God, v. 11. God is now so far from being a terror to us, that he is our joy, and our hope in the day of evil, Jer. 17. 17. We are reconciled and saved from wrath. Iniquity, blessed be God, shall not be our ruin. And not only so, there is more in it yet, a constant stream of favours; we not only go to heaven, but go there in the train of true grace, on the wing of pure and holy delight, but come in with full sail; we joy in God, not only saved from his wrath, but placing ourselves in his love, and this through Jesus Christ, who is the Alpha and Omega, the foundation-stone and the top-stone of all our comforts and hopes; not only our salvation, but our strength and our song; and all this (which he repeats as a string he loved to be harping upon) by virtue of the atonement; for by this means, we sinners, who have never gone right-times, or now in this life, received the atonement, which was typified by the sacrifices under the law, and is an earnest of our happiness in heaven. True believers do by Jesus Christ receive the atonement. Receiving the atonement is our actual reconciliation to God in justification, grounded upon Christ's satisfaction.

To receive the atonement is,
1. To give our consent to the atonement, approving of, and agreeing to, those methods which infinite wisdom hath taken of saving a guilty world by the blood of a crucified Jesus, being willing and glad to be saved in a gospel-way, and upon gospel-terms.

(2.) To take the comfort of the atonement, which is the fountain and foundation of our joy in God. Now we joy in God, now we do indeed receive the atonement, even, as we glory in it, God hath received the atonement, (Matt. 3. 17. 17. 5. 28. 2.) if we but receive it, the work is done.

III. The parallel that the apostle runs between the communication of sin and death by the first Adam, and of righteousness and life by the second Adam, (v. 12, to the end,) which not only illustrates the truth he is discoursing of, but tends very much to the commending of the love of God, and the comforting of the hearts of true believers; in shewing a corresponding hope between our fall and our recovery; and not only a like, but a much greater, power in the second Adam to make us happy, than there was in the first to make us miserable.

Now for the opening of this, observe,
1. A general truth laid down as the foundation of his discourse—That Adam was a type of Christ; (v. 14.) Who is the figure of him that was to come. Christ is therefore called the last Adam, (1 Cor. 15. 45.) Compare ch. 15. 20. In this, Adam was a type of Christ, that in the covenant-transactions that were between God and him, and in the consequent events of those transactions, Adam was a public person; God dealt with Adam, and Adam acted as such an one, as a common father and factor, root and representative, of and for all his posterity; so that what he did in that station, as agent for us, we may be said to have done in him; and what was done to him may be said to have been done to us in him. Thus Jesus Christ, the Mediator, acted as a public person, the head of all the elect; dealt with God for them, as their father, factor, root, and representative; died for them, rose for them, entered within the veil for them, did all for them. When Adam failed, we failed with him; when Christ performed, he performed for us. Thus was Adam \\

---the figure of him that was to come, to come to repair that breach which Adam had made.

2. A more particular explication of the parallel—In which observe,
(1.) How Adam, as a public person, communicated sin and death to all his posterity; (v. 12.) By one man sin entered. We see the world under a description of sinners, and sinners in the aggregate, of iniquities, and full of calamities. Now, it is worth our while to inquire what is the spring that feeds it, and you will find that to be the general corruption of nature; and at what gap it entered, and you will find that to have been Adam's first sin. It was by one man, and he the first man; for if any had been before him, they would have been free; that one man from whom, as from the quarry, all spring.

2. By him sin entered. When God pronounced all very good, (Gen. 1. 31.) there was no sin in the world; it was when Adam ate forbidden fruit, that sin made its entry. Sin had before entered into the world of angels, when many of them revolted from their allegiance, and left first their public estate; but it never entered into the world of mankind till Adam sinned; entered as an enemy, to kill and destroy; as a thief, to rob and depose; and a dismal entry it was.

Then entered the guilt of Adam's sin imputed to posterity, and a general corruption and depravedness of nature.

But for that, so we read it; rather in whom all have sinned. Sin entered into the world by Adam, for in him we all sinned. As (1 Cor. 15. 22.) in Adam all die; so here, in him all have sinned: for it is agreeable to the law of all nations, that the acts of a public person are accounted their's whom they represent; and what a whole body does, every member of the same body may be said to do. Now Adam acted thus as a public person, by the sovereign ordination and appointment of God, and yet that founded upon a natural necessity; for God, as the author of nature, had made this the law of nature, that man should beget in his own likeness, and so the other creatures. In Adam therefore, as in a common receptacle, the whole nature of man was repoused, and from him the sin of all mankind was spread to posterity; for all mankind is made of one blood, (Acts 17. 26.) so that according as this nature proves through his standing or falling, before he puts it out of his hands, accordingly it is propagated from him. Adam therefore sinning and falling, the nature became guilty and corrupted, and is so derived. Thus in him all have sinned.

3. [Death by sin; for death is the wages of sin. Sin, when it is finished, brings forth death. When sin came, of course death came along with it. Death is here put for all that misery which is the due desert of sin, temporal, spiritual, eternal death. If Adam had not sinned, he had not died: the threatening was, In the day thou eatest thou shalt surely die, Gen. 2. 17.

So death passed, a sentence of death was passed, and put upon a criminal, death passed through all men, as an infectious disease passed through a town, so that none escape it. It is the universal fate, without exception, death passes upon all. There are common calamities incident to human life, which do abundantly prove this.

Death reigned, v. 14. He speaks of death as a mighty prince, and his monarchical the most absolute, universal, and lasting monarchy. None are exempted from its scope; it is a state by that will survive all other earthly rule, authority, and power. For if it is the last enemy, 1 Cor. 15. 26. Those sons of Belial that will be subject to no other rule, cannot avoid being subject to this.

Now all this we may thank Adam for; from him sin and death descend. Well may we say, as that good man, observing the change that a fit of sickness had made in his countenance, O Adam! what hast thou done?

First, to clear this, he shews, that sin did not commence with the law of Moses, but was in the world, until, or before, that law; therefore that law of Moses is not the only rule of life; for there was a rule, and that rule transgressed, before the law was given. It likewise intimates that we cannot be justified by our obedience to the law of Moses, any more than we were condemned by and for our disobedience to it. Sin was in the world before the law; witness Cain's murder, the apostasy of the old world, the wickedness of Sodom.

First, His inference from hence, is, Therefore there was a law; for sin is not imputed where there is no law. Original sin is a want of conformity to, and actual sin is a transgression of, the law of God: therefore all were under some law.

Secondly, His proof of it, is, Death reigned from Adam to Moses, v. 14. It is certain that death could not have reigned, if sin had not set up the throne for him. This proves that sin was in the world before the law, and original sin, for death reigned over those that had not sinned any actual sin, that had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression, never sinned in their own persons as Adam did; which is to be understood of infants, that were never guilty of actual sin, and yet died, because Adam's sin was imputed to them.

Thirdly, His proof is, that the dispensation especially refers to those violent and extraordinary judgments which were long before Moses, as the deluge, and the destruction of Sodom, which involved infants. It is a great proof of original sin, that little children, who were never guilty of any actual transgression, are yet liable to very terrible diseases, casualties, and deaths; which could by no means be reconciled with the justice and righteousness of God, if they were not chargeable with guilt.

(2.) How, in correspondence to this, Christ, as a public person, communicates righteousness and life to all true believers that are his spiritual seed. And in this he shews not only wherein the resemblance holds, but ex abundanti, wherein the communication of grace and love by Christ goes beyond the communication of guilt and wrath by Adam.

[1.] Whence the resemblance holds; that is laid down in the words, v. 14.

First, By the offence and disobedience of one, many were made sinners, and judgment came upon all men to condemnation. Where observe,

1. That Adam's sin was disobedience, disobedience to a plain and express command: and it was a command of trial. The thing he did was therefore evil, because it was forbidden, and not otherwise; but that opened the door to other sins, though itself seemingly small.

2. That the malignity and poison of sin are very strong and spreading, else the guilt of Adam's sin would not have reached so far, nor have been so deep and long a stream. Who would think there should be so much evil in sin?

3. That by Adam's sin many are made sinners: many, that is, all his posterity; said to be many, in opposition to the one that offended. Made sinners, κατακεκακα. It denotes the making of us such by a judicial act: we were cast as sinners by the due course of law.

4. That judgment is come to condemnation upon all those that by Adam's disobedience were made sinners. Being convicted, we are condemned. All the race of mankind lie under a sentence, like an attendant judgment is involved. The judgment given and recorded against us in the court of heaven; and if the judgment be not reversed, we are likely to sink under it to eternity.

Secondly, In like manner, by the righteousness and obedience of one, (and that one is Jesus Christ, the second Adam,) are many made righteous, and so the free gift comes upon all. It is observable, how the writer inculcates this truth, and repeats it again and again, as a truth of very great consequence. Here observe,

1. The nature of Christ's righteousness, how it is brought in; it is by his obedience. The disobedience of the first Adam ruined us, the obedience of the second Adam saves us: his obedience to the law of mediation, which was, that he should fulfil all righteousness, and then make his soul an offering for sin. By his obedience to this law he wrought out a righteousness for us, satisfied God's justice, and so made way for us into his favour.

2. The fruit of it.

(1.) There is a free gift come upon all men, it is made and offered promiscuously to all. The salvation wrought is a common salvation; the proposals are general, the tender free; whoever will, may come, and take of these waters of life.

This free gift is to all believers, upon their believing, unto justification of life. It is not only a justification that frees from death, but that entitles to life.

(2.) Many shall be made righteous; many compared with one, or as many as belong to the election of grace; which, though but a few as they are scattered up and down in the world, yet will be a great many when they come all together. κατακεκακα—there shall be constituted righteous, as by letters patent. Now the antithesis between these two, our ruin by Adam, and our recovery by Christ, is obvious enough.

[2.] Wherewith the communication of grace and love by Christ goes beyond the communication of guilt and wrath by Adam; and this he shews, v. 15—17. It is designed for the magnifying of the riches of Christ's love, and for the comfort and encouragement of believers, who, considering what a wound Adam's sin has made, might begin to despair of a proportionate remedy.

His expressions are a little intricate, but this he seems to intend,

First, If guilt and wrath be communicated, much more shall grace and love: for it is agreeable to the idea we have of the divine goodness, to suppose that he should be more ready to save upon an imputed righteousness, than to condemn upon an imputed guilt: Much more the grace of God, and the gift by grace. The power that is, of all his attributes, in a special manner his glory, and it is that grace that is the root, (his favour to us in Christ,) and the gift is by grace. We know that God is rather inclined to shew mercy; punishing is his strange work.

Secondly, If there were so much power and efficacy, as it seems there were, in the sin of a man, who was of the earth, earthly, to condemn us; much more are there power and efficacy in the righteousness and grace of Christ, who is the Lord from heaven, to justify and save us. The one man that saves us, is Jesus Christ. Surely Adam could not propagate so strong a poison, as Jesus Christ could propagate against an antidote, and much stronger.

Thirdly, It is but the guilt of one single offence of Adam's that is laid to our charge; the judgment was is κατακεκακα, by one, that is, by one offence, v. 16, 17. Margin. But the guilt of Adam is we received, and derive an abundance of grace, and of the gift of righteousness. The stream of grace and righteousness is deeper and broader than the stream of guilt; for this righteousness doth not only take away the guilt of that one offence, but of many other offences, even of all. God in Christ forgives all trespasses, Col. 2. 13.

Fourthly, By Adam's sin death reigns; but by Christ's righteousness, there is not only a period put to the reign of death, but believers are preferred to reign in life, v. 17. In and by the righteousness of Christ, we have not only a charter of pardon, but a patent of honour; are not only freed from our chains, but, like Joseph, advanced to the second chariot, and made unto our God kings and priests; not only pardoned, but preferred. See this observed, Rev. 1. 5, 6.—5. 9, 10. We are by Christ and his righteousness entitled to, and instated in, more and greater privileges than we lost by the offence of Adam. The plaster is wider than the wound, and more healing than the wound is killing.

Lastly, in the two last verses he seems to anticipate an objection, which is expressed Gal. 3. 19. Wherefore then serveth the law? Answer,

1. The law entered, that the offence might abound. Not to make sin to abound the more in itself, otherwise than as sin takes occasion by the commandment; but to discover the abounding sinfulness of it. The glass discovers the spots, but does not cause them. When the commandment came into the world sin revived; as the letting in of a clearer light into a room discovers the dust and filth which were there before, but were not seen. It was like the searching of a wound, which is necessary to the cure. The offence, πάντως— that offence, the sin of Adam, the extending of the guilt of it to us, and the effect of the corruption in us, are the abounding of that offence which appeared upon the entry of the law.

2. That grace might much more abound; that the terrors of the law might make gospel-comforts so much the sweeter. Sin abounded among the Jews; and to those of them that were converted to the faith of Christ did not grace much more abound in the remitting of so much guilt and the subduing of so much corruption? The greater the strength of the enemy, the greater the honour of the conqueror.

This abounding of grace he illustrates, v. 21. As the reign of a tyrant and oppressor is a foil to set off the succeeding reign of a just and gentle prince, so let us make it the more illustrious; so doth the reign of sin set off the reign of grace. Sin reigned unto death, it was a cruel, bloody reign; but grace reigns to life, eternal life, and this through righteousness, righteousness imputed to us for justification implanted in us for sanctification; and both by Jesus Christ our Lord, through the power and efficacy of Christ, the great prophet, priest, and king, of his church.

CHAP. VI.

The apostle having at large asserted, opened, and proved, the great doctrine of justification by faith, for fear lest any should suck poison out of that sweet flower, and turn that grace of God into wantonness and licentiousness, he, with a like zeal, copiousness of expression, and cogency of argument, presses the absolute necessity of sanctification and a holy life, as the inseparable fruit and companion of justification; for wherever Jesus Christ is made of God unto unto all righteousness, he is made of God unto that soul sanctification, 1 Cor. 1. 30. The water and the blood came out of the pierced side of Jesus, John 19. 34. And what God hath thus joined together, let not us dare to put asunder. 1.

WHAT shall we say then? Shall we continue in sin, that grace may abound! 2. God forbid. How shall we, that are dead to sin, live any longer therein? 3. Know ye not, that so many of us as were baptized into Jesus Christ were baptized into his death? 4. Therefore we are buried with him by baptism into death: that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life.

5. For if we have been planted together in the likeness of his death, we shall be also in the likeness of his resurrection: 6. Knowing this, that our old man is crucified with him, that the body of sin might be destroyed, that henceforth we should not serve sin. 7. For he that is dead is freed from sin. 8. Now if we be dead with Christ, we believe that we shall also live with him: 9. Knowing that Christ being raised from the dead dieth no more; death hath no more domination over him. 10. For in that he died, he died unto sin once: but in that he liveth, he liveth unto God. 11. Likewise reckon ye also yourselves to be dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God through Jesus Christ our Lord. 12. Let not sin therefore reign in your mortal body, that ye should obey it in the lusts thereof. 13. Neither yield ye your members as instruments of unrighteousness unto sin: but yield yourselves unto God, as those that are alive from the dead, and your members as instruments of righteousness unto God. 14. For sin shall not have dominion over you: for ye are not under the law, but under grace. 15. What then? Shall we sin, because we are not under the law, but under grace? God forbid. 16. Know ye not, that to whom ye yield yourselves servants to obey, his servants ye are to whom ye obey; whether of sin unto death, or of obedience unto righteousness? 17. But God be thanked, that ye were the servants of sin, but ye have obeyed from the heart that form of doctrine which was delivered you. 18. Being then made free from sin, ye became the servants of righteousness. 19. I speak after the manner of men because of the infirmity of your flesh: For as ye have yielded your members servants to uncleanness and to iniquity unto iniquity; even so now yield your members servants to righteousness unto holiness. 20. For when ye were the servants of sin, ye were free from righteousness. 21. What fruit had ye then in those things whereof ye are now ashamed? For the end of those things is death. 22. But now being made free from sin, and become servants to God, ye have your fruit unto holiness, and the end everlasting life. 23. For the wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord.

The apostle’s transition, which joins this discourse with the former, is observable, “What shall we say then? v. 1. What use shall we make of this sweet and comfortable doctrine? Shall we do evil that good may come, as some say we do? ch. 3. 8. Shall we continue in sin, that grace may abound? Shall we from hence take encouragement to sin with se much the more boldness, because the more sin we commit, the more will the grace of God be magnified in our pardon? Is this a use to be made of it? No, it is an abuse, and the apostle startles at the thought of it; (v. 2) "God forbid; far be it from us to think such a thought." He entertains the objection as Christ did the devil's blackest temptation; (Matt. 4. 10) Get thee hence, Satan. Those opinions that give any countenance to sin, or open a door to practical immoralities, how specious and plausible soever they may be, by the pretension of advancing free grace, are to be rejected with the greatest abhorrence; for the truth as it is in Jesus, is a truth according to godliness, Tit. 1. 1.

The apostle is very full in pressing the necessity of holiness in this chapter, which may be reduced to two heads.

I. His exhortations to holiness, which shew the nature of it.

II. His motives or arguments to enforce those exhortations, which shew the necessity of it.

I. For the first, We may hence observe the nature of sanctification, what it is, and wherein it consists. In general it has two things in it, mortification, and vivification; dying to sin, and living to righteousness; elsewhere expressed by putting off the old man, and putting on the new; ceasing to do evil, and learning to do well.

1. Mortification, putting off the old man; several ways that is expressed.

(1.) We must live no longer in sin, (v. 2.) we must not as we have been, nor do as we have done. The time past of our life must suffice, 1 Pet. 4. 3. Though there are none that live without sin, yet, blessed be God, there are those that do not live in sin; do not live in it as their element, do not make a trade of it; that is to be said of the church, as it is of the sanctuary, the bodies of iniquity out of the heart.

That henceforth we should not serve sin. The actual transgression is certainly in a great measure prevented by the crucifying and killing of the original corruption. Destroy the body of sin, and then, though there should be Canaanites remaining in the land, yet the Israelites will not be slaves to them. It is the body of sin that sways the sceptre, with the live, commandments of the law, the idolatry, which is out of the heart.

(2.) We must be dead indeed unto sin, v. 11. As the death of the oppressor is a release, so much more is the death of the oppressed, Job 5. 17, 18. Death brings a wrat of ease to the weary. Thus must we be dead to sin, obey it, observe it, regard it, follow it no more than he that is dead doth his quondam taskmasters; he as indifferent to the pleasures and delights of sin, as a man that is dying is to his former diversions. He that is dead is separated from his former company, converse, business, employments, is not what he was, does not what he did, has not what he had. Death makes a mighty change; such a change doth sanctify us. It cuts off all correspondence with sin.

(3.) Sin must not reign in our mortal bodies, that we should obey it, v. 12. Though sin may remain as an outlaw, though it may oppress as a tyrant, yet let it not reign as a king. Let it not make laws, nor preside in councils, nor command the militia; let it not be uppermost in the soul, so that we should obey it. Though we may be sometimes overtaken and overcome by it, yet let us never be obedient to it in the lusts thereof; let not sinful lusts be a law to you, to which you would yield a consenting obedience. In the lusts thereof—κατ' αὐτά; τινὶ δὲ μακάριον ἐστιν; It refers to the body, not to sin. Sin lies very much in gratifying of the body, and humouring that. And there is reason implied in that, your mortal body; because it is a mortal body, and hastening space to the dust, therefore let not sink reign in it. It was sin that made our bodies mortal, and therefore do not yield obedience to such an enemy.

(5.) We must not yield our members as instruments of unrighteousness, v. 13. The members of the body are made use of by the corrupt nature as tools, by which the wills of the flesh are fulfilled; but we must not consent to that abuse. The members of the body are fearfully and wonderfully made; it is pity they should be the devil's tools of unrighteousness unto sin, instruments of the sinful actions, according to the sinful dispositions. Unrighteousness is unto sin; the sinful acts confirm and strengthen the sinful habits; one sin begats another; it is like the letting forth of water, therefore leave it before it be reckoned with. The members of the body may perhaps, through the prevalency of temptation he found to be instruments of sin, but do not yield them to so, do not consent to it. This is one branch of sanctification, the mortification of sin.

2. Vivification, or living to righteousness; and what is that?

(1.) It is to walk in newness of life, v. 4. Newness of life supposes newness of heart, for out of it are the issues of life; and there is no way to make the stream sweet but by drawing it from the spring so. Weaking in the spirit, is put for the course and tenor of the conversation, which must be new. Walk by new rules, toward new ends, from new principles; make a new choice of the way; choose new paths to walk in, new leaders to walk after, new companions to walk with: old things should pass away, and all things become new. The man is what he was not, does what he did not.

(2.) It is to be put by God through Jesus Christ our Lord, v. 11. To converse with God, to have a regard to him, a delight in him, a concern for him, the soul upon all occasions carried out toward him, as towards an acceptable object, in which it takes a complacency: this is to be alive to God. The love of God reigning in the heart, is the life of the soul towards God; Anima est ubi amat, non ubi animat—The soul is where it loves, rather than where it lives; the affections and desires alive toward God.

Or, living (our life in the flesh) unto God, to his honour and glory as our end, by his word and will as our rule; in all our ways to acknowledge him, and have our eyes ever toward him; that is to live unto God.

Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Christ is our spiritual life; there is living to God but through him. He is the Mediator; there can be no comfortable receipts from God, or acceptable regards to God, but in and through Jesus Christ; no intercourse between sinful souls and a holy God, but by the mediation of the Lord Jesus. Through Christ, as the author and maintainer of this life; through Christ, as the head from whom we receive vital influence; through Christ, as the root by which we derive sap and nourishment; and so live. In living to God, Christ is all in all.

(3.) It is to yield ourselves to God, as those that are alive from the dead, v. 13. The very life and being of holiness lie in the dedication of ourselves to the Lord, giving our own selves to the Lord, Cor. 8. 5. "Yield yourselves to him, not only as the Yield not your estates, but yield yourselves; nothing less than your whole selves; accommodate yourselves to God; so Trebellius, from the Syriac.

Not only submit to him, but comply with him; not only present yourselves to him once for all, but be always ready to him. Yield yourselves unto him as wax to the seal, to take any impression, to be, and have, and do, what he pleases. When Paul said, Lord, what wilt thou have me to do? (Acts 9.6.) he was then yielded to God.

As those that are alive from the dead. To yield a dead carcasse to a living God, is not to please him, but to mock him: Yield yourselves as those that are alive and good for something, a living sacrifice,

(Rom. 12.1). The surest evidence of our spiritual life is the dedication of ourselves to God. It becomes those that are alive from the dead, (it may be understood of a death in law,) that are justified and delivered from death, to give themselves to him that hath so redeemed them.

(4.) It is to yield our members as instruments of righteousness to God. The members of our bodies, when we think and speak and act, are also our instruments of sin, are served to be idle, but to be made use of in the service of God. When the strong man armed is dispossessed, let him whose right it is, divide the spoils. Though the powers and faculties of the soul be the immediate subjects of holiness and righteousness, yet the members of the body are to be instruments; the body must be always ready to serve the soul in the service of God. Thus, (v. 14.) Yield your members servants unto righteousness unto holiness; a service of God to be under the command, and at the command of the righteous law of God, and that principle of inherent righteousness, which the Spirit, as a sanctifier, plants in the soul.

Righteousness unto holiness; which intimates growth, and progress, and ground got. As every sinful act confirms the sinful habit, and makes it more and more prone to sin; hence the members of the body, being our instruments of sin, are servants to iniquity unto iniquity; one sin makes the heart more disposed for another; so every gracious act confirms the gracious habit: serving righteousness is unto holiness; one duty fits us for another; and the more we do, the more we may do, for God. Or serving righteousness, as in baptism, as an evidence of sanctification.

II. For the second, The motives or arguments here used to shew the necessity of sanctification. There is such an antipathy in our hearts by nature to holiness, that it is no easy matter to bring them to submit to it: it is the Spirit's work, who persuades by such inducements as these set home upon the soul.

1. He argues from our sacramental conformity to Jesus Christ. Our baptism, and the design and intention of it, carry in it a great reason why we should die unto sin, and live to righteousness. Thus we must improve our baptism as a bride of restraint to keep us in from sin, as a spur of constraint to quicken us to duty. Observe his reasoning.

(1.) In general, we are dead to sin, that is, in profession, and in obligation. Our baptism signifies our cutting off from the kingdom of sin. We profess to have no more to do with sin. We are dead to sin by a participation of virtue and power for the killing of it, and by our union with Christ and interest in him, in and by whom it is killed. All this is in vain if we persist in sin; we contradict a profession, violate an obligation, return to that to which we were dead, like walking ghosts; than which no thing is more unbecoming and absurd. For (v. 7.) he that is dead, is freed from sin; that is, he that is dead to it, is freed from the rule and dominion of it. As the servant that is dead, is freed from his master, Job 3.19. Now shall we be such fools as to return to that slavery from which we are discharged? When we are delivered out of Egypt, shall we talk of going back to it again?

(2.) In particular, being baptized into Jesus Christ, we were baptized into his death, v. 3. We were baptized into his death, as 1 Cor. 10.2. "As the servant that is dead, is freed from his master, so we are released from slavery." Baptism binds us to Christ, it sets us apprentice to Christ, it makes us servants to Christ; it is our allegiance to Christ as our sovereign. Baptism is externa ana Christi—the external handle of Christ, by which Christ lays hold on men, and men offer themselves to Christ. Particularly, we were baptized into his death, into a participation of the privileges purchased by his death, and into an obligation both to comply with the design of his death, which was to redeem us from sin, and to conform to the pattern of his death, that, as Christ died for sin, so we should die to sin. This was the profession and promise of our baptism, and we do not do well if we do not answer this profession, and make good this promise.

[1.] Our conformity to the death of Christ obliges us to die unto sin; thereby we know the fellowship of his sufferings, Phil. 3.10. Thus we are here said to be planted unto death, (v. 5.) τειχομενοι, not only a conformity, but a transformation; as the ingrafted stock is planted together into the likeness of the shoot, of the nature of which it doth participate. Planting is in order to life and fruitfulness: we are planted in the vineyard, in a likeness to Christ; which likeness we should evidence in sanctification. Our creed concerning Jesus Christ, is, among other things, that he was crucified, dead, and buried; now baptism is a sacramental conformity to him in each of these, as the apostle here takes notice.

First, Our old man is crucified with him, v. 6. The death of the cross was a slow death; the body, after it was nailed to the cross, gave many a throb and many a struggle: but it was a sure death, long in expiring, but expired at last; such is the mortification of sin in believers. It was a cursed death, Gal. 3.13. Sin dies as a rebel, and is crucified, as an accursed thing. Though it be a slow death, yet it must needs hasten it, that it is an old man that is crucified; not in the prime of its strength, but decaying; that which waxeth old, is ready to vanish away, Heb. 8.13. Crucified with him—συνεκτεμας, not in respect of time, but in respect of causality. The crucifying of Christ for us, has an influence upon the crucifying of sin in us.

Secondly, We are dead with Christ, v. 8. Christ was obdient to death: when he died, we might be said to die with him, as our dying to sin is an act of conformity both to the design and to the sampler of Christ's dying for sin. Baptism signifies and seals our union with Christ, our ingrafting into Christ; so that we are dead with him, and engaged to have no more to do with sin than he had.

Thirdly, We are buried with him by baptism, v. 4. Our conformity is complete. We are in profession quite cut off from all commerce and communion with sin, as those that are buried are quite cut off from the world; not only not of the living, but no more among the living, have nothing more to do with them. Thus must we be, as Christ was, separate from sin and sinners.

We are in profession and obligation: we profess to be so, and we are bound to be so: it was our covenant and engagement in baptism; we are sealed to be the Lord's, therefore to be cut off from sin. Why this burying in baptism should so much as allude to any custom of dipping under water in baptism, any more than our baptismal crucifixion and death should have any such references, I confess I cannot see. It is plain, that it is not the sign, but the thing signified, in baptism, that the apostle here calls being "buried with Christ;" and the expression of burying alludes to Christ's burial. As Christ was buried, that he might rise again to a new and more heavenly life, so we are in baptism buried, cut off from the life of sin, that we may rise again to a new life of faith and love.

[2.] Our conformity to the resurrection of Christ obliges us to rise again to newness of life. That is the power of his resurrection which Paul was so desirous to know, Phil. 3. 10. Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, that is, by the power of the Father; the power of God is his glory; it is glorious power, Col. 1. 11. Now in baptism we are obliged to conform to that pattern, to be planted in the likeness of his resurrection, (v. 5.) to live with him, v. 8. See Col. 2. 12. Conversion is the first resurrection from the death of sin to the life of righteousness; and this resurrection is conformable to Christ's resurrection. This conformity of the saints to the resurrection of Christ, seems to be intimated in the rising of so many of the bodies of the saints; which, though what we read before may not be the clear sense of what is here set before us, has been considered as consistent with Christ's resurrection, Matt. 27. 52.

We are all risen with Christ.

In two things we must conform to the resurrection of Christ.

First, He rose, to die no more, v. 9. We read of many others that were raised from the dead, but they rose to die again; but when Christ rose, he rose to die no more; therefore he left his grave-clothes behind him, wherein, as though to live was to die, he rose again to live with him, as one that should have occasion to use them again: but over Christ death has no more dominion; he was dead indeed, but he is alive, and so alive, that he lives for evermore, Rev. 1. 18.

Thus we must rise from the grave of sin, never again to return to it, or to have any more fellowship with the works of darkness, having quitted that grave, that land of darkness, as darkness itself.

Secondly, He rose to live. This is expressed in Col. 2. 12., to live a new life, to receive that glory which was set before him. Others that were raised from the dead, returned to the same life in every respect which they had before lived; but so did not Christ, he rose again to leave the world. Now I am no more in the world, John 13. 1. 11. He rose to live to God, that is, to intercede and rule, and all to the glory of the Father.

Thus must we rise to live to God: that is it which he calls newness of life, (v. 4.) to live from other principles, by other rules, with other aims, than we have done. A life devoted to God is a new life; before, self was the chief and highest end, but now God. To live indeed, is to live to God, with our eyes ever toward him, making him the centre of all our actions.

2. He argues from the precious promises and privileges of the new covenant, v. 14. It might be objected, that we cannot conquer and subdue sin, it is unavoidably too hard for us; "No," says he, "you wrestle with an enemy that may be dealt with and subdued, if you will but keep your ground and stand to your arms; it is an enemy that is already foiled and baffled; there is strength laid up in the covenant of grace for your assistance, if you will but use it. Sin shall not have dominion over us;" God's promises to us are more powerful and effectual for the mortifying of sin than our promises to God. Sin may struggle in a believer, and may create him a great deal of trouble; but it shall not have dominion; may vex him, but it shall not rule over him.

For we are not under the law, but under grace, not under the law of sin and death, but under the law of the spirit of life, which is Christ Jesus: we are actuated by other principles than we have been: new lords, new laws. Or, not under the covenant of works, which requires brick, and gives no straw, which condemns upon the least failure, which runs thus, "Do this, and live; do it not, and die;" but under the covenant of grace, which accepts sincerely as our gospel-perfection, which requires nothing but what it promises strength to perform; which is herein well ordered, that every transgression in the covenant does not put us out of covenant; and especially, that it does not leave our salvation in our own keeping, but lays it up in the hands of the Mediator, who undertakes for us, that sin shall not have dominion over us; hath himself condemned it, and will destroy it; so that, if we pursue the things which God shall come off more than conquer. Christ rules by the golden sceptre of grace, and he will not let sin have dominion over those that are willing subjects to that rule. This is a very comfortable word to all true believers: if we were under the law, we were undone, for the law curses every one that continues not in every thing; but we are under grace, grace which accepts the willing mind, which is not extreme grace the will of God, we have room for repentance, which promises pardon upon repentance: and what can be to an ingenuous mind a stronger motive than this to have nothing to do with sin? Shall we sin against so much goodness, abuse such love?

Some perhaps might suck poison out of this flower, and disingenuously use this as an encouragement to sin. See how the apostle starts at such a thought; (v. 15.) Shall not sin because we are not under the law, but under grace? God forbid. What can be more black and ill-natured than from a friend's extraordinary expressions of kindness and good-will, to take occasion to affront and offend him? To spurn at such bowels, to spit in the face of such love, is that which, between man and man, all the world would cry out shame on.

3. He argues from the evidence that this will be of sin, and from what is for us, or against us; (v. 16.) To whom you yield yourselves servants to obey, his servants ye are. All the children of men are either the servants of God, or the servants of sin; these are the two families. Now, if we would know to which of these families we belong, we must inquire to which of these masters we yield obedience. Our obeying the laws of sin will be an evidence against us, that we belong to that family on which death is expired. As on the contrary, our obeying the laws of Christ will evidence our relation to Christ's family.

4. He argues from their former sinfulness, (v. 17—21.) where we may observe,

(1.) What they had been and done formerly. We have need to be often reminded of our former state. Paul frequently remembers it concerning himself, and those to whom he writes.

[1.] Ye were the servants of sin. Those that are now the servants of God, would do well to remember the time when they were the servants of sin; to keep them humble, penitent, and watchful, and to quicken them in the service of God. It is a reproach to the service of sin, that so many thousands have quitted the service, and shaken off the yoke; and never any that sincerely deserts it, and gave up themselves to the service of God, have returned to the former disorder. "God be thanked that ye were so;" but though ye were so, yet ye have obeyed. Ye were so; God be thanked that we can speak of it as a thing past; ye were so, but ye are not now so. Nay, your having been so formerly tends much to the magnifying of divine mercy and grace in the happy change. God be thanked that) the former sinfulness is such a foil, and such a spur to your present holiness.”

[2.] Ye have yielded your members servants to uncleanliness, and to iniquity unto iniquity, v. 19. It is the misery of a sinful state, that the body is made a drudge to sin, than which there could not be a baser or a harder slavery, the body of man, being brought into the field to feed swine. Ye have yielded; Sinners are voluntarily in the service of sin. The devil could not force them into the service, if they did not yield themselves to it. This will justify God in the ruin of sinners, that they sold themselves to work wickedness, it was their own act and deed. To iniquity unto iniquity. Every sinful act strengthens and confirms the sinful habit; to iniquity as the work, unrighteousness, the wages. Sow the wind, and reap the whirlwind; growing worse and worse, more and more hardened. This he speaks after the manner of men, that is, he fetches a similitude from that which is common among men, even the change of services and subjections.

[3.] Ye were free from righteousness; v. 20. not free by any liberty given, but by a liberty taken, which is the very end of liberty. Ye were altogether void of that which is good, void of any good principles, motions, or inclinations; void of all subjection to the law and will of God, of all conformity to his image; and this ye were pleased with, as a freedom and a liberty; but a freedom from righteousness is the worst kind of slavery.

(2.) How the best change was made, and wherein it did consist.

[1.] We have obeyed from the heart that form of doctrine which was delivered you, v. 17. This describes conversion, what it is; it is our conformity to, and compliance with, the gospel, which was delivered you by Christ and his ministers. Margin. Where ye were delivered; is in πάσῃ ἐνέργειᾳ into which ye were delivered. And so observe.

First, The rule of grace, that form of doctrine— πάσῃ ἐνέργειᾳ. The gospel is the great rule both of truth and holiness; it is the stamp, grace is the impression of that stamp; it is the form of healing words, 2 Tim. 1. 13.

Secondly, The nature of grace, as it is our conformity to that rule. It is to obey from the heart. The gospel is a doctrine not only to be believed, but to be obeyed; and that from the heart; which denotes the sincerity of it. Served not in the profession of sin, but in power; from the heart, the innermost part, the commanding part of us.

It is to be delivered into it, as into a mould, as the wax is cast into the impression of the seal, answering it line for line, stroke for stroke, and wholly representing the shape and figure of it. To be a Christian indeed, is to be transformed into the likeness and similitude of the gospel, our souls answering it and complying with it, conformed to it: understanding, will, affections, aims, principles, actions, all according to that form of doctrine.

[2.] Being made free from sin, ye became servants of righteousness, v. 18. Servants to God, v. 22. Conversion is, First, A freedom from the service of sin; it is the shaking off of that yoke, resolving to have no more to do with it. Secondly, A progression of ourselves, the service of God and righteousness; to God as our master, to righteousness as our work. When we are made free from sin, it is not that we may live as we list, and be our own masters; no, when we are delivered out of Egypt, we are, as Israel, led to the holy mountain, to receive the law, and are there brought into the bond of the covenant.

Observe, We cannot be made the servants of God, till we are freed from the power and dominion of sin; we cannot serve two masters so directly opposite one to another, as God and sin are. We must, with the prodigal, quit the drudgery of the citizen of the country, before we can come to our Father's house.

(2.) What apprehensions they now had of their former way. He appeals to himself, (v. 21.) whether they had not found the service of sin, that they now did find the service of righteousness, and whether they had not found the service of sin.

[1.] An unfruitful service; “What fruit had ye then? Did ye ever get any thing by it?” Sit down, and cast up the account, reckon your gains, what fruit had ye then?” Besides the future losses, which are infinitely great, the very present gains of sin are not worth mentioning. What fruit? Nothing that deserves the name of fruit; the present pleasure and profit of sin do not deserve to be called fruit; they are but chaff, sloughing iniquity, stoning vanity, and reaping the same. [2.] It is an unbecoming service; it is that of which, we are now ashamed; ashamed of the folly, ashamed of the filth of it. Shame came into the world with sin, and is still the certain product of it; either the shame of repentance, or, if not that, eternal shame and contempt. What would wilfully do that which, sooner or later he is sure to be ashamed of?

5. Lastly, He argues from the end of all these things; it is the prerogative of rational creatures, that they are ended with a power of prospect, are capable of looking forward, considering the latter end of things. To persuade us from sin to holiness, here are blessing and cursing, good and evil, life and death, set before us; and we are put to our choice.

(1.) The end of sin is death; (v. 21.) The end of those things is death. Though the way may seem pleasant and inviting, yet the end is dismal; at the last it bites; it will be bitterness in the latter end.

The wages of sin is death, v. 23. Death is as due to a sinner when he hath sinned, as wages are to a servant when he hath done his work. This is true of every sin; there is no sin in its own nature venial; death is the wages of the least sin; sin is here represented, either as the work for which the wages are given, or as the master by whom the wages are given; all that are sin's servants, and do sin's work, must expect to be thus paid.

(2.) If the fruit be unto holiness, if there be an active principle of true and growing grace, the end will be everlasting life; a very happy end! Though the way be up-hill, though it be narrow, and thorny, and beset, yet everlasting life is the end of it. So, v. 23. The gift of God is eternal life. Heaven is life, consisting in the vision and fruition of God; and it is eternal life, no infirmities attending it, no death to put a period to it. This is the gift of God. The death is the wages of sin, it comes by desert; but the life is a gift, it comes by favour. Sinners merit hell, but saints do not merit heaven; there is no proportion between the work of heaven and our obedience; we must thank God and not ourselves, if ever we get to heaven. And this gift is through Jesus Christ our Lord. It is Christ that purchased it, prepared it, preserves us for it, preserves us to it; he is the Alpha and Omega, All in all in our salvation.

CHAP. VII.

We may observe, in this chapter, 1. Our freedom from the law further urged as an argument to press upon us sanctification, v. 14. 2. The work of our hearts, and the effect of the law asserted and proved from the apostle's own experience, notwithstanding, v. 7. 14. III. A description of the conflict between grace and corruption in the heart, v. 14, 15. to the end.

1. KNOW ye not, brethren, (for I speak to them that know the law,) how that the law hath dominion over a man as long as he liveth? 2. For the woman which hath an husband is bound by the law to her husband so long as he liveth; but if the husband be dead, she is loosed from the law of her husband. 3. So then if, while her husband liveth, she be married to another man, she shall be called an adulteress: but if her husband be dead, she is free from that law; so that she is no adulteress, though she be married to another man. 4. Wherefore, my brethren, ye also are become dead to the law by the body of Christ; that ye should be married to another, even to him who is raised from the dead, that we should bring forth fruit unto God. 5. For when we were in the flesh, the motions of sins, which were by the law, did work in our members to bring forth fruit unto death. 6. But now we are delivered from the law, that being dead wherein we were held; that we should serve in newness of spirit, and not in oldness of the letter.

Among other arguments used in the foregoing chapter to persuade us against sin, and to holiness, this was one, (v. 14.) that we are not under the law; and that argument he is here farther insisting upon and explaining; (v. 6.) We are delivered from the law. What does he mean by that? And how is it an argument why sin should not reign over us, and why we should walk in newness of spirit? I. We are delivered from that power of the law, which curses and condemns us for the sin committed by us. The sentence of the law against us is vacated and reversed, by the death of Christ, to all true believers. The law saith, The soul that sins shall die; but we are delivered from the law. The Lord has taken away thy sin, thou shalt not die. We are redeemed from the curse of the law, Gal. 3:13.

II. We are delivered from that power of the law, which irritates and provokes the sin that dwelleth in us. This the apostle seems especially to refer to, (v. 5.) The motions of sin which were by the law. The law, by commanding, forbidding, threatening, corrupt and fallen man, but offering no grace to cure and strengthen, did but stir up the corruption, and, like the sun shining upon a dungeon, excite and draw up the filthy stews. We being lamed by the fall, the law comes and directs us, but provides nothing to heal and help our lameness, and so makes us halt and stumble the more. Understand this not of the law as a rule, but as a covenant of works.

Now each of these is an argument why we should be holy; for here is encouragement to endeavours, though in many things we come short. We are under grace, which promises strength to do what it commands, and pardon upon repentance when we do amiss. This is the scope of these verses in general, that in point of profession and privilege, we are under a covenant of grace, and not under a covenant of works; under the gospel of Christ, and not under the law of Moses. The difference between a law-state and a gospel-state, he had before illustrated, by the similitude of the law leading to a new life, and serving a new master; now here he speaks of it under the similitude of being married to a new husband.

1. Our first marriage was to the law, which, according to the law of marriage, was to continue only during the life of the law. The law of marriage is obliging only till the death of one of the parties, no matter how long, and no longer. The death of either discharges both.

For this he appeals to themselves, as persons knowing the law; (v. 1.) I speak to them that know the law. It is a great advantage to discourse with those that have that knowledge; for such can more readily understand and apprehend a truth. Many of the Christians at Rome were such as had been Jews, and so were well acquainted with the law. On the side of Paul, the sum of knowing was great.

The law hath power over a man as long as he liveth; in particular, the law of marriage hath power; or, in general, every law is so limited: the laws of nations, of relations, families.

(1.) The obligation of laws extends no further; by death the servant who, while he lived, was under the yoke, is freed from his master, Job 3:19.

(2.) The condemnation of laws extends no further; death is the finishing of the law. Actio mortuor cum persona—The action expires with the person. The severest laws could but kill the body, and after that there is no more that they can do.

Thus while we were alive to the law, we were under the power of it; while we were in our Old Testament state, before the gospel came into the world, and before it came with power into our hearts.

Such is the power of that law which is bound to her husband during life, so bound to him, that she cannot marry another; if she do, she shall be reckoned an adulteress, v. 3. It will make her an adulteress, not only to be defiled by, but to be married to, another man; for that is so much the worse, upon this account, that it abuses an ordinance of God, by making it to patronise the uncleanness.

Thus we were married to the law; (v. 5.) When we were the servants of sin, that is, in a carnal state, under the reigning power of sin and corruption; in the flesh, as in our element; then the motions of sins which were by the law, did work in our members, we were carried down the stream of sin; and the law was but as an imperfect dam, which made the stream to swell the higher, and rage the more; our desire was to sin, as that of the wife to her husband, and sin ruled over us; we embraced it, loved it, devoted all to it, with a doubled and multiplied care to please it; we were under a law of sin and death, as the wife under the law of marriage; and the product of this marriage was fruit brought forth unto death, that is, actual transgressions were produced by the original corruptions, such as deserve death. Lust, having conceived by the law, (which is the strength of sin, 1 Cor. 15. 56.) bringeth forth sin, and sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death, Jam. 1. 15. There is the pesternity that springs from this marriage to sin and the law. This is the power of the motions of sin working in our members. And this continues during life, while the law is alive to us, and we to the law.

2. Our second marriage is to Christ: and how comes that about? Why,

(1.) We are freed, by death, from our obligation to the law as a covenant, as the wife is from her obligation to her husband, v. 3. This application is not very close, nor needed it to be, (v. 4.) Ye are become dead to the law. He does not say, "The law is dead;" some think, because he would avoid giving offence to those who were yet zealous for the law; but, which comes all to one, Ye are dead to the law; as the crucifying of the world to us, and of us to the world, amounts to one and the same thing; so doth the law dying, and our dying to it. We are delivered from the law; (v. 6.) because we are nullified as to the law; our obligation to it, as a husband, cast away and made void. And then he speaks of the law being dead, as far as it was an imprisoned law to us, that being dead wherein we were held: not the law itself, but its obligation to punishment, and its provocation to sin, that is dead, it has lost its power; and this, (v. 4.) by the body of Christ, that is, by the sufferings of Christ in His body, by which the law answered the demands of it, made satisfaction for our violation of it, purchased for us a covenant of grace, in which righteousness and strength are laid up for us, such as were not, nor could be, by the law. We are dead to the law by our union with the mystical body of Christ; by being incorporated into Christ in our baptism professedly, in our believing powerfully and effectually, we are dead to the law, we have something to do with it than the dead servant, that is free from his master, hath to do with his master's yoke.

(2.) We are married to Christ. The day of our believing is the day of our espousals to the Lord Jesus. We enter upon a life of dependence on him, and duty to him. Married to another, even to him who is raised from the dead; a periphrasis of Christ, very pertinent here; for as our dying to sin and the law is conformity to the death of Christ, and the crucifying of his body; so our devotedness to Christ in newness of life, is in conformity to the resurrection of Christ. We are married to the raised exalted Jesus; a very honourable marriage. Compare 2 Cor. 11. 2. Eph. 5. 29. Now we are thus married to Christ.

[1.] That we should bring forth fruit unto God. One end of marriage is fruitfulness: God instituted the ordinance, that he might seek a godly seed, Mal. 2. 15. The wife is compared to the fruitful vine, and children are called the fruit of the womb. Now the great end of our marriage to Christ, is, our fruitfulness in love, and grace, and every good work. That is fruit unto God, pleasing to God, according to his will, aiming at his glory. As our old marriage to sin produced fruit unto death, so our second marriage to Christ produces fruit unto God, fruits of righteousness.

Good works are the children of the new nature, the products of our union with Christ; as the fruitfulness of the vine is the product of its union with the root. Whatever our professions and pretensions be, there is no fruit brought forth to God, till we are married to Christ; it is in Christ Jesus that we are created unto good works, Eph. 2. 10. That is the only fruit that is good, it is brought forth in Christ. This distinguishes the good works of believers from the good works of hypocrites and self-justifiers, that they are brought forth in marriage, done in union with Christ, in the name of the Lord Jesus, Col. 3. 17. This is, without controversy, one of the great mysteries of godliness.

[2.] That we should serve in newness of spirit, and not in the oldness of the letter, v. 6. Being married to another, we must change the old nature of the man, and still we must serve, but it is a service that is perfect freedom, whereas the service of sin was a perfect drudgery: we must now serve in newness of spirit, by new spiritual rules, from new spiritual principles, in the spirit, and in truth, John 4. 24. There must be a renovation of our spirits, wrought by the Spirit of God, and in that we must serve.

The letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life; and not in mere external services, as the carnal Jews did, who gloried in their adherence to the letter of the law, and minded not the spiritual part of worship. The letter is said to kill with its bondage and terror, but we are delivered from that yoke, that we might serve God without fear, in holiness and righteousness, Luke 1. 74, 75. We are under the dispensation of the Spirit, and therefore must be spiritual, and serve in the spirit. Compare with this 2 Cor. 3. 3, 6, &c. It becomes us to worship within the veil, and no longer in the outward court.

7. What shall we say then? Is the law sin? God forbid. Nay, I had not known sin, but by the law: for I had not known lust, except the law had said, Thou shalt not covet. But sin, taking occasion by the commandment, wrought in me all manner of concupiscence. For without the law sin was dead. 9. For I was alive without the law once: but when the commandment came, sin revived, and I died. 10. And the commandment, which was ordained to life, I found to be unto death. 11. For sin, taking occasion by the commandment, deceived me, and by it slew me.

Wherefore the law is holy, and the commandment holy, and just, and good. 13. Was then that which is good, made death unto me? God forbid. But sin, that it might appear sin, working death in me by that which is good; that sin by the commandment might become exceeding sinful. 14. For we know that the law is spiritual:

To what he had said in the former paragraph, the apostle here raises an objection, which he answers very fully: What shall we say then? Is the law sin? When he had been speaking of the dominion of sin, he had said so much of the influence of the law as a covenant upon that dominion, that it might easily be misinterpreted as a reflection upon the law; to prevent which he shews from his own experience the great excellency and usefulness of the law, not as a covenant, but as a guide; and further discovers how sin took occasion by the commandment.

Observe in particular,

1. The great excellency of the law in itself. Far be it from Paul to reflect upon the law; no, he speaks honourably of it.

1. It is holy, just, and good, v. 12. The law in general is so, every particular commandment is so; laws are as the law-makers are; God, the greater legislator, is holy, just, and good, therefore his laws must needs be so. The matter of it is holy, it commands holiness, encourages holiness; it is holy, for it is agreeable to the holy will of God, the original of holiness; it is just, for it is consonant to the rules of equity and right reason; the ways of the Lord are right. It is good in the design of it; it was given for the good of mankind, for the conservation of peace and order in the world; it makes the observers of it good; the intentions of the inward man; it is a dispenser of the thoughts and intents of the heart, (Heb. 4. 12.) it forbids spiritual wickedness, heart-murder, and heart-adultery; it commands spiritual service requires the heart, obliges us to worship God in the spirit. It is a spiritual law, for it is given by God to a Spirit and the Father of spirits; it is given to man, whose principal part is spiritual; the soul is the best part, and the leading part of the man: therefore the law to the man, must needs be a law to the soul. Hence the law of God is above all other laws, that it is a spiritual law. Other laws may forbid compassing and imagining, &c. which is treason in the heart, but cannot take cognizance thereof, unless there be some overt act; but the law of God takes notice of the iniquity regarded in the heart, though it go no further. Wash thy heart from wickedness, Jer. 4: 14.

We know that, Wherever there is true grace, there is an experimental knowledge of the spiritualty of the law of God.

II. The great advantage that he had found by the law.

It was discovering; I had not known sin but by the law, v. 7. As that which is straight discovers that which is crooked, as the looking-glass shews us our natural face with all its spots and deformities; so there is no way of coming to that knowledge of sin, which is necessary to repentance, and consequently to peace and pardon, but by comparing our hearts and lives with the law.

Particular knowledge of the sinfulness of lust, by the law of the tenth commandment. By lust he means sin dwelling in us, sin in its first motions and workings, the corrupt principle. This he came to know when the law said, Thou shalt not covet; the law spake in other language than the Scribes and Pharisees made it to speak in; it spake in the spiritual sense and meaning of it. By this he knew that lust is sin, and a very sinful sin; that is, the causes and desires of the heart toward sin, which never came into act, are sinful, exceeding sinful. Paul had a very quick and piercing judgment, all the advantages and improvements of education, and yet never got the right knowledge of indwelling sin, till the Spirit by the law made it known to him. There is nothing about which the natural man is more blind, than about original corruption, concerning which the understanding is altogether in the dark, till the Spirit by the law reveal it, and make it known.

Thus the law is a schoolmaster, to bring us to Christ; opens and searches the wound, and so prepares it for healing. Thus sin by the commandment does appear sin; (v. 13.) it appears in its own colours, appears to be what it is, and you cannot call it by a worse name than its own. Thus, by the commandment it becomes exceeding sinful; it appears to be so. We never knew the desperate vileness and malignity there are in sin, till we come to compare it with the law, and the spiritual nature of the law, and then we see it to be an evil and a bitter thing.

2. It was humble; (v. 19.) I was alive, he thought himself in a very good condition; he was alive in his own opinion and apprehension; very secure and confident of the goodness of his state. Thus he was once, νεών—in times past, when he was a Pharisee; for it was the common temper of that generation of men, that they had a very good conceit of themselves; and Paul was then like the rest of them, and the reason was, he was then without the law. Though brought up at the feet of Gamaliel, a doctor of the law, though himself a great student in the law, a strict observer of it, and a zealous stickler for it; yet without the law. He had the letter of the law, but he had not the spiritual meaning of it; the shell, but not the kernel. He had the law in his hand and in his head, but he had it not in his heart; the notion of it, but not the power of it. There are a great many who are spiritually dead in sin, that yet are alive in their own opinion of themselves, and it is their strangeness to the law, that is the cause of the other mistak. But when the commandment came, came in the power of it, (not to his eyes only, but to his heart,) sin revived, as the dust in a room rises, that is, appears when the sun-shine is let into it. Paul then saw that in sin which he had never seen before; he saw sin in its causes, the bitter root, the corrupt bias, the bent to backslide; sin in its colours, declaring, defiling, breaking a righteous law, affronting an awful Majesty, profaning a sovereign law, by casting it to the ground; sin in its consequences, sin with death at the heels of it, sin and the curse entailed upon it. Thus sin revived, and then I died, I lost that good opinion which I had had of myself, and came to be of another mind. Sin revived, and I died; the Spirit, by the commandment, convinced me to be in a state of sin, and in a state of death by reason of sin.

Of this excellent use is the law, it is a lamp and a light, it converts the soul, opens the eyes, prepares the way of the Lord in the desert, rends the rocks, levels the mountains, makes ready a people prepared for the Lord.

III. The ill use that his corrupt nature made of the law notwithstanding.

1. Sin, taking occasion by the commandment, wrought in me all manner of concupiscence, v. 8. Observe, Paul had in him all manner of concupiscence, though one of the best unregenerate men that ever was; as touching the righteousness of the law, blameless, and yet sensible of all manner of concupiscence. And it was sin that wrought it, indwelling sin, his corrupt nature; (he speaks of a sin that did work sin;) and it took occasion by the commandment. The commandment, which is the comforts and desires of the heart toward sin, which never came into act, are sinful, exceeding sinful. Paul had a very quick and piercing judgment, all the advantages and improvements of education, and yet never got the right knowledge of indwelling sin, till the Spirit by the law made it known to him. There is nothing about which the natural man is more blind, than about original corruption, concerning which the understanding is altogether in the dark, till the Spirit by the law reveal it, and make it known.

Thus the law is a schoolmaster, to bring us to Christ; opens and searches the wound, and so prepares it for healing. Thus sin by the commandment does appear sin; (v. 13.) it appears in its own colours, appears to be what it is, and you cannot call it by a worse name than its own. Thus, by the commandment it becomes exceeding sinful; it appears to be so. We never knew the desperate vileness and malignity there are in sin, till we come to compare it with the law, and the spiritual nature of the law, and then we see it to be an evil and a bitter thing.

2. It deceived me. Sin puts a cheat upon the sinner, and it is a fatal cheat, v. 11. By it, by the commandment, slew me. There being in the law no such express threatening against sinful lustings, sin, that is, his own corrupt nature, took occasion from thence to promise him impunity, and to say, if the same sin appear in thee, it shall not surely die. Thus it deceived and slew him.

3. It wrought death in me by that which is good, v. 13. That which works concupiscence, works death, for sin bringeth forth death. Nothing so good but a corrupt and vicious nature will pervert it, and make it an occasion of sin; no flower so sweet but it will suck poison out of it. Now in this, sin strie[s] a sin. The worst thing that sin does, and most like itself, is the perverting of the law, and taking occasion from it to be so much the more malignant. Thus the commandment, which was ordained to life, was intended as a guide in the way to comfort and happiness, proved unto death, through the corruption of nature, v. 10. Many a precious soul splits upon the rock of salvation. And the same word which to some is an occasion of life unto life to others is an occasion of death unto death. The same sun that makes the garden of flowers more fragrant, makes the dunghill more noisome: the same heat that softens wax, hardens clay; and the same child was set for the fall and rising again of many in Israel. The way to prevent this mischief is, to bow our souls to the commanding authority of the word and law of God, not striving against, but submitting to it.

14.—But I am carnal, sold under sin.

15. For that which I do I allow not: for what I would, that do I not; but what I hate, that do I. 16. If then I do that which I would not, I consent unto the law, that it is good. 17. Now then it is no more I that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me. 18. For I know that in me (that is, in my flesh) dwelleth no good thing: for to will is present with me, but how to perform that which is good I find not. 19. For the good that I would I do not: but the evil which I would not, that I do. 20. Now if I do that I would not, it is no more I that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me. 21. I find then a law, that, when I would do good, evil is present with me. 22. For I delight in the law of God after the inward man: 23. But I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin which is in my members. 24. O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death? 25. I thank God, through Jesus Christ our Lord. So then with the mind I myself serve the law of God: but with the flesh the law of sin.

Here is a description of the conflict between grace and corruption in the heart; between the law of God and the law of sin. And it is applicable two ways.

I. To the struggles that are in a convinced soul, but yet unregenerate: in the person of whom it is supposed, by some, that Paul speaks.

II. To struggles that are in a renewed sanctified soul, but yet in a state of imperfection, as others apprehend. And a great controversy there is, of which these are to understand the apostle here. So far does the evil prevail here, when he speaks of one sold under sin, doing it, not performing that which is good; that it seems hard to apply it to the regenerate, who are described to walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit. And yet so far does the good prevail in hating sin, consenting to the law, delighting in it, serving the law of God with the mind, that it is more hard to apply it to the unregenerate that are dead in trespasses and sins.

I. Applying it to the struggles that are in a converted soul, that is yet in a state of sin, knows his Lord's will, but does not, approves the things that are more excellent, being instructed out of the law, and yet lives in the constant breach of it, (ch. 2. 17-23.) though he has that within him, that witnesses against the sin he commits, and it is not without a great deal of reluctance that he does commit it; the superior faculties striving against it, natural conscience warning him before it is committed, and smiting for it afterward, yet the man continues a slave to his reigning lusts.

It is not thus with every unregenerate man, but with those only that are convinced by the law, but not changed by the gospel. The apostle had said, (ch. 6. 14.) That sin shall not have dominion, because ye are not under the law, but under grace. For the proof of which he here shows that a man under the law, and not under grace, may be, and is, under the dominion of sin; the law may discover sin, and convince of sin, but it cannot conquer and subdue sin, witness the predominance of sin in many that are under very strong legal convictions. It discourses the defilement, but will not wash it off. It makes a man weary and heavy laden, (Matt. 11. 28.) burdens him with his sin; and yet, if rested in, it yields no help toward the shaking off of that burthen; that is to be had only in Christ. The law may make a man cry out, O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me? and yet leave him thus fettered and captivated, as being too weak to deliver him, (ch. 8. 3.) give him a spirit of bondage to fear, ch. 8. 15. Now a soul, advanced thus far by the law, is in a fair way towards a state of liberty in Christ; yet the man is not content with another. Felix trembled, but never came to Christ. It is possible for a man to go to hell with his eyes open, (Numb. 24. 3, 4.) illuminated with common convictions; and to carry about with him a self-accusing conscience, even in the service of the devil; he may consent to the law, that it is good; delight to know God's ways, (as they, Isa. 58. 2.) may have a conflict within them, which he should speak against sin, and for holiness; and yet all this overpowered by an reigning love of sin. Drunkards and unclean persons have some faint desires to leave off their sins, and yet persist in them notwithstanding, such are the impotency and insufficiency of their convictions.

Of such as these there are many that will needs have all this understood, and contend earnestly for it: though it is very hard to imagine why, if the struggle increases, he struggles in his own person; and not only so, but in the present tense. Of his own state under conviction he had spoken at large, as of a thing past; (v. 7, &c.) I died; the commandment I found to be unto death; and if here he speaks of the same state as his present state, and the condition he was now in, surely he did not intend to be so understood: and therefore,

II. It seems rather to be understood of the struggles that are between grace and corruption in sanctified souls. That there are remainders of indwelling corruption, even there that where there is a living principle of grace, is past dispute; that that corruption is daily breaking forth in sins of infirmity, (such as are consistent with a state of grace,) is no less certain. If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, 1 John 1. 8, 10. That true grace strives against sin, though sins and corruptions, does not allow of them, hates them, pours over them, grudges them under them as a burthen, is likewise certain; (Gal. 5. 17.) The flesh lusteth against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the flesh: and these are contrary the one to the other, so that ye cannot do the things that ye would. These are the truths which, I think, are contained in this discourse of the apostle's. And his design is further to open the nature of sanctification, that he does not attain to perfection in this life: and therefore to quicken us to encourage us in, our conflicts with remaining corruptions; our case is not singular, that which we do sincerely strive against, shall not be laid to our charge; and through grace the victory is sure at last. The struggle here is like that between Jacob and Esau in the womb, between the Canaanites and the Israelites in the land, between the house of Saul and the house of David: but great is the truth and will prevail.

Understanding it thus, we may observe here.

1. What he complains of; the remainder of indwelling corruptions, which he here speaks of, to show that the law is insufficient to justify even a regenerate man, that the best man in the world hath enough in him to condemn him, if God should deal with him according to the law; which is not the fault of the law, but our own, which cannot fulfill the law. The repetition of the same things over and over again in this discourse, shews how much Paul's heart was affected with what he wrote, and how deep his sentiments were.

Observe the particulars of this complaint.

(1.) I am carnal, sold under sin, v. 14. He speaks of the Corinthians as carnal, 1 Cor. 3. 1. Ever there where there is spiritual life, there are remainders of carnal affections, and a man may be so far sold under sin; he does not sell himself to work wickedness, as Ahab did, (1 Kings 21. 25.) but he was sold by Adam when he sinned and fell; sold, as a poor slave that does his master's will against his own will; sold under sin, because conceived in iniquity and born in sin.

(2.) What I would, that I do not; but what I hate, that do I, v. 15. And to the same purport, v. 19, 21. When I would do good, evil is present with me. Such was the strength of corruptions, that he could not reach at that perfection in holiness which he did desire and breathe after. Thus, while he was pressing forward to perfection, it was observed, that he had not yet attained, neither was already perfect. Phil. 3. 12. Fain he would be free from all sin, and perfectly do the will of God, such was his settled judgment; but his corrupt nature drew him another way; it was like a clog, that checked and kept him down when he would have soared upward; like the bias in a bowl, which, when it is thrown straight, yet draws it as it pleases. Is. 1. 9.

In verse 21, I am is any flesh, dwelleth no good, v. 18. Here he explains himself concerning the corrupt nature, which he calls flesh; as far as that goes, there is no good to be expected; any more than one would expect good corn growing upon a rock, or on the sand which is by the sea-side. As the new nature, as far as that goes, cannot commit sin, (1 John 3. 9.) so the flesh, the old nature, as far as that goes, cannot perform good duty. How should it? Fq.(1) I see another law in my members warring against the law of my mind, v. 23. The corrupt and sinful inclination is here compared to a law, because it controlled and checked him in his good motions. It is said to be seated in his members; because Christ having set up his throne in his heart, it was only the rebellious members of the body that were the instruments of sin. In the sensitive appetite, or we may take it more generally for all that corrupt motions of the mind, that not only of sensual, but of more refined lusts. This wars against the law of the mind, the new nature; it draws the contrary way, drives on a contrary interest; which corrupt disposition and inclination are as great a burden and grief to the soul, as the worst drudgery and captivity could be. It brings me into captivity. To the same purport, (v. 25.) With the flesh I serve the law of sin; that is the corrupt nature, the unregenerate part is continually working toward sin.

(5.) His general complaint we have v. 24. O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death? The thing he complains of, is, a body of death; either the body of flesh, which is a mortal dying body; (while we carry this body about with us, we shall be troubled with corruption; whose law is sin, that shall be mortified, and not before;) or the body of sin, the old man, the corrupt nature, which tends to death, that is, to the ruin of the soul; or, comparing it to a dead body, the touch of which was by the ceremonial law defiling. If actual transgressions be dead works, (Heb. 9. 14.) original corruption is a dead body. It was as troublesome to Paul as if he had had a dead body tied to him, which he must have carried about with him. This made him cry out, O wretched man that I am! A man that had learned in every state to be content, yet complains thus of his corrupt nature. Had I been to have spoken of Paul, I should have said, "O blessed man that thou art, an ambassador of Christ, a favourite of heaven, a spiritual father of thou sands!" But in his own account he was a wretched man, because of the corruption of nature, because he was now to as he fain would be; had not yet attained, neither was already perfect. Thus miserably does he complain.

Who shall deliver me? He speaks like one that was sick of it, that would give any thing to be rid of it; looks to the right hand and to the left for some friend that would part between him and his corruptions. The remainders of indwelling sin are a very grievous burden to a gracious soul.

[1.] That his conscience witnessed for him, that he had a good principle ruling and prevailing in him, notwithstanding. It is well when all does not go one way in the soul. The rule of this good principle which he had, was, the law of God; to which he here speaks of a threefold regard he had; which is certainly to be found in all that are sanctified, and no others.

[1.] I consent unto the law that it is good, v. 16. σύνεργόν — I give my vote to the law; there is the approbation of the judgment. Wherever there is grace, there is not only a dread of the severity of the law, but a consent to the goodness of the law; it is good in itself, it is good for me. This is a sign that the law is written in the heart, that the soul is delivered to the mould of it. To consent to the law, is so far to approve of it as not to wish it otherwise constituted than it is. The sanctified judgment not only concurs to the equity of the law, but to the excellency of it, as convinced that a conformity to the law is the highest perfection of the human nature, and the greatest honour and happiness we are capable of.

[2.] I delight in the law of God after the inward man, v. 22. His conscience bore witness to a com-

plainency in the law. He delighted not only in the promises of the word, but in the precepts and prohibitions of the word; εὐρήκω, it speaks a becoming delight. He did herein concur in affection with all the saints. All that are savingly regenerate and born again, do truly delight in the law of God; delight in it, to be delighted in; cheerfully submit to the authority of it, and take a com depency in that submission; never better pleased than when heart and life are in the strictest conformity to the law and will of God.

After the inward man; that is, First, The mind or rational faculties, in opposition to the sensitive appetites and wills of the flesh. The soul is the inward man, and that is the seat of gracious delights, which are therefore sincere and serious, but secret; it is the renewing of the inward man, 2 Cor. 4. 16. Secondly, The new nature. The new man is called the inward man, (Eph. 3. 16.) the hidden man of the heart, 1 Pet. 3. 4. Paul, as far as he was sanctified, had a delight in the law of God.

[3.] With the mind I myself serve the law of God, v. 23. It is not enough to consent to the law, and to delight in it; he must have carried about with him is deli vered to the mould of it. Thus it was with Paul's mind; thus it is with every sanctified renewed mind; that is the ordinary course and way; thitherward goes the bent of the soul. I myself—αιτείς ἐγὼ, plainly intimating that he speaks in his own person, and not in the person of another.

(2.) That the fault lay in that corruption of his nature, which he did really bewail and strive against; It is no more I that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me. This he mentions twice, (v. 17, 20.) not as an excuse for the guilt of his sin, (it is enough to condemn us, weak through the flesh, God sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh, and for sin, condemned sin in the flesh: 4. That the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in us, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit. 5. For they that are after the flesh do mind the things of the flesh; but they that are after the Spirit the things of the Spirit. 6. For to be carnally minded is death; but to be spiritually minded is life and peace. 7. Because the carnal mind is enmity against God: for it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be. 8. So then they that are in the flesh cannot please God. 9. But ye are not in the flesh, but in the Spirit, if so be that the Spirit of God dwell in you. Now if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his.

The apostle here begins with one signal privilege of true christians, and describes the character of those to whom it belongs.

1. There is therefore now no condemnation, to them that are in Christ Jesus. This is his triumph after that melancholy complaint and conflict in the foregoing chapter. There he remarks the distressing, vexing, and blessed be God for Jesus Christ.

Who shall deliver me? says he, (v. 24,) as one at a loss for help. At length, he finds an all-sufficient friend, even Jesus Christ. When we are under the sense of the remaining power of sin and corruption, we shall see reason to bless God, through Christ, (for as he is the mediator of all our prayers, so is of all our praises,) to bless God for Christ; it is he that stands between us and the wrath due to us for this sin. If it were not for Christ, this iniquity that dwells in us, would certainly be our ruin. He is our advocate with the Father, and through him God pities, and spares, and pardons, and lays not our iniquities to our charge.

It is Christ that has purchased deliverance for us in due time. Through Christ death will put an end to all these complaints, and wait us to an eternity which we shall spend without sin or sigh. Blessed be God that gave us this victory through our Lord Jesus Christ!

CHAP. VIII.

The apostle, having fully explained the doctrine of justification, and pressed the necessity of sanctification, in this chapter, applies himself to the consolation of the Lord's people. Ministers are helpers of the joy of the saints. Comfort ye, comfort ye my people, so runs our commission, Isa. 40. 1. It is the will of God, that his people should be a comforted people. And we have here such a draught of the gospel-charter, such a display of the unspeakable privileges of true believers, as may furnish us with an abundant measure of cheer and comfort for these and all other innumerable things, in which it is impossible for God to lie, we might have strong consolation. Many of the people of God have, accordingly, found this chapter a well-spring of comfort to their souls, living and dying; and have sucked and been satisfied from these breasts of consolation, and with joy drawn water out of these wells of salvation. There are three things in this chapter: I. The particular instances of christians' privileges, v. 1.-8. II. The ground thereof laid in predestination, v. 29, 30. III. The apostle's triumph herein, in the name of all the saints, v. 31. to the end.

THERE is therefore now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit. 2. For the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free from the law of sin and death. 3. For what the law could not do in that it was after the Spirit, and not after the flesh, which is no less our privilege than it is our duty. How comes it about?

(1) The law could not do it, v. 3. It could neither justify nor sanctify, neither free from the guilt, nor free from the power of sin, bringing not the promises either of pardon or grace. The law made nothing perfect; it was weak. Some attempt the law made toward these blessed ends, but alas, it was weak, it could not accomplish them; yet that weakness was not through any defect in the law, but through the flesh, through the corruption of human nature, by which we became incapable either of being justified or sanctified by the law. We were born unable to keep the law, and in case of failure, the law, as a covenant of works, made no provision, and so left us as it found us. Or, understand it of the ceremonial law; that was a platter not wide enough for the wound, it could never take away sin, Heb. 10. 4.

(2) The law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus does it, v. 2. The covenant of grace made with us in Christ, is a treasury of merit and grace, and from thence we receive pardon and a new nature; one freed from the flesh of sin and death, that is, both from the guilt and power of sin; from the curse of the law, and the conduct of the flesh. We are under another covenant, another master, another husband, under the law of the Spirit, the law that gives the Spirit, spiritual life to qualify us for eternal life.

The foundation of this freedom is laid in Christ’s undertaking for us, of which he speaks v. 3. God sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh, and a sacrifice for sin, condemned sin in the flesh, which the law could not do in it was weak through the flesh, that the—v. 4. Observe.

[1.] How Christ appeared; in the likeness of sinful flesh. Not sinful, for he was holy, harmless, undefiled; but in the likeness of that flesh, which was sinful and corrupt, from the corruption of that nature which was corrupt, though perfectly abstracted from the corruptions of it. His being circumcised, redeemed, baptized with John’s baptism, speak the likeness of sinful flesh. The bitings of the fiery serpents were cured by a serpent of brass, which had the shape, though free from the venom, of the serpents that bit them. It was great condescension, that he who was God, should be made in the likeness of flesh; much greater, that he who was holy, should be made in the likeness of sinful flesh.

And for sin, there the best Greek copies place the comma. God sent him, ἐν μισθώσει σωτηρίας, και πασιν ἡμῖν— in the likeness of sinful flesh, and as a sacrifice for sin. The LXX call a sacrifice for sin no more than πασιν ἡμῖν— for sin; so Christ was a sacrifice; he was sent to be so, Heb. 9. 26. What was the law of his? It was a law of his, if sin was condemned, that is, God did therein more than ever manifest his hatred of sin; and not only so, but for all that are Christ’s both the damming and the domineering power of sin is broken and taken out of the way. He that is condemned, can neither accuse nor rule; his testimony is null, and his authority null. Thus by Christ is sin condemned; though it live and remain, its life in the saints is still but like that of a condemned malefactor. It was by the condemning of sin that death was disarmed, and the devil, who had the power of death destroyed. The condemning of sin saved the sinner from condemnation. Christ was made sin for us, (2 Cor. 5. 21.) and, being so made, when we were condemned. Sin was condemned in the flesh of Christ; condemned in the human nature: So was satisfaction made to divine justice, and way made for the salvation of the sinner.

[3.] The happy effect of this upon us; (v. 4.) That the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in us. Both in our justification and in our sanctification, the righteousness of the law is fulfilled. A righteousness of satisfaction for the breach of the law fulfilled by the imputation of Christ’s complete and perfect righteousness, which answers the utmost demands of the law as the mercy-seat was as long and as broad as the ark. A righteousness of obedience to the commands of the law is fulfilled in us, when by the Spirit the law of love is written upon the heart, and that love is the fulfilling of the law, ch. 13. 10. Though the righteousness of the law is not fulfilled by us, yet, blessed be God, it is fulfilled in us; there is that to do, where we fall short, and all true believers, which answers the intention of the law. Us who walk not. There is the description of all those that are interested in this privilege—they act from spiritual, and not from carnal, principles; as for others, the righteousness of the law will be fulfilled upon them in their ruin. Now, v. 2. Observe how we may answer to this character, v. 5. &c.

(1.) By looking to our minds. How may we know whether we are after the flesh, or after the Spirit? By examining what we mind, the things of the flesh, or the things of the Spirit. Carnal pleasure, worldly profit and honour, the things of sense and time, are the things of the flesh, which unregenerate people mind. The favour of God, the welfare of the soul, the concerns of eternity, are the things of the Spirit, which they that are after the Spirit, do mind.

The man is as the mind is. The mind is the forge of thoughts. As he thinketh in his heart, so is he, Prov. 23. 7. Which way do the thoughts move with most pleasure? On what do they dwell with most satisfaction? The mind is the seat of wisdom. Which way go the projects and contrivances? whether are we more wise for the world, or for our souls! πνευματικός τινί· πνευματικοῖς τινί· they savour the things of the flesh, the things of the Spirit, the world is right then, says the Word. It is a great matter what our savour is; what truths, what tidings, what comforts, we do most relish, and are most agreeable to us.

Now, to caution us against this carnal-mindedness, he shews the great misery and malignity of it, and compares it with the unspeakable excellency and comfort of spiritual-mindedness.

[1.] It is death, v. 6. It is spiritual death, the certain way to eternal death. It is the death of the soul; for it is its alienation from God, in union and communion with whom the life of the soul consists. A carnal soul is a dead soul; dead as a soul can die. She that liveth in pleasure, is dead, (1 Tim. 5. 6.) not only dead in law as guilty, but dead in state as carnal. Death includes all misery; carnal souls are miserable souls. But to be spiritually minded, φωνητικός τινί· this soul may be described as spiritual minded. The soul that is from that is above, a principle of grace, is life and peace; it is the felicity and happiness of the soul. The life of the soul consists in its union with spiritual things by the mind. A sanctified soul is a living soul; and that life is peace, it is a very comfortable life. All the paths of spiritual wisdom are paths of peace. It is life and peace in the other world, as well as in this. Spiritual-mindedness is eternal life and peace begun, and an assuring earnest of the perfection of it.

[2.] It is enmity to God, (v. 7.) and this is worse than the former. The former speaks the carnal sinner a dead man, that is bad; but this speaks him a devil of a man. It is not only an enemy, but enmity itself. It is not only the alienation of the soul from God, but the opposition of the soul against God; it rebels against his authority, thwart his design, opposes his interest, spits in his face, spurns at his bowels. Can there be a greater enmity, a more deadly enmity, than this? but enmity cannot. How should this humble us for, and warn us against, carnal-mindedness! Shall we harbour and indulge that which is enmity to God our Creator, Owner, Ruler, and Benefactor? To prove this, he urges, that it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be. The holiness of the law of God, and the unholliness of the carnal mind, are as irreconcilable as light to darkness. The carnal man, by the power of divine grace, be made subject to the law of God, but the carnal mind never can; that must be broken and expelled. See how wretchedly the corrupt will of man is enslaved to sin; as far as the carnal mind prevails, there is no inclination to the law of God; therefore wherever there is a change wrought, it is by the power of God's grace, not by the freedom of man's will.

Romans, VIII.

[1.] By inquiring whether we have the Spirit of God and Christ, or no; (v. 9.) Ye are not in the flesh, but in the Spirit. This expresses states and conditions of the soul vastly different. All the saints have flesh, and spirit in them; but to be in the flesh, and to be in the Spirit, are contrary. It denotes our being overcome and subdued by one of these principles in us, that prevails over the other; that is, overcome by them. Now the great question is, whether we are in the flesh, or in the Spirit; and how may we come to know it? Why, by inquiring whether the Spirit of God dwell in us. The Spirit dwelling in us, is the best evidence of our being in the Spirit, for the indwelling is mutual; (1 John 4. 16.) Dwells in God, and God in him.

The Spirit visits many that are unregenerate, with his motions, which they resist and quench; but in all that are sanctified he dwells; there he resides and rules. He is there as a man at his own house, where he is constant and welcome, and has the dominion. Shall we put this question to our own hearts. Who dwells, who rules, who keeps house, here? Which interest has the ascendant? To this he subjoins a general rule of trial; If any man hate not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his. To be Christ's, to be a Christian indeed, one of Christ's children, his servants, his friends, in union with him, is a privilege and honour which many pretend to, that have no part nor lot in the matter. None is but those that have his Spirit; that is, [1.] That are spirited as he was spirited: are meek, and lowly, and humble, and peaceable, and patient, and charitable, as he was. We cannot tread in his steps unless we have his Spirit; the frame and disposition of his spirit must be formed in us. [2.] That are actuated and guided by the Holy Spirit of Christ, as a Sanctifier, Teacher, and Comforter. Having the Spirit of Christ is the same with having the Spirit of God to dwell in us. But those two come much to one; for all that are actuated by the Spirit of God as their rule, are conformable to the Spirit of Christ as their pattern.

Now this description of the character of those to whom belongs this first privilege of freedom from condemnation, is to be applied to all the other privileges that follow.

10. And if Christ be in you, the body is dead because of sin; but the Spirit is life because of righteousness. 11. But if the spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you. 12. Therefore, brethren, we are debtors, not to the flesh, to live after the flesh. 13. For if ye live after the flesh, ye shall die: but if ye through the Spirit do mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live. 14. For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God. 15. For ye have not received the Spirit of bondage again to fear; but ye have received the Spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father. 16. The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God:

In these verses the apostle represents two more excellent benefits, which belong to true believers.

1. Life. The happiness is not barely a negative happiness, or the absence of condemnation; but it is positive, it is an advancement to a life of peace, and will be the unspeakable happiness of the man; (v. 10, 11.) If Christ be in you. Observe, If the Spirit be in us, Christ is in us. He dwells in the heart by faith, Eph. 3. 17. Now we are here told what becomes of the bodies and souls of those in whom Christ is.

1. We cannot say but that the body is dead; it is a frail, mortal, dying body, and it will be dead shortly; it is a house of clay, whose foundation is in the dust. The life purchased and promised does not immortalize the body in its present state. It is dead, it is appointed to die, it is under a sentence of death: as we say, One that is condemned, is a dead man. In the midst of life we are in death: be our bodies ever so strong, and healthful and handsome, they are as good as dead, (Heb. 11. 12.) and this because of sin. It is sin that kills the body. This effect the first threatening has; (Gen. 3. 19.) Dust thou art. Methinks, were there no other argument, love to our bodies should make us hate sin, because it is such an enemy to our bodies. The death even of the bodies of the saints is a remaining token of God's displeasure against sin.

2. But the spirit, the precious soul, that is life; it is now spiritually alive, nay it is life. Grace in the soul is its new nature; the life of the saint lies in the soul, while the life of the sinner goes no farther than the body. When the body dies, and returns to the dust, the spirit is life: not only vivifies the dead, but swallowed up of life. Death to the saints is but the freeing the heaven-born spirit from the clog and load of this body, that it may be fit to partake of eternal life. When Abraham was dead, yet God was the God of Abraham, for even then his spirit was life, Matt. 22. 31, 32. See Ps. 49. 15. And the life because of righteousness. The righteousness of Christ imputed to them, secures the soul, the better part, from death; the righteousness of Christ inherent in them, the renewed image of God upon the soul, preserves it, and, by God's ordination, at death elevates it, and improves it, and makes it meet
All that are Christ's are taken into the relation of children to God, v. 14. Observe, 1. Their property; they are led by the Spirit of God; as a scholar in his learning is led by his tutor, as a traveller in his journey is led by his guide, so the epistles of the apostle are led by the Spirit, and his engagements is led by his captain; not driven as beasts, but led as rational creatures; drawn with the cords of a man, and the bands of love. It is the undoubted character of all true believers, that they are led by the Spirit of God: having submitted themselves in believing to his conduct, they do in their obedience follow that conduct, and are sweetly led into all truth and all duty. 2. Their privilege; They are the sons of God; received into the number of God's children by adoption; owned and loved by him as his children.

And those that are the sons of God, have the Spirit.

(1.) To work in them the disposition of children; (v. 15.) Ye have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear. Understand it, [1.] Of that spirit of bondage which the Old Testament church was under, by the hardness and terror of the dispensation. The veil signified bondage, 2 Cor. 3. 15. Compare v. 17. The Spirit of adoption was not then so p'entifully poured out as now; for the law opened the wound, but little of the remedy. Now you are not under that dispensation, you have not received that Spirit. [2.] Of that spirit of bondage, which the saints were, many of them themselves, under at their conversion, under the convictions of sin and wrath set home by the Spirit: as they, (Acts 2. 37.) the jailer, (Acts 16. 30.) Paul, Acts 9. 6. Then the Spirit himself was to the saints a spirit of bondage; "But," says the apostle, "with you this is over." "God as a Judge," says Dr. Manton, "by the spirit of bondage, sends us to Christ as Mediator, and Christ as Mediator, by the Spirit of adoption, sends us back again to God as a Father." Though a child of God may come under the spirit of bondage again, and may be questioning his sonship, yet the blessed Spirit is not again a spirit of bondage, for then he would witness an untruth.

But you have received the Spirit of adoption. Men may give a charter of adoption; but it is God's prerogative, when he adopts, to give a Spirit of adoption; the nature of children. The Spirit of adoption works in the children of God a filial love to God as a Father, a delight in him, and a dependence upon him, as a Father. A sanctified soul bears the image of God, as the child bears the image of the father.

Whereby we cry, Abba, Father. Praying is here called crying; which is not only an earnest, but a natural expression of desire; children that cannot speak, vent their desires by crying. Now, the Spirit teaches us in prayer to come to God as a Father, with a holy humble confidence, emboldening us to make use in that duty.

Abba, Father. Abba is a Syriac word signifying father, or my father; πατήρ, a Greek word; and why both, Abba, Father? Because Christ said so in prayer, (Mark 14. 36.) Abba, Father; and we have received the Spirit of the Son. It denotes an affectionate endearing impartiality, and a believing stress laid upon the relation. Little children, begging of their parents, can say little but Father, Father, little children; but when they have received the Spirit of adoption, that the adoption is common both to Jews and Gentiles; the Jews call him Abba in their language; the Greeks may call him πατήρ in their language; for in Christ Jesus there is neither Greek nor Jew.

Bears witness with our spirit. Many a man has the witness of his own spirit to the goodness of...
17. And if children, then heirs; heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ; if so be that we suffer with him, that we may be also glorified together. 18. For I reckon that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us. 19. For the earnest expectation of the creature waiteth for the manifestation of the sons of God. 20. For the creature was made subject to vanity, not willingly, but by reason of him who hath subjected the same in hope, 21. Because the creature itself also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God. 22. For we know that the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now. 23. And not only they, but ourselves also, which have the first-fruits of the Spirit, even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body. 24. For we are saved by hope: but hope that is seen is not hope: for what a man seeth, why doth he yet hope for? 25. But if we hope for that we see not, then do we with patience wait for it.

In these words, the apostle describes a fourth illustrious branch of the happiness of believers, that is, a title to the future glory. This is fitly annexed to our sonship; for as the adoption of sons entitles us, so the disposition of sons fits and prepares us for, that glory.

If children, then heirs. v. 17. In earthly inheritance this rule does not hold, only the first-born are heirs; but the church is a church of the first-born, for they are all heirs. Heaven is an inheritance that all the saints are heirs to. They do not come to it as purchasers, by any merit or procurement of their own; but as heirs, purely by the act of God; for God makes heirs. The saints are heirs, though in this world they are heirs under age; see Gal. 4, 1, 2. Their present state is a state of education and preparation for the inheritance. How comfortable should this be to all the children of God, how littlesoever they have in possession, that, being heirs, they have enough in reversion! But the honour and happiness of an heir lies in the value and worth of that which he is heir to; we read of those that inherit the wind; and therefore we have here an abstract of the premises.

1. Heirs of God. The Lord himself is the portion of the saints' inheritance; (Ps. 16, 5.) a goodly heritage, v 6. The saints are spiritual priests, that have the Lord for their inheritance, Num. 18, 20. The vision of God and the fruition of God make up the inheritance the saints are heirs to. God himself will be with them, and will be their God, Rev. 21, 3. 11, Joint-heirs with Christ. Christ, as Mediator, is said to be heir of all things, (Heb. 1, 2.) and true believers, by virtue of their union with him, shall inherit all things, Rev. 21, 7. They that now partake of the Spirit of Christ as his brethren, shall as his brethren partake of his glory, (John 17, 24.) shall sit down with him upon his throne, Rev. 3, 21. Lord, what is man, that thou shouldest thus magnify him! Now, this future glory is further spoken of, as the reward of present sufferings, and as the accomplishment of the present.

1. As the reward of the saints' present sufferings; and it is a rich reward; If so be that we suffer with him, (v. 17.) or, farasmuch as we suffer with him. The state of the church in this world always is, but was then especially, an afflicted state; to be a christian, was certainly to be a sufferer. Now, to comfort them in reference to those sufferings, he tells them that they suffered with Christ, for his sake, for the honour, comfort, and good of the church's science; and we shall be glorified with him. Those that suffered with David in his persecuted state, were advanced by him and with him when he came to the crown; see 2 Tim. 2, 12. See the gains of suffering for Christ; though we may be losers for him, we shall not, we cannot, be losers by him in the end. This the gospel is filled with the assurances of. Now, that suffering saints may have strong supports and consolations from their hopes of heaven, he holds the balance, (v. 18.) in a comparison between the two, which is observable.

1. In one scale he puts the sufferings of this present time. The sufferings of the saints are but sufferings of this present time, strike no deeper than the things of time, last not longer than the present time; (2 Cor. 4, 17.) light affliction, and but for a moment. So that on the sufferings he writes tekel, weighed in the balance, and found light.

2. In the other scale he puts the glory; and finds that a weight, an exceeding and eternal weight; glory that shall be revealed. In our present state we come short, not only in the enjoyment, but in the knowledge, of that glory; (1 Cor. 2, 9, 1 John 3, 2.) it shall be revealed. It surpasses all that we have yet seen or known: present vouchsafements are sweet and precious, very precious, very sweet; but there is something to come, something behind the curtain, that will outshine all. Shalle be revealed in us; not only revealed to us, to be seen, but revealed in us, to be enjoyed. The kingdom of God is within you, and will be so to eternity.

3. He determines the sufferings not worthy to be compared with the glory—en ξυποκατάστασιν, they cannot merit that glory; and if suffering for Christ will not produce much less will it be for the saints, should not at all deter and frighten us from the diligent and earnest pursuit of that glory. The sufferings are small and short, and concern the body only: but the glory is rich and great, and concerns the soul, and is eternal.

This he reckoneth. I reckon—καταλείπομαι. It is not a rash and sudden determination, but the product of very serious and deliberate consideration. He has reasoned the case within himself, weighed the arguments on both sides, and thus at last resolves the point. O how vastly different are the sentence of the word and the sentiment of the world, concerning the sufferings of this present time! I reckon, as an arithmetician that is balancing an account; he first sums up what is disbursed for Christ in the sufferings of this present time, and finds they come to very little; he then sums up what is secured to us by Christ in the glory that shall be revealed, and that he finds an infinite sum, transcending all conception, the disbursement abundantly made up, and the losses infinitely counterbalanced.
And who would be afraid then to suffer for Christ, who, as he is beforehand with us in suffering, so will be the behindhand with us in recompense?

Now Paul was as competent a judge of this point as ever any mere man was. He could reckon not by art only, but by experience; for he knew both.
He knew what the sufferings of this present time were; see 2 Cor. 11. 23—28. He knew what the glory of heaven is; see 2 Cor. 12. 3, 4. And upon the view of both, he gives this judgment here.
There is nothing like a believing view of the glory which shall be revealed, to support and bear up the spirit under all the sufferings of this present time.
The reproach of Christ appears riches to those who have respect to the recompense of reward, Heb.

2. As the accomplishment of the saints' present hopes and expectations, v. 19, &c. As the saints are suffering for it, so they are waiting for it.
Heaven is therefore sure; for God by his Spirit, will not raise and disand disappoint them; he will establish that word unto his servants, on which he has caused them to hope, (Ps. 119. 49.) and heaven is therefore sweet; for if hope deferred makes the heart sick, surely when the desire comes it will be a tree of life, Prov.
13. 12.

Now he observes an expectation of this glory;
(1.) In the creatures, v. 19—22. That man needs be a great transcendent glory, which all the creatures are so earnestly expecting and longing for.
This observation in these verses has some difficulty in it, which puzzles interpreters a little: and the more, because it is a remark not made in any other scripture, with which it might be compared.

By the creature here we understand, not as some do, the Gentile world, and their expectation of Christ and the gospel; which is an exposition very foreign and forced; but the whole frame of nature, especially that of this lower world; the whole creature, the compages of inanimate and sensible creatures, which, because of their harmony and mutual dependence, and because they all constitute and make up one world, are spoken of in the singular number as the creature. The sense of the apostle in these four verses we may take in these observa-

[1.] That there is a present vanity, which the creature, by reason of the sin of man, is made subject to, v. 20. When man sinned, the ground was cursed for man's sake, and with it all the creatures (eespecially of this lower world, where our acquaintance lies) became subject to that curse; became mutable and mortal. Under the bondage of corruption, v. 21. There is an impurity, deformity, and indestructibility, which the creature bears under the fall of man: the creation is sullied and stained, much of the beauty of the world gone. There is an enmity of one creature to another; they are all subject to continual alteration and decay of the individuals, labile to the strokes of God's judgments upon man.
When the world was drowned, and almost all the creatures in it, surely then it was subject to vanity indeed. The whole species of creatures is designed for man, and yet man and his passions are a fortune by them. And it is not the least part of their vanity and bondage, that they are used, or abused rather, by men as instruments of sin. The creatures are often abused to the dishonour of their Creator, the hurt of his children, or the service of his enemies. When the creatures are made the food and fuel of our lusts, they are subject to vanity, they are captivated by the law of sin.

And this, not willingly, not of their own choice;
all the creatures desire their own perfection and consummation. When they are made instruments of sin, it is not willingly. Or, They are thus captivated, not for any sin of their own, which they had committed, but for man's sin; by reason of him who was subject to this sin. Through the creatures being delivered to him, when he by sin delivered himself, he delivered them likewise into the bondage of corruption. God did it judicially; he passed a sentence upon the creatures for the sin of man, by which they became subject.
And this yoke (poor creatures) they bear in hope that it will not be so always. Eph. 1. 23, 24.

[2.] That the creatures groan and travail in pain together under this vanity and corruption, v. 22.
It is a figurative expression. Sin is a burthen to the whole creation; the sin of the Jews, in crucifying Christ, set the earth a quaking under them. The whole world groans and travails under sin. Isa.
41. 11. There is a general outcry of the whole creation against the sin of man: the stone crieth out of the wall, (Hab. 2. 11.) the land cries, Job 31. 38.

[3.] That the creature, that is now thus burthened, shall, at the time of the restitution of all things, be delivered from this bondage into the glorious liberty of the children of God; (v. 21.) they shall no more be subject to vanity and corruption, and the other fruits of the curse; but, on the contrary, this lower world shall be renewed; and then there will be new heavens, there will be a new earth; (2 Pet. 3.
13. Rev. 21. 1.) and there shall be a glory conferred upon all the creatures, which shall be (in the proportion of their natures) as suitable and as great an advancement as the glory of the children of God shall be to them. The fire at the last day shall be a refining, not a destroying, annihilating fire. What comes of the souls of brutes, that goes forward, none can tell. But it should seem by the scripture there will be some kind of restoration of them. And if it be objected, What use will they be of to glo-ified saints? we may suppose them of as much use as they were to Adam in innocency; and if it be only to illustrate the wisdom, power, and goodness, of their Creator, that is enough. Compare with this, Ps. 96. 10.—13. 98. 7—9. Let the heavens re-joy before the Lord, let the earth rejoice, Ps. 97. 6.
[4.] That the creature doth therefore earnestly expect and wait for the manifestation of the children of God, v. 19. Observe, At the second coming of Christ there will be a manifestation of the children of God. Now the saints are God's hidden ones, the wheat seems lost in a heap of chaff; but then they shall be manifested. It does not yet ap-ppear what we shall be, (1 John 3. 2.) but then the glory shall be revealed. The children of God shall appear in their own colours. And this redemption of the creature is reserved till then; for as it was with man, and for man, that they fell under the curse, so with man, and for man, they shall be de-Delivered. All the curse and filth that now adhere to the creature, shall be done away then when those that have suffered with Christ upon earth, shall reign with him upon the earth. This whole obscenity and dirt in the world will be removed; and it may serve as a reason why no good man should be merciful to his beast.

(2.) In the saints, who are new creatures, v. 23—
25. Observe,

[1.] The grounds of this expectation in the saints.
It is our having received the first-fruits of the Spirit; which both quickens our desires, and encourages our hopes, and both ways raises our expectations.
The first-fruits did both sanctify and insue the lump. Grace is the first-fruits of glory, it is glory begun. We, having received such clusters in this wilderness, cannot but long for the full vintage in the heavenly Canaan. Not only they; not only the creatures, who are not capable of such a happiness as the first-fruits of the Spirit; but even we, who have such present rich receipts, cannot but long for something more and greater. In having the first-fruits of the Spirit, we have that which is very precious; but we have not all we would have.

We groan within ourselves; which denotes the strength and secrecy of these desires; so making loud noise, as the hypocrites howling upon the bed for corn and wine, but with silent groans, which pierce heaven soonest of all. Or, We groan among ourselves. It is the unanimous vote, the joint desire of the whole church, all agree in this; Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly. The groaning denotes a very earnest and importunate desire, the soul pained with the delay. Present receipts and comforts are consistent with a great many groans; not as the pangs of one dying, but as the throes of a woman in travail; groans that are symptoms of life, not of death.

[2.] The object of this expectation. What is it we are thus desiring and waiting for? What would we have? The adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body. Though the soul be the principal part of the man, yet the Lord has declared himself for the body also, and has provided a great deal of honour and happiness for the body. The resurrection is here called the redemption of the body. It shall then be rescued from the power of death and the grave, and the bondage of corruption; and though a vile body, yet it shall be refined and beautified, and made like that glorious body of Christ, Phil. 3. 21. 1 Cor. 15. 42.

This is called the adoption. First, It is the adoption of many. Christ was made an example to all the world, angels and men. Now are we the sons of God, but it does not yet appear, the honour is now clouded; but then God will publicly own all his children. The deed of adoption, which is now written, signed, and sealed, will then be recognized, proclaimed, and published. As Christ was, so the saints will be, declared to be the sons of God with power, by the resurrection from the dead, ch. 1. 4. It will then be published, and the adoption perfected and completed. The children of God have bodies as well as souls; and till those bodies are brought into the glorious liberty of the children of God, the adoption is not perfect. But then it will be complete, when the Captain of our salvation shall bring the many sons to glory, Heb. 2. 10.

This is that which we expect, which our flesh rests in hope of, Ps. 16. 9, 10. All the days of our appointed time, we are waiting till this change comes, when he shall call, and we shall answer, and he will have a desire to the work of his hands, Job 14. 14, 15.

[3.] The agreeableness of this to our present state, v. 24, 25. Our happiness is not in present possession; We are saved by hope. In this, as in other things, God hath made our present state a state of trial, and has given us a begotten sight. Those that will deal with God, must deal upon trust. It is acknowledged that one of the principal graces of a christian, is hope, (1 Cor. 13. 13.) which necessarily implies a good thing to come, which is the object of that hope. Faith respects the promise, hope the thing promised. Faith is the evidence, hope the expectation, of things not seen. Faith is the mother of hope.

We do with patience wait. In hoping for this glory, we have need of patience, to bear the sufferings we meet with in the way to it, and the delays of it. Our way is rough and long; but he that shall come, will come, and will not tarry; and therefore though he seem to tarry, it becomes us to wait for him.

26. Likewise the Spirit also helpeth our infirmities: for we know not what we should pray for as we ought: but the Spirit itself maketh intercession for us with groanings which cannot be uttered. And he that searcheth the hearts knoweth what is the mind of the Spirit, because he maketh intercession for the saints, according to the will of God. And we know that all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to his purpose.

The apostle here suggests two privileges more, which true christians are entitled to.

I. The help of the Spirit in prayer. While we are in this world, hoping and waiting for what we see not, we must be praying. Hope supposes desire, and that desire offered up to God is prayer; we groan. Now observe,

1. Our weakness in prayer; We know not what we should pray for as we ought. (1.) As to the matter of our prayers; we have not a doubt. We are not competent judges of our own condition: Who knows what is good for a man in this life? Eccl. 6. 12. We are short-sighted, and very much biased in favour of the flesh, and apt to separate the end from the way. Ye know not what ye ask, Matt. 20. 22. We are like foolish children, that are ready to cry for fruit before it is ripe, and fit for them; see Luke 9. 54, 55. (2.) As to the manner, we know not how to pray; we do not know that we do that which is good, but we must do it well; seek in a due order; and here we are often at a loss; graces are weak, affections cold, thoughts wandering; and it is not always easy to find the heart to pray, 2 Sam. 7. 27. The apostle speaks of this in the first person; We know not. He puts himself among the rest. Folly, and weakness, and distraction in prayer, are that which all the saints are complaining of. It is easy to make a saint as Paul knew not what to pray for, what little reason have we to go forth about that duty in our own strength!

2. The assistances which the Spirit gives us in that duty. He helps our infirmities; means especially of our praying infirmities, which most easily beset us in that duty, against which the Spirit helps. The Spirit in the word helps; many rules and promises there are in the word for our help; the Spirit in the heart helps, dwelling in us, working in us, as a Spirit of grace and supplication; especially with respect to the infirmities we are under when we are in a suffering state, when our faith is most apt to fail; for this end the Holy Ghost was poured out. Helpeth, everlastingly, heaves with us, over-against us, helps as we help one that would lift up a burden, by lifting over-against him at the other end; helps with us, with us doing our endeavours, putting forth the strength of our faith, and the might of our heart, that the Spirit should do all; when the Spirit goes before us, we must follow ourselves. We cannot without God, and he will not without us.

What help? Why, the Spirit itself makes intercession for us, dictates our requests, indites our petitions, draws up our plea for us. Christ intercedes for us in heaven, the Spirit intercedes for us in our hearts; so graciously has God provided for the encouragement of the praying remnant. The Spirit, as an enlightening Spirit, teaches us what to pray for; as a sanctifying Spirit, works and excites praying graces; as a comforting Spirit, silences our fears, and helps us over all our discouragements. The Holy Spirit is the Spring of all our desires and breathings toward God. Now this intercession which the Spirit makes is,

1. With groanings that cannot be uttered. The spirits of fervency of those desires which the Holy Spirit works, are hereby intimate. There may be praying in the Spirit, where there is not a word spoken; as Moses prayed, (Exod. 14. 15.) and Hannah, 1 Sam. 1. 13.

It is not the rhetoric and eloquence, but the faith and fervency, of our prayers, that the Spirit works, as an intercessor, in us. Cannot be uttered; they are so confused, the soul is in such a hurry with temptations and troubles, we know not what to say, nor how to express ourselves. Here is the Spirit interceding with groans that cannot be uttered. When we can but cry, Abba, Father, and refer ourselves to him with a holy humble boldness, this is the work of the Spirit.

2. According to the will of God, v. 27. The Spirit in the heart never contradicts the Spirit in the word. Those desires that are contrary to the will of God, do not come from the Spirit. The Spirit interceding in us evermore melts our wills into the will of God. Not as I will but as thou wilt.

3. The sure success of these intercessions; He that searches the heart, knoweth what is the mind of the Spirit, v. 27.

To a hypocrite, all whose religion lies in his tongue, nothing is more dreadful than that God searches the heart and sees through all his disguises. To a sincere Christian, who makes heart-work of his duty, nothing is more comfortable than that God searches the heart, for then he will hear and answer those desires which we want words to express. He knows what we have need of before we ask, Matt. 6. 8. He knows what is the mind of his own Spirit in us. And as he always hears the Son interceding for us, so he always hears the Spirit interceding in us, because his intercession is according to the will of God.

What could have been done more for the comfort of the Lord's people, in all their addresses to God? Christ had said, "Whatever you ask the Father according to his will, he will give it you." But how shall we learn to ask according to his will? Why the Spirit will teach us that. Therefore it is, that the seed of Jacob never seek in vain.

1. The concurrence of all providences for the good of those that are Christ's, v. 28. It might be objected, that, notwithstanding all these privileges, we see believers compassed about with manifold afflictions; though the Spirit makes intercession for them, yet their troubles are continued. It is very true; but in this the Spirit's intercession is always effectual, that, however it goes with them, all this is working together for their good. Observe here,

1. The character of the saints, who are interested in this privilege; they are here described by such properties as are common to all that are truly sanctified.

1. They love God. This includes all the outgoings of the soul's affections toward God as the chiefest good and highest end. It is our love to God that makes every providence sweet, and therefore profitable. Those that love God, make the best of all he does, and take all in good part.

2. They are according to his purpose; effectually called according to the eternal purpose. The call is effectual, not according to any merit or desert of our's, but according to God's own gracious purpose.

2. The privilege of the saints, that all things work together for good to them, that is, all the providences of God that concern them. All that God performs he performs for them, Ps. 37. 2. Their sins are not of his performing, therefore not intended here, though his permitting of sin is made to work for their good, 2 Chron. 32. 31. But all the providences of God are their's; merciful providences, affecting providences, personal, public: they are all for good; perhaps for temporal good, as Joseph's troubles; however for spiritual and eternal good. That is good for them, that does their souls good. Either directly or indirectly, every providence has a tendency to the spiritual good of those that love God; breaking them off from sin, bringing them nearer to God, weaning them from the world, fitting them for heaven.

Work together. They work, as physic works upon the body, various ways, according to the intention of the physician; but all for the patient's good. They work together, as several ingredients in a medicine concur to answer the intention. God hath set the one over against the other; (Eccl. 7. 14.) contras, a verb singular, with a noun plural, denoting the harmony of Providence and its uniform designs, all the wheels as one wheel, Ezek. 10. 13.

He worketh all things together for good; so some read it. It is not from any specific quality in the providences themselves, but from the power and grace of God, they produce these providences. All this we know; know it for a certainty, from the word of God, from our own experience, and from the experience of all the saints.

29. For whom he did foreknow, he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son, that he might be the first-born among many brethren. 30. Moreover whom he did predestinate, them he also called: and whom he called, them he also justified: and whom he justified, them he also glorified.

The apostle, having reckoned up so many ingredients of the happiness of true believers, comes here to represent the ground of them all, which he lays in predestination. These precious privileges are conveyed to us by the charter of the covenant, but they are founded in the counsel of God, which infallibly secures the event. That Jesus Christ, the purchaser, might not labour in vain, nor spend his strength and life for nought and in vain, there is a remnant given him, a seed that he shall see, so that the good pleasure of God shall be performed. For the explication of which, he here sets before us the order of the causes of our salvation, a golden chain, which cannot be broken. There are four links of it.

I. Whom he did foreknow, he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son. All that God designed for glory and happiness as the end, he decreed to grace and holiness as the way. Not, whom he did foreknow to be holy, them he predestinated to be holy. The counsels and decrees of God do not trucule to the frail and fickle will of men; no, God's foreknowledge of the saints is the same with that everlasting love wherewith he is said to have loved them, Jer. 31. 3. God's knowing his people is the same with his owning of them, Ps. 1. 6. John 10. 14. 2 Tim. 2. 19. See ch. 11. 2. Words of knowledge often in scripture denote affection; so here: Elect according to the foreknowledge of God, 1 Pet. 1. 2. And the same word is rendered foreordained, 1 Pet. 1. 20. Whom he did foreknow, that is, whom he designed for his friends and favourites. I know thee by name, said God to Moses, Exod. 33. 12. Now those whom God thus foreknew, he did predestinate to be conformed to Christ.

1. Holiness consists in our conformity to the image of Christ. That takes in the whole of sanctification, of which Christ is the great pattern and sampler. To be spirited as Christ was, to walk and live as Christ did, to bear our sufferings patiently as Christ did. Christ is the express image of his Father, and the saints are conformed to the image of Christ. Thus it is by the mediation and interposals of Christ, that we are received to us, and God's likeness renewed upon us, in which two things consists the happiness of man.

2. All that God hath from eternity foreknown with favour, he hath predestinated to this conformity. It is not we that can conform ourselves to Christ; our giving of ourselves to Christ takes rise in God's giving of us to him: and in giving us to him, he predestinated us to be conformed to his image. It is a more cavil therefore to call the doctrine of election, a licentious doctrine; and to argue, that it gives encouragement to sin, as if the end were separated from the way, and happiness from holiness. None can know their election but by their conformity to the image of Christ; for all that are chosen are chosen to sanctification; (2 Thess. 2. 13.) and surely it cannot be a temptation to any to be conformed to the image of Christ, if they were predestinated to be conformed to Christ.

3. That which is herein chiefly designed is, the honour of Jesus Christ, that he might be the First-born among many brethren; that Christ might have the honour of being the great pattern, as well as the great prince; and in this, as in other things, might have pre-emience. It was in the first-born that all the children were dedicated to God under the law; the first-born was the head of the family, on whom all the rest did depend: now in the family of the saints, Christ must have the honour of being the first-born. And blessed be God that there are many brethren; though they seem but a few in one place, at one time, yet, when they come all together, they will be a great many.

There is therefore a certain number predestinated, that the end of Christ's undertaking might be infallibly secured. Had the event been left at uncertainties in the divine counsels, to depend upon the contingent turn of man's will, Christ might have been the first-born among few or no brethren; a captain without soldiers, and a prince without subjects: to prevent which, and to secure to him many brethren, the decree is absolute, the thing ascertained, that he might be sure to see his seed; there is a remnant predestinated to his image, who will certainly have its accomplishment in the holiness and happiness of that chosen race; and so, in spite of all the opposition of the powers of darkness, Christ will be the first-born among many, very many brethren.

II. Whom he did predestinate, them he also called. Not only with the external call, (so many are called, that were not chosen, Matt. 20. 16.—22. 14.) but with the effectual call. The former comes to the ear only, but this to the heart. All that God did from eternity predestinate to grace and glory, he does, in the fulness of time, effectually call. The call is then effectual, when we come at the call; and we then come at the call, when the Spirit draws us, convinces the conscience of guilt and wrath, enlightens the understanding, bows the will, persuades and enables us to embrace Christ in the promises, keeps not of his part, is the effectual call from self and earth, to God and Christ and heaven, as our end; from sin and vanity, to grace and holiness and seriousness as our way. This is the gospel call.

Them he called, that the purpose of God, according to election, might stand; we are called to that to which we were chosen. So that the only way to make our election sure, is, to make sure our calling, 2 Pet. 1. 10.

III. Whom he called, them he also justified. All that are effectually called, are justified; absolved from guilt, and accepted as righteous through Jesus Christ. They are recti in curia—right in court; no sin that ever they have been guilty of, shall come against them, to condemn them. The book is crossed, the bond cancelled, the censure of God vacated; and they are no longer dealt with as criminals, but owned and loved as friends and favourites. Blessed is the man whose iniquity is thus forgiven. None are thus justified but those that are effectually called. Those that stand it out against the gospel call, abide under guilt and wrath.

IV. Whom he justified, them he also glorified. This power of Christ, remained broken in effectual calling, and the guilt of sin remained in justifications; all that which hinders is taken out of the way, and nothing can come between that soul and glory. Observe, It is spoken of as a thing done, he glorified, because of the certainty of it; he hath saved us, and called us with a holy calling.

In the eternal glorification of all the elect, God's design of love has its full accomplishment. This was what he aimed at all along—to bring them to heaven. Nothing less than that glory would make up the fulness of his covenant relation to them as God; and therefore, in all he does for them, and in them, he has this in his eye. Are they chosen? It is to salvation. Called? It is to his kingdom and glory. Begotten again? It is to an inheritance incorruptible. Afflicted? It is to work for them this exceeding and eternal weight of glory.

Observe, The author of all these is the same. It is God himself that predestinated, calleth, justifieth, glorifieth; so the Lord alone did lead him, and there was no strange God with him. Created wills are so very fickle, and created powers so very feeble, that if any of these did depend upon the creature, the whole would shake. But God himself hath undertaken the doing of it from first to last, that we might abide in a constant dependence upon him and subscription to him, and ascribe all the praise to him; that every crown may be cast before the throne. This is a mighty encouragement to our faith and hope; for, as for God, his way, his work, is perfect; he that hath laid the foundation, will build upon it; and the top-stone will at length be brought forth with shoutings, and it will be our eternal work to cry, Grace, grace to it.

31. What shall we then say to these things? If God be for us, who can be against us? 32. He that spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all, how shall he not with him also freely give us all things? 33. Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? It is God that justifieth. 34. Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died, yea rather, that is risen again, who is even at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for us. 35. Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword? 36. As it is written, For thy sake we are killed all the day long; we are accounted as sheep for the slaughter. 37. Nay, in all these things we are more than conquerors through him that loved us. 38. For I am persuaded, that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, 39. Nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord.

The apostle closes this excellent discourse upon the privileges of believers with a holy triumph, in the name of all the saints.

Having largely set forth the mystery of God's love to us in Christ, and the exceeding great and precious privileges we enjoy by him, he concludes like an orator: What shall we then say to these things? What use shall we make of all that has been said? He speaks as one amazed and swallowed up with the contemplation and admiration of it, wondering at the height and depth, and length and breadth, of the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge. The more we know of other things, the less we wonder at them; but the further we are led into an acquaintance with gospel-mysteries, the more we are affected with the admiration of them. If Paul were at a loss what to say to these things, no marvel if we be.

And what does he say? Why, if ever Paul rode in a triumphant chariot on this side heaven, here it was: with such a holy height and bravery of spirit, with such a fullness and copiousness of expression does he here comfort himself and all the people of God, upon the consideration of these privileges.

In general, he here makes a challenge, throws down the gauntlet, as it were, dares all the enemies of the saints to do their worst: If God be for us, who can be against us? The ground of the challenge is God's being for us; in that he sums up all our privileges. That includes all, that God is for us; not only reconciled to us, and not against us, but in covenant with us, and so engaged for us; all his attributes for us, his promises for us; all that he is, and has, and does, is for his people. He performs all things for them. He is for them, even when he seems to act against them.

And if so, who can be against us, so as to prevail against us, so as to hinder our happiness? Be they ever so great and strong, ever so many, ever so wicked, ever so malicious, what can they do? While God is for us, and we keep in his love, we may with a holy boldness defy all the powers of darkness. Let Satan do his worst, he is chained; let the world do its worst, it is conquered: principalities and powers are spoiled and disarmed, and triumphed over, in the cross of Christ. Who then dares fight against us, while God himself is fighting for us? And this we say to these things, this is the inference we draw from these premises. More particularly,

1. We have supplies ready in all our wants; (v. 32.) He that spared, &c. Who can be against us, to strip us, to deprive us of our comforts? Who can cut off our streams, while we have a fountain to go to?

1. Observe what God has done for us, on which our hopes are built; He spared not his own Son. When he undertook to undertake our salvation, the Father was willing to part with his only begotten Son, as an inestimable gift to bestow for the salvation of poor souls; now may we know that he loves us, in that he hath not withheld his Son, his own Son, his only Son, from us, as he said of Abraham, Gen. 22. 12. If nothing else will save man, rather than man shall perish, let him go, though it were out of his bosom. Thus did he deliver him up for us all, for the elect, for us all; not only for our good, but in his stead, as a sacrifice of atonement to atone for us; a propitiation for sin. When he had undertaken it, he did not spare him. Though he were his own Son, yet, being made sin for us, it pleased the Lord to bruise him. "Our kinsman—he did not abate him a farthing of that great debt, but charged it home. Awake, O sword, He did not spare his own Son that served him, that he might spare us, though we have done him so much disservice.

2. What we may therefore expect he will do. He will with him freely give us all things. (1.) It is implied, that he will give us Christ, for other things he has been pleased to give us; not only with him given for us, but with him given to us. He that put himself to so much charge to make the purchase for us, surely will not hesitate at making the application to us. (2.) He will with him freely give us all things, all things that he sees to be needful and necessary for us; all good things, and more we would not desire, Ps. 34. 10. And Infinite Wisdom shall be the judge, whether it be good for us, and needful for us, or no. No gift to be given, freely, without reluctance; he is ready to give, meets us with his favours; and freely, without recompense, without money, and without price.

How shall he not? Can it be imagined that he should do the greater, and not do the lesser? That he should give so great a gift for us when we were enemies, and should deny us any good thing, now that through him we are friends and children? This is a great argument against our fears of want. He that hath prepared a table for us in the presence of our enemies, will be sure to give us enough to bear our charges in the way to it. He that hath designed us for the inheritance of sons when we come to age, will not let us want necessities in the mean time.

II. We have an answer ready to all accusations, and a security against all condemnations; (v. 33, 34.) Who shall lay any thing? Dost thou the law accuse them? Do their own consciences accuse them? Is the devil the accuser of the brethren, accusing them before our God day and night? This is enough to answer all those accusations, It is God that justifieth. Men may justify themselves, as the Pharisees did, and yet the accusations may be in full force against them; but if God justifies, that answers all. He is the judge, the king, the party offended, and his judgment is according to truth, and sooner or later all the world will be brought to be of his mind; so that we may challenge all our accusers to come and put in their charge. This overthrows them all; it is God, the righteous faithful God, that justifieth.

Who is he that condemneth? Though they cannot make good the charge, yet they will be ready to condemn; but we have a plea ready to move in arrest of judgment, a plea which cannot be overruled. It is Christ that died, &c. It is by virtue of our interest in Christ, our relation to him, and our union with him, that we are thus secured.

1. His death; it is Christ that died. By the merit of his death he paid our debt; and the surety's payment is a good plea to an action of debt. It is Christ, an able all-sufficient Saviour.

2. His resurrection; ye are rather that is risen again. This is a much greater encouragement, for it is a convincing evidence that divine justice was satisfied by the merit of his death. His resurrection was his acquittal, it was a legal discharge. Therefore the apostle mentions it with a yea rather. If he had died, and not risen again, we had been where we were.

3. His sitting at the right hand of God; He is even at the right hand of God. A further evidence, that he had done his work, and a mighty encouragement to us in reference to all accusations, that we have a friend, such a friend, in the bosom of the Father, a friend in Christ, who demise that he is ready there, always at hand; and that he is ruling there; all power is given to him. Our friend is himself the judge.

4. The intercession which he makes there. He is there, not unconcerned about us, not forgetful of us, but making intercession. He is agent for us there; an advocate for us, to answer all accusations, to put in our plea, and to prosecute it with effect, to appear for us, and to present our petitions.

And is not this abundant matter for comfort? What shall we say to these things? Is this the manner of men, O Lord God? What room is left for doubting and despair? Why art thou cast down, O my soul? Are the brave and strong of the ancient church meek and lowly? We have some consolation in the present day, and are comforted by the example of our forefathers.

Some understand the accusation and condemnation here spoken of, of that which the suffering saints met with from men. The primitive Christians had many black crimes laid to their charge—heresy, sedition, rebellion, and what not? For these the ruling powers condemned them; but no matter for that! (says the apostle;) "while we stand rich, O God's bail! it is of no great moment how we stand at men's; To all the hard censures, the malicious calumnies, and the unjust and unrighteous sentences of men, we may with comfort oppose our justification before God through Christ Jesus, "as that which doth abundantly counterfeit," 1 Cor. 4. 3.

III. We have good assurance of our preservation and continuance in this blessed state, v. 53, to the end.

The fears of the saints, lest they should lose their hold of Christ, are often very discouraging and disquieting, and create them a great deal of disturbance: but here is that which may silence their fears, and still such storms, that nothing can separate them.

We have here from the apostle,

1. A daring challenge to all the enemies of the same, to separate them from us, if they could, from the love of Christ. Who shall? None shall, v. 35—37.

God having manifested his love in giving his own Son for us, and not hesitating at that, can we imagine that any thing else should divert or dissolve that love? Observe here,

(1.) The present calamities of Christ's beloved ones, supposed; that they meet with tribulation on all hands, are in distress, and are wounded in all their ways, not weeping for their own sufferings, but having joy, and looking for their succour and relief in this world, are followed with persecution from an angry malicious world that always hated those whom Christ loved; pinched with famine, and starved with nakedness, when stripped of all creature-comforts; exposed to the greatest perils; the sword of the magistrate drawn against them, ready to be sheathed in their bowels, b Ethed in their blood. Can a case be supposed more black, and dismal? Is it illustrated (v. 36.) by a passage quoted from Ps. 44. 22. For thine sake we are killed all the day long: which intimates, that we are not to think strange, no not concerning the fiery bloody trial. We see the Old Testament saints had the same lot; so persecuted they the prophets that were before us. Killed all the day long, continually exposed to, and expecting, the fatal stroke. There is still every day, and all the day long, one other of the people of God bleeding and dying under the rage of persecuting enemies. Accounted as sheep for the slaughter; they make no more of killing a christian than of butchering a sheep. Sheep are killed, not because they are hurtful while they live, but because they are useful when they are dead. They kill the christians, to please themselves, to be food to their malice. They eat up their flesh, and their bones to the last bone. There is no way of safety, and no way of escape. They are put into a living trap, in order to be torn to pieces in it. This is God's method of preaching the gospel; of clearing it of false representations, and to separate it from theAntichristian world.

(2.) The inability of all these things to separate us from the love of Christ. Shall they, can they, do it? No, by no means. All this will not cut the bond of love and friendship that is between Christ and true believers.

[1.] Christ doth not, wilt not, love us the less for all this. All these troubles are very consistent with the strong and constant love of the Lord Jesus. They are neither a cause nor an evidence of the abatement of his love. When Paul was whipped, and beaten, and imprisoned, and stoned. did Christ love him ever the less? Were his favours intermitted? His smiles any whit suspended? His visits more shy? By no means, but the contrary. These things separate us from the love of other friends. When Paul was brought before Nero, all men forsake him, but then the Lord stood by him. 2 Tim. 4. 16, 17. Whatever persecuting enemies may rob us of, they cannot rob us of the love of Christ; they cannot intercept his love-tokens, they cannot interrupt or exclude his visits: and therefore let them do their worst, they cannot make a true believer miserable.

[2.] We do not, will not, love him the less for this; and that for this reason, because we do not think the less of him, who, from his love, entertains no misgiving thoughts, makes no hard conclusions, no unkind constructions, takes all in good part, that comes from love. A true christians love Christ never the less, though he suffer for him; thinks never the worse of Christ, though he lose all for him.

(3.) The triumph of believers in this; (v. 37.) Nay, in all these things we are more than conquerors.

[1.] We are conquerors, though killed all the day long, yet conquerors. A strange way of conquering, but it was Christ's way: thus he triumphed over principalities and powers in his cross. It is a surer and a nobler way of conquest by faith and patience, than by fire and sword. The enemies have sometimes confessed themselves baffled and overcome by the invincible courage and constancy of the martyrs, who thus overcame the most victorious enemies by not loving their lives to the death, Rev. 12. 11.

[2.] We are more than conquerors. In our patient bearing of these trials we are not only conquerors, but more than conquerors, that is, triumpher Those are more than conquerors, that conquer,

First, With little loss. Many conquests are dearly bought; but what do the suffering saints lose? Do they lose what is precious to them, and to which all the gold loses in the furnace, nothing but the dross. It is no great loss to lose things which are not; a body that is of the earth, earthly.

Secondly, With great gain. The spoils are exceeding rich; glory, honour, and peace, a crown of righteousness that fades not away. In this the suffering saints have triumphed; not only have not been separated from the love of Christ, but have by the way of suffering, come into possession of the promises of him, which the gold loses in the furnace, nothing but the dross. It is no great loss to lose things which are not; a body that is of the earth, earthly.

2. A direct and positive conclusion of the whole matter; For I am persuaded, v. 38. 39. It denotes...
I SAY the truth in Christ, I lie not, my conscience also bearing me witness in the Holy Ghost. 2. That I have great heaviness and continual sorrow in my heart. 3. For I could wish that myself were accursed from Christ for my brethren, my kinsmen according to the flesh: 4. Who are Israelites; to whom pertain the adoption, and the glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the law, and the service of God, and the promises; 5. Whose are the fathers, and of whom, as concerning the flesh, Christ came, who is over all, God blessed for ever. Amen.

We have here the apostle’s solemn profession of a great concern for the nation and people of the Jews: that he was heartily troubled, that so many of them were enemies to the gospel, and out of the way of salvation. For this he had great heaviness and continual sorrow. Such a profession as this was requisite to take off the Jews, which otherwise he might have contracted by asserting and proving their rejection. It is wisdom as much as may be to mollify those truths which sound harsh, and seem unpleasant: dip the nail in oil, it will drive the better. The Jews had a particular pique at Paul above any of the apostles, as appears by the story of the Acts: and therefore were the more apt to take things amiss of him: to prevent which, he introduces his discourse with this tender and affectionate profession; that they might not think he triumphed or insulted over the rejected Jews, or was pleased with the calamities that were coming upon them. Thus Jeremiah appeals to God concerning the Jews of his day, whose ruin was hastening on; (Jer. 17. 16.) Neither have I desired the woeful day, thou knowest. Nay, Paul was so far from desiring it, that he most pathetically deprecates it. And lest this should be thought only a copy of his countenance, to flatter and please them,

1. He asserts it with a solemn protestation; (v. 1.) I say the truth in Christ, “I speak it as a christian, one of God’s people, children that will not lie: as one that knows not how to give flattering titles.” Or, “I appeal to Christ, who searches the heart, concerning it.” He appeals likewise to his own conscience, which was instead of a thousand witnesses. That which he was saying to assert, was not only a great and weighty thing, (such solemn protestations are not to be thrown away upon trifles,) but it was likewise a secret; it was concerning a sorrow in his heart, to which none was a capable competent witness, but God and his own conscience. That I have great heaviness, v. 2. He does not say for what; the very mention of it was unpleasant and invidious; but it is plain that he means for the rejection of the Jews.

2. He backs it with a very serious imprecation, which he was ready to make, out of love to the Jews. I could wish; he does not say, I do wish, for it was no proper means appointed for such an end; but if it were, I could wish that myself were accursed from Christ for my brethren—a very high pang of zeal and affection for his country; not only to prevent the greatest misery, to do them good. Love is apt to be thus bold and venturous, and self-denying. Because the glory of God’s grace in the salvation of many, is to be preferred before the welfare and happiness of a single person, Paul, if they were put in competition, would be content to forego all his own happiness, to purchase theirs.

1. He would be content to be cut off from the land of the living, in the most shameful and ignominious manner, as an anathema, or a devoted person. They thirsted for his blood, persecuted him as the most obnoxious person in the world, the curse and plague of his generation, 1 Cor. 4. 13. Acts 22. 22. "Now," says Paul, "I am willing to bear all this, and a great deal more, for your good. Abuse me as much as you will, count and call me at your pleasure; your unbelief and rejection create in my heart a heaviness so much greater than all these troubles can, that I could look upon them not only as tolerable, but as desirable, rather than this rejection. 2. Heathens have been distinguished from the society of the faithful, to be separated from the church, and from the communion of saints, as a heathen man and a publican, if that would do them any good. He could wish himself no more remembered among the saints, his name blotted out of the church-records; though he had been so great a planter of churches, and the spiritual father of so many thousands, yet he would be content to be disowned by the church, cut off from all communion with it, and have his name buried in oblivion or reproach, for the good of the Jews. It may be, some of the Jews had a prejudice against Christianity for Paul’s sake; such a speech they had at him, that they hated the religion that he was of; "If that stumble you," says Paul, "I could wish I might be cast out, not embraced as a Christian, so you might be at rest." Thus Moses, (Exod. 32. 22.) in a like hurry passion, (Jehovah, Bless me, I pray thee, out of the book which thou hast written.) 3. Nay, some think that the expression goes further, and that he could be content to be cut off from all his share of happiness in Christ, if that might be a means of their salvation. It is a common charity, that begins at home; this is something higher, and more noble and generous. It is he gives us the reason of this affection and concern. 1. Because of their relation to him; My brethren, my kinsmen, according to the flesh. Though they were very bitter against him upon all occasions, and gave him the most unnatural and barbarous usage, yet thus respectfully does he speak of them. It shews him to be a man of a forgiving spirit; not that I had ought to accuse my nation of, Acts 28. 19. My people, and my brethren Paul, 1 Tim. 1. 18. We ought to be in a special manner concerned for the spiritual good of our relations, our brethren and kinsmen. To them we lie under special engagements; and we have more opportunity of doing good to them; and concerning them, and their usefulness to us, we must in a special manner give account. 2. Especially because of their relation to God; (r. 4. 5.) Who are Israelites, the seed of Abraham, God’s friend, and of Jacob his chosen; taken into the covenant of peculiarity, dignified and distinguished by visible church-privileges; many of which are here mentioned; The adoption: not that which is saving, and which entitles to eternal happiness, but that which was external and typical, and entitled them to the land of Canaan. Israel is my son, Exod. 4. 24. 3. And the glory; the ark and the mercy-seat, over which God dwelt between the cherubims; that was the glory of Israel, 1 Sam. 4. 21. The many symbols and tokens of the divine presence and guidance, the cloud, the Shechinah, the distinguishing favours conferred upon them, these were the glory. And the covenant; the covenant made with Abraham, and often renewed with his seed upon divers occasions. There was a covenant at Sinai, (Exod. 24.) in the plains of Moab, (Deut. 29.) at Shechem, (Josh. 24.) and often afterward; and still these were preserved to Israel. Or, the covenant of peculiarity, and in that, as in the type, the covenant of grace. And the giving of the law. It was to them that the ceremonial and judicial law were given, and the moral law in writing pertained to them. It is a great privilege to have the law of God among us, and it is to be accounted so, Ps. 147, 19, 20. This was the grandeur of Israel, Deut. 4. 7, 8. And the service of God. They had the ordinances of God’s worship among them; the temple, the altars, the priests, the sacrifices, the feasts, and the institutions relating to them. They were in this respect greatly honoured, that, while other nations were worshipping and serving stocks, and stones, and devils, and they knew not what other idols of their own invention, the Israelites were serving the true God in the way of his own appointment. And the promises; particular promises added to the general covenant; promises relating to the Messiah and the gospel-state. Observe, The promises accompany the giving of the law, and the service of God; for the comfort of the promises is to be had in obedience to that law, and attendance upon that service. v. 5. Whose are the fathers; Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, those men of renown, that stood so high in the favour of God. The Jews stand in relation to them, are their children, and proud enough they were of it; We have Abraham to our father. It was for the fathers’ sake, that they were taken into covenant, ch. 11. 28. But the greatest honour of all, was, that of them as concerning the flesh, that is, as to his human nature, Christ came; for he took on him the seed of Abraham, Heb. 2. 16. As to his divine nature, he is the Lord from heaven; but as to his human nature, he is of the seed of Abraham. This was the great privilege of the Jews, that Christ was of kin to them. Mentioning Christ, he interposes a very great word concerning him, that he is over all, God blessed for ever. Let the Jews should think meanly of him, because he was of their alliance, he here speaks thus honourably concerning him; and it is a very full proof of the Godhead of Christ; he is not only over all, as Mediator, but he is God blessed for ever. Therefore, how much sorer punishment were they worthy of, that rejected him? It was likewise the honour of the Jews, and one reason why Paul had a kindness for them, that, seeing God blessed for ever would be a man, he would be a Jew; and considering the gesture and character of that people, at that time, it may well be looked upon as a part of his humiliation. 6. Not as though the word of God hath taken none effect. For they are not all Israel, which are of Israel: 7. Neither because they are the seed of Abraham, are they all children; but, In Isaac shall thy seed be called. 8. That is, They which are the children of the flesh, these are not the children of God: but the children of the promise are counted for the seed. 9. For this is the word of promise, At this time will I come, and Sarah shall have a son. 10. And not only this; but when Rebecca also had conceived by one, even by our father Isaac; 11. (For the children being not yet born, neither having done any good or evil, that the purpose of God according to election might stand, not of works, but of that which calleth;) 12. It was said unto her, The elder shall serve the younger. 13. As it is written, Jacob have I loved, but Esau have I hated.
The apostle, having made his way to that which he had to say, concerning the rejection of the body of his countrymen, with a protestation of his own affection for them, and a concession of their undoubted privileges, comes in these verses, and the following part of the chapter, to prove, that the rejection of the Jews, by the establishment of the gospel-dispensation, did not at all invalidate the word of God's promise to the patriarchs: Not as though the word of God hath taken no effect, v. 6. Which, considering that present state of things, which created to Paul that mortifying hardness and continual sorrow, (v. 2.) might be suspected. We are not to ascribe inefficacy to any word of God: nothing that he has spoken, does or can fall to the ground; see Isa. 55. 10, 11. The promises and threatenings shall have their accomplishment; and one way or other he will magnify the law, and make it honourable. This is to be understood, especially of the promise of God, which is so frequent in the dispensation of the old covenant, and the external tokens of the divine favour, which had been conferred upon them.

This he does four ways.

1. By explaining the true meaning and intention of the promise, v. 6, 7.
4. By fixing the true reason of the Jews' rejection, v. 30, to the end.

In this paragraph the apostle explains the true meaning and intention of the promise. When we mistake the word, and misunderstand the promise, no marvel, if we are ready to quarrel with God about the accomplishment; and therefore the sense of that must first be duly stated. Now he here makes it out, that, when God said, he would be a God to Abraham, and to his seed, (which was the famous promise, made unto the fathers,) he did not mean it of all his seed according to the flesh, as if it were a necessary concomitant of the blood of Abraham; but that he intended it with a limitation only to such and such. And as from the beginning it was appropriated to Isaac, and not to Ishmael; to Jacob, and not to Esau; and yet for all that, the word of God was not made of no effect; so now the same promise is appropriated to believing Jews that embrace Christ and circumcision; and, though it throw off much of that refuse Christ, yet the promise is not therefore defeated and invalidated, any more than it was by the typical rejection of Ishmael and Esau.

1. He lays down this proposition—that they are not all Israel, which are of Israel, (v. 6.) neither because they are, &c. v. 7. Many that descended from the loins of Abraham and Jacob, and were of their flesh and blood, were not of the nation of Israel, yet were very far from being Israelites indeed, interested in the saving benefits of the new covenant. They are not all really Israel, that are so in name and profession. It does not follow, that, because they are the seed of Abraham, therefore they must needs be the children of God; though they themselves fancied so, boasted much of, and built much upon, their relation to Abraham. Matt. 3. 9. John 8. 38-39. But it does not follow. Grace does not run in a blood; nor are saving benefits inseparably annexed to external church privileges: though it is common for people thus to stretch the meaning of God's promise, to bolster themselves up in vain hope.

II. He proves this by instances; and there's shews, not only that some of Abraham's seed were chosen, and others not, but that God therein wrought according to the counsel of his own will, and not with regard to that law of commandments which the present unbelieving Jews were so strangely wedged to.

1. He specifies the case of Isaac and Ishmael, both of them the seed of Abraham; and yet Isaac only taken into covenant with God, and Ishmael rejected and cast out. For this he quotes Gen. 21. In the last shall thy seed be called: which comes in there as a reason why Abraham should be willing to cast out the bond-woman and her son, because the covenant was to be established with Isaac, ch. 17. 19. And yet the word which God had spoken, that he would be a God to Abraham and to his seed, did not therefore fall to the ground; for the blessings wrapt up in that great word, being communicated by God as a benefactor, he was free to determine on what head they should rest, and accordingly entailed them upon Isaac, and rejected Ishmael.

This he explains further, (v. 8, 9.) and shews what God intended to teach us by this dispensation.

(1.) That the children of the flesh, as such, by virtue of their relation to Abraham according to the flesh, are not therefore the children of God, for then Ishmael had put in a good claim. This remark comes home to the understanding of their rejection of the children of God, and looked for justification in a fleshly way, by these carnal ordinances which Christ had abolished. They had confidence in the flesh, Phil. 3. 3.

Ishmael was a child of the flesh, conceived by Hagar, that was young, and fresh, and likely enough to have children; there was nothing extraordinary in his conception, as there was in Isaac's; he was born after the flesh, (Gal. 4.) representing those that expect justification and salvation by their own strength and righteousness.

(2.) That the children of the promise are counted for the seed. Those that have the honour and happiness of being counted for the seed, have it not for the sake of any merit or desert of their own, but purely by virtue of the promise, in which God hath declared his purpose to grant the promised favour. Isaac was a child of the promise; that he proves, v. 9, quoted from Gen. 18. 10. He was a child promised; (so were many others;) but he was conceived and born by force and virtue of the promise, and so a proper type and figure of those who are now counted for the seed, even true believers, who are born, not of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God; of the incorruptible seed, even the word of the promise; by virtue of the special promise of a new heart: see Gal. 4. 20. It was through faith that Isaac was conceived, Heb. 11. 11. Thus were the great mysteries of salvation taught under the Old Testament, not in express words, but by significant types and dispensations of providence, which to them then were not so clear as they are to us now, when the veil is taken away, and these types are explained by the antecedent.

2. In the case of Jacob and Esau, (v. 10-13.) which is much stronger, to shew that the carnal seed of Abraham were not, as such, interested in the promise, but only such of them as God in sovereignty had appointed. There was a previous difference between Ishmael and Isaac, before Ishmael was cast out: Ishmael was the son of the bond-woman, born long before Isaac was, who became Isaac; to all which it might be supposed God had regard, when he appointed Abraham to cast him out. But in the case of Jacob and Esau, it was neither so nor so, they were both the sons of Isaac by one mother: they were conceived, one conception;

the difference was made between them by the divine counsel, before they were born, or had done any good or evil. They lay struggling alike in their mother’s womb, when it was said, The elder shall serve the younger; without respect to good or bad works done or foreseen; that the purpose of God according to election might stand; that this great truth was established, that God chooses some, and hates others, as a free agent; by his own absolute and sovereign will, dispensing his favours, or withholding them as he pleases.

This difference, that was put between Jacob and Esau, he further illustrates by a quotation from Mal. 1. 2, 3. where it is said, not of Jacob and Esau the persons, but the Edomites and Israelites their posterity; Jacob he prevails, and Esau have I hated. The people of Israel were taken into the covenant of peculiarity, had the land of Canaan given them, were blessed with the more signal appearances of God for them in special protections, supplies, and deliverances, while the Edomites were rejected, had no temple, altar, priests, or prelates; no such particular care taken of them, or kindness shewed to them. Such a difference did God put not only between two nations, but both denominations from the lots of Abraham and Isaac; as at first there was a difference put between Jacob and Esau, the distinguishing heads of these two nations. So that all this choosing and refusing was typical, and intended to shadow forth some other election and rejection.

(1.) Some understand it of the election and rejection of conditions or qualifications. As God chose Isaac and Jacob, and Esau and Ishmael, so he might and did choose to be the condition of salvation, and reject the works of the law. Thus Arminius understands it, De rejecto et assumptis tabulis, certa qualitate notatis—Concerning such as are rejected and such as are chosen, being distinguished by appropriate qualities; so John Goodwin. But this very much strains the scripture; for the apostle speaks all along of persons, he has mercy on whom, he has mercy on whom, what kind of people, he will have mercy. Beside that against this sense, those two objections, (v. 14, 19.) do not at all arise; and his answer to them concerning God’s absolute sovereignty over the children of men, is not at all pertinent, if no more be meant than his appointing the conditions of salvation.

(2.) Others understand it of the election and rejection of particular persons; some loved, and others hated, from eternity. But the apostle speaks of Jacob and Esau, not in their own persons, but as ancestors; Jacob the people, and Esau the people; nor does God condemn any, or decree so to do, merely because he will do it, without any reason taken from their own deserts.

(3.) Others therefore understand it of the election and rejec-tion of particular persons considered complex. His design is to justify God, and his mercy and truth, in calling the Gentiles, and taking them into the church, and into covenant with himself, while he suffered the obstinate part of the Jews to persist in unbelief, and so to unchurch themselves: thus hiding from their eyes the things that belonged to their peace.

The apostle’s reasoning for the explication and proof of this, is, however, very applicable to, and no doubt, an instance, in scripture, a case intended for, the clearing, of the methods of God’s grace towards particular persons; for the communication of saving benefits bears some analogy to the communication of church-privileges.

The choice of Jacob the younger, and preferring him before Esau the elder, (as crossing hands,) were intended to intimate, that the Jews, though the natural seed of Abraham, and the first-born of the church, should be laid aside; and the Gentiles, who were as the younger brother, should be taken in in their stead, and have the birthright and blessing.

The Jews, considered as a body politic, a nation and people knit together by the bond and cement of the ceremonial law, the temple and priesthood, the centre of their unity, had for many ages been the darlings and favourites of heaven, a kingdom of priests, a holy nation, dignified and distinguished by God’s miraculous appearances among them and for them. Now that the gospel was preached, and Christian churches planted, this national body was thereby abandoned, their church-polity dissolved, and Christian churches (and in process of time, Christian nations) embodied in like manner, become their successors in the divine favour, and those special privileges and protections which were the peculiarities of that favour. To clear up the justice of God in this great dispensation, is the scope of the apostle here.

15. For he saith to Moses, I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy, and I will have compassion on whom I will have compassion. 16. So then it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that sheweth mercy. 17. For the scripture saith unto Pharaoh, Even for this same purpose have I raised thee up, that I might shew my power in thee, and that my name might be declared throughout all the earth. 18. Therefore hath he mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth. 19. Thou wilt say then unto me, Why doth he yet find fault? For who hath resisted his will? 20. Nay but, O man, who art thou that repliest against God? Shalt the thing formed say to him that formed it, Why hast thou made me thus? 21. Hath not the potter power over the clay, of the same lump to make one vessel unto honour, and another unto dishonour? 22. What if God, willing to shew his wrath, and to make his power known, endured with much long-suffering the vessels of wrath fitted to destruction: 23. And that he might make known the riches of his glory on the vessels of mercy, which he had afore prepared unto glory. 24. Even us, whom he hath called, not of the Jews only, but also of the Gentiles?

The apostle, having asserted the true meaning of the promise, comes here to maintain and prove the absolute sovereignty of God, in disposing of the children of men, with reference to their eternal state. And herein God is to be considered, not as rector and governor, distributing rewards and punishments according to his revealed laws and covenants, but as an owner and benefactor, giving to the children of men such grace and favour as he has determined in and by his secret and eternal will and counsel: both the favour of visible church-membership and privileges, which is given to some people and denied to others, and the favour of effectual grace, which is given to some particular persons and denied to others. Now this part of his discourse is in answer to two objections.

1. It might be objected, Is there unrighteousness with God? If God, in dealing with the children of men, do thus, in an arbitrary manner, choose some and refuse others, may it not be suspected, that there is unrighteousness with him? This the apostle startles at the thought of; God forbid! Far be it from us to think such a thing; shall not the judge of all the earth do right? Gen. 18. 25. ch. 5. 5, 6.

He denies the consequences, and proves the denial.

1. In respect of those to whom he shews mercy, v. 15, 16. He quotes that scripture, to shew God's sovereignty in dispensing his favours, (Exod. 33. 19.) I will be gracious to whom I will be gracious. All God's reasons of mercy are taken from within himself. All the children of men being plunged alike into a state of sin and misery, equally under guilt and wrath, God, in a way of sovereignty, picks out some from this fallen apostatized race, to be vessels of grace and glory. He dispenses his gifts to whom he will, without giving us any reason: according to his own good pleasure he pitches upon some to be the objects of his grace, of preventing grace, of effectual grace, while he passes by others. The expression is very emphatical, and the repetition makes it more so; I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy. It imports a perfect absoluteness in God's will; he will do what he will, and giveth not account of any of his matters, nor is it fit he should. As these great words, I am that I am, (Exod. 3. 14.) do abundantly express the absolute independency of his being; so these words, I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy, do as fully express the absolute prerogative and sovereignty of his will.

To vindicate the righteousness of God, in shewing mercy to whom he will, the apostle appeals to that which God himself had spoken, wherein he claims this sovereign power and liberty. God is a competent judge, even in his own case. Whatever God does, or is capable to do, is both by the one and the other proved to be just. Saves he infers, (v. 16.) It is not of him that willeth. Whatever good comes from God to man, the glory of it is not to be ascribed to the most generous desire, or to the most industrious endeavour, of man, but only and purely to the free grace and mercy of God. In Jacob's case, it was not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth; it was not the earnest will and desire of Rebecca, that Jacob might have the blessing; it was not Jacob's haste to get it, (for he was far to run for it,) that procured him the blessing, but only the mercy and grace of God. Wherein the holy happy people of God differ from other people, it is God and his grace that makes them differ.

Applying this general rule to the particular case that Paul has before him; the reason why the unworthy, undeserving, ill-deserving Gentiles are called, and grafted into the church, while the greatest part of the Jews are left to perish in unbelief, is not because those Gentiles were better deserving, or better disposed for such a favour, but because of God's free grace that made that difference. The Gentiles did neither will it, nor ran for it, for they were in darkness, Matt. 4. 16. In darkness, therefore we are willing what they knew not; sitting in darkness, a contented posture, therefore not running to meet it, but prevented with these invaluable blessings of goodness. Such is the method of God's grace towards all that partake of it, for he is found of them that sought him not; (Isa. 65. 1.) in this preventing, effectual, distinguishing grace, he acts as a benefactor, whose grace is his own. Our eye therefore must not be evil, because his is good; but of all the grace that God bestows upon any other, he must have the glory: Not unto us, Ps. 115. 1.

2. In respect of those who perish, v. 17. God's sovereignty, manifested in the ruin of sinners, is here discovered in the instance of Pharaoh; it is quoted from Exod. 9. 16. Observe,

(1.) What God did with Pharaoh; he raised him up, brought him into the world, made him, famous, gave him the kingdom and power; set him up as a beacon to him, and showed to all the world that he was none of all his pharaohs. (compare Exod. 9. 14.) hardened his heart, as he had said he would; (Exod. 4. 21.) I will harden his heart, that is, withdraw softening grace, leave him to himself, let Satan loose against him, and lay hardening providences before him. Or, by raising him up, may be meant the intermission of the plagues which gave Pharaoh respite, and the re-prieve of Pharaoh in those plagues. In the Hebrew, I will raise him up, or I will stand, continued thee yet in the land of the living.

Thus doth God raise up sinners, make them for himself, even for the day of evil, (Prov. 16. 4.) raise them up in outward prosperity, external privileges, (Matt. 11. 23.) sparing mercies.

(2.) What he designed in it; That I might shew my power in thee. God would, by all this, serve the honour of his name, and manifest his power in having the power and glory of that great and daring tyrant, who bid defiance to heaven itself, and trampled upon all that was just and sacred. If Pharaoh had not been so high and mighty, so bold and hearty, the power of God had not been so illustrious in the ruining of him; but the taking off of the spirit of such a prince, who hectored at that rate, did indeed proclaim God glorious in holiness, fearful in praises, doing wonders, Exod. 15. 11. This is Pharaoh, and all his multitude.

(3.) His conclusion concerning both these we have, v. 18. He hath mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth. The various dealings of God, by which he makes some to differ from others, must be resolved into his absolute sovereignty. He is debtor to no man, his grace is his own, and he may give it or withhold it as it pleaseth him. If God have not disposed of us as he pleased, in the hour of his dear son, we have all justly forbfited it a thousand times; so that herein the work of our salvation is admirably well ordered, that those who are saved, must thank God only, and those who perish must thank themselves only, Hos. 13. 9.

We are bound, as God hath bound us, to do our utmost for the salvation of all we have to do with; but God is bound no further than he has been pleased to do with himself by his own covenant and promise, which is his revealed will; and that is, that he will receive, and not cast out, those that came to Christ; but the drawing of souls in order to that coming, is a preventing, distinguishing favour to whom he will. Had he mercy on the Gentiles? It was because he would have mercy on them. Were the Jews hardened? It was because it was his own pleasure to deny them softening grace, and to give them up to their chosen, affected unbelief. Even so, Father, because it seemed good unto thee. That scripture excellently explains this, Luke 10. 21. and, as this, shows the sovereign will of God, in giving or withholding both the means of grace, and the effectual blessing upon those means.

II. It might be objected, Why doth he yet find fault? For who hath resisted his will? v. 19. Had the apostle been arguing only for God's sovereignty, in appointing and ordering the terms and conditions of acceptance and salvation, there had not been the least colour for this objection; for he might well find fault, if people refuse to come up to the terms on which such a salvation is offered; the salvation being so great, the terms could not be hard. But there might be colour for the objection, against his arguing for the sovereignty of God in giving and withholding differing and preventing grace; and the objection was advanced against the doctrine of distinguishing grace.
If God, while he gives effectual grace to some, denies it to others, why doth he find fault with those to whom he denies it? If he hath rejected the Jews, and hid from their eyes the things that belong to their peace, why doth he find fault with them for their blindness?
If it be his pleasure to discard them as not a people, and not obtaining mercy, their Knocking off themselves was no resistance of his will.

This objection he answers at large,
1. By reproving the objector; v. 20. Nay but, O man. This is not an objection fit to be made by the creature against his Creator, by man against God. The truth, as it is in Jesus, is that which vabases man as nothing, less than nothing, and ad-ances God as sovereign Lord of all. Observe how closely this man, when he comes to argue with God his Maker; 1 Who art thou, thou that art so foolish, so feeble, so short-sighted, so incompetent a judge of the divine counsels; art thou able to fathom such a depth, dispute such a case, to trace that way of God which is in the sea, his path in the great waters?

That refutes against God? It becomes us to submit to him, not to reply against him; to lie down under his will, not to fly in his face, or to charge him with folly.

O ὧν ἦσαν ἐχθροὶ Μωυσῆς—That answereth again. God is our master, and we are his servants; and it does not become servants to answer again, Tit. 2. 9.

2. By resolving all into the divine sovereignty.
We are the thing formed, and he is the former;
and it does not become us to challenge or arraign his wisdom in ordering and disposing of us into this or that form. Observe how he answers to the mass of matter hath no right to this or that form, but is shaped at the pleasure of him that formeth it.

God's sovereignty over us is fitly illustrated by the power that the potter hath over the clay; compare Jer. 18. 6, where, by a like comparison, God asserts his dominion over the nation of the Jews, when he was about to magnify his justice in their destruction by Nebuchadnezzar.

1. He gives us the comparison, v. 21. The potter, out of the same lump, may make either a fashionable vessel, and a vessel fit for creditable and honourable uses, or a contemptible vessel, and a vessel in which is no pleasure; and herein he acts arbitrarily, as he might have chosen whether he would have made any vessel of it at all, but have left it in the hole of the pit, out of which it was digged.

2. The application of the comparison, v. 22-24.
Two sorts of vessels God forms out of the great lump of fallen mankind.

1.] Vessels of wrath; vessels filled with wrath, as a vessel of wine is a vessel filled with wine; full of the fury of the Lord, Is. 51. 20. In these God is willing to shew his wrath, that is, his punishing justice, and his enmity to sin. This must be shewn to all the world, God will make it appear that he hates sin. He will likewise make his power known, πονεῖν καὶ ἀπειράσασθαι. It is a power of strength and energy, an inflicting power, which works and effects the destruction of those that perish; it is a destruction that proceeds from the glory of his power, 2 Thess. 1. 9. The eternal damnation of sinners will be an abundant demonstration of the power of God;
for he will act in it himself, immediately, his wrath, preeing as it were upon guilty consciences, and his arm stretched out totally to destroy their well-being, and yet at the same instant wonderfully to preserve the being of the creature.

In order to this, God endured them with much tongue-suffering; exercised a great deal of patience toward them, let them alone, to fill up the measure of sin, to grow till they were ripe for ruin, and so they became fitted for destruction, fitted by their own sin, and self-hardening. The reigning compositions and wickedness of the soul are its preparedness and dispossession for hell: a soul is hereby made combustible matter, fit for the flames of hell.

When Christ said to the Jews, (Matt. 23. 32.)
Fill ye up then the measure of your fathers, that upon you may come all the righteous blood, (v. 33.)
he did, as it were, endure them with much long-suffering, that they might, by their own obstinacy and willfulness in sin, fit themselves for destruction.

2.] Vessels of mercy; filled with mercy. The happiness bestowed upon the saved remnant, is the fruit, not of their merit, but of God's mercy. The spring of all their joy and glory of heaven, is, that mercy of God which endures for ever. Vessels of mercy must to eternity own themselves vessels of mercy. Observe,

First, What he designs in them; to make known the riches of his glory, that is, of his goodness; for God's goodness is his greatest glory, especially when it is communicated with the greatest sovereignty.
I beseech thee shew me thy glory, said Moses, Exod.
33. 18. I will make all my goodness to pass before thee, said God, (v. 19,) and that given out freely; I will be gracious to whom I will be gracious.

God makes known his glory, this goodness of his,
in the preservation and supply of all the creatures;
the earth is full of his goodness, and the year crowned with it; but when he would demonstrate the riches of his goodness, unsearchable riches, he does it in the salvation of the saints, that will be to eternity glorious monuments of divine grace.

Secondly, What he does for them; he does before all: foreknowledge is the cause. Sanctification is the preparation of the soul for glory, as a vessel is prepared to take part of the inheritance of the saints in light.
This is God's work; we can destroy ourselves fast enough, but we cannot save ourselves; sinners fit themselves for hell, but it is God that prepares saints for heaven: and all these that God designs for heaven hereafter, he prepares and fits for heaven now.

He works them to the self-same thing, 2 Cor.
5. 5.

And would you know who these vessels of mercy are? Those whom he hath called; (v. 24,) for whom he did predestinate, them he also called with an effectual call: and these not of the Jews only, but of the Gentiles; for the partition-wall being taken down, the world was laid in common; and not, as it had been, God's favour appropriated to the Jews, and they put a decree nearer his acceptance than the rest of the world; they now stood upon the same level with the Gentiles; and the question is not now, whether of the seed of Abraham or no, that is neither here nor there, but whether or no called according to his purpose.

25. As he saith also in Osee, I will call them my people, which were not my people; and her beloved, who was not beloved.

26. And it shall come to pass, that in the place where it was said unto them, Ye are not my people; there shall they be called the children of the living God. 27. Esaia also crieth concerning Israel. Though the number of the children of Israel be as the sand of the sea, a remnant shall be saved: 28. For he will finish the work, and cut it short in righteousness: because a short work will the Lord make upon the earth. 29. And as Esaia said before, Except the Lord of Sabaoth had left us a seed, we had been as Sodoma, and been made like unto Gomorrah.

Having explained the promise, and proved the divine sovereignty, the apostle here shews how the rejection of the Jews, and the taking in of the Gentiles, were foretold in the Old Testament, and therefore must needs be very well consistent with the promise made to the fathers under the Old Testament. It tends very much to the clearing of a truth, to observe how the scripture is fulfilled in it. The Jews would, no doubt, willingly refer it to the Old Testament, the scriptures of which were committed to them: now he shews how this, which was so un­easy to them, was there spoken of.

I. By the prophet Hosea, who speaks of the taking in of a great many of the Gentiles, Hos. 2. 23. and Hos. 14. 4. This will he shew the people of God; not owning him, or owned by him in that relation: "But," says he, "I will call them my people, make them such, and own them as such, notwithstanding all their unworthiness." A blessed change! Former goodness is no bar to God's present grace and mercy. And her beloved, which was not beloved. Those that God calls his people, he calls beloved: he loves those that are his own.

And lest it might be supposed that they should become God's people only by being pro­sected by the Jewish religion, and made members of that nation, he adds, from Hos. 1. 10. In the place where it was said, &c. there shall they be called. They need not be embodied with the Jews, nor go up to Jerusalem to worship; but wherever they are scattered over the face of the earth, there will God own them. Observe the great dignity and honour of the saints, that they are called the children of the living God; and his calling them so makes them so. Behold, what manner of love! This honour have all his saints.

II. By the prophet Isaiah, who speaks of the casting off of many of the Jews, in two places.

1. One is Isa. 10. 22, 23. which speaks of the saving of a remnant, that is, but a remnant; which, though in the prophecy it seems to refer to the pres­ervation of a remnant from the destruction and desolation that were coming upon them by Sennacherib and his army, yet is to be understood as looking further; and sufficiently proves that it is no strange thing for God to abandon to ruin a great many of the seed of Abraham, and yet maintain his word of promise to Abraham in full force and virtue. This is intimated in the supposition, that the number of the children of the remnant, as of the sand of the sea, which was part of the promise made to Abraham, Gen. 22. 17. And yet only a remnant shall be saved; for many are called, but few are chosen.

In this salvation of the remnant we are told, (v. 28.) from the prophet, (1.) That he will complete the work; He will finish the work. When God begins, he will make an end, whether in ways of judgment, or of mercy. The rejection of the un­believing Jews, God would finish in their utter ruin by the Romans, who soon after this quite took away their place and nation. The assuming of christian churches into the divine favour, and the spreading of the gospel in other nations, was a work which God would likewise finish, and be known by his name in it. As for God, his work is perfect. Margin, He will finish the account. God, in his eternal counsels, has taken an account of the children of men, allotted them to such or such a condition, to such a share of privileges; and as they come into being, his dealings with them are pursuant to these counsels: and he will finish the account, complete the mystical body, call in as many as belong to the election of grace; and then the account will be finished. (2.) That he will contrive it; not only finish it, but finish it quickly. Under the Old Testament he seemed to tarry, and to make a longer and more tedious work of it; the wheels moved but slowly toward the extent of the church; but now he will cut it short, and make a short work upon the earth. Gentle converts were now flying as a cloud. But he will cut it short in righteousness, both in wisdom and in justice. Men, when they cut short, do amiss; they do indeed dispatch causes; but when God cuts short, it is always in righteousness. So the fathers generally apply it. Some un­derstand of it the evangelical law and covenant, which Christ has introduced and established in the world: he has in that finished the work, put an end to the types and ceremonies of the Old Testament. Christ said, It is finished, and then the veil was rent, echoing as it were to the word that Christ said upon the cross. (v. 26.) It is short, the work (it is kairos—the word, the law) was under the Old Testament very long; a long train of institutions, ceremonies, conditions: but now it is cut short; our duty is now, under the gospel, summed up in much less room than it was under the law; the covenant was abridged and contracted; religion is brought into a less compass. And it is in righteousness, in favour to us, in justice to his own design and counsel. With us contradictions darken things;

—Breviss esse laboro,

Obs. (1.) What God is. He is the Lord of sabaoth, the Lord of hosts; a Hebrew word retained in the Greek, as James 5. 4. All the host of heaven and earth are at his beck and disposal. When God secures a seed to himself out of a degenerate, apostate world, he acts as Lord of sabaoth. It is an act of almighty power and infinite sovereignty.

(2.) What his people are; they are a seed, a small number. The true root of the vine, the vine's seedlings, is but little, compared with that which is spent and eaten. But they are a useful number; the seed, the substance, of the next generation, Isa. 6. 13.

It is so far from being an impeachment of the justice and righteousness of God, that so many perish and are destroyed, that it is a wonder of divine power and mercy that all are not destroyed. Though there are any saved: for even those that are left to be a seed, if God had dealt with them according to their sins, had perished with the rest. This is the great truth which this scripture teacheth us.
30. What shall we say then? That the Gentiles, which follow not after righteousness, have attained to righteousness, even the righteousness which is of faith. 31. But Israel, which followed after the law of righteousness, hath not attained to the law of righteousness. 32. Wherefore? Because they sought it not by faith, but as it were by the works of the law. For they stumbled at that stumbling-stone; 33. As it is written, Behold, I lay in Sion a stumbling-stone and rock of offence: and whosoever believeth on him shall not be ashamed.

The apostle comes here at last to fix the true reason of the reception of the Gentiles, and the rejection of the Jews. There was a difference in the way of their seeking, and therefore there was that different success; though still it was the free grace of God that made them differ. He concludes like an apostle, that the apostle is the stumbling-stone, and that faith is the rock of salvation. There is no other way of salvation but through Christ, and he concludes therefore that they were justified, who were justified by faith alone.

The conclusion of the whole dispute?

1. Concerning the Gentiles, observe,

1. How they had been alienated from righteousness; they followed not after it; they knew not their guilt and misery, and therefore were not at all solicitous to procure a remedy. In their conversion, preventing grace was greatly magnified; God was found of them that sought him not, Isa. 65. 1. There was nothing in them to dispose them for such favour, more than what free grace wrought in them. Thus doth God delight to dispense grace in a way of sovereignty and absolute dominion.

2. How they attained to righteousness, notwithstanding; by faith; not by being proselyted to the Jewish religion, and submitting to the ceremonial law, but by embracing Christ, and believing in Christ, and submitting to the gospel. They attained to that by the short cut of believing sincerely in Christ, which the Jews had been long in vain beating about the bush for.

II. Concerning the Jews, observe,

1. How they missed their end; they followed after the law of righteousness; (v. 31.) they talked much of justification and holiness, seemed very ambitious of being the people of God, and the favourites of heaven, but they did not attain to it, that is, they never attained to it, as many as stuck to their old Jewish principles and ceremonies, and pursued a happiness in those observances, embracing the shadows now that the substance was come, these fell short of acceptance with God, were not owned as his people, nor went to their house justified.

2. How they mistook their way, which was the cause of their missing the end, v. 32, 33. They sought after the light way, not in the humble, blinding way, not in the appointed way. Not by faith, not by embracing the Christian religion, and depending upon the merit of Christ, and submitting to the terms of the gospel, which were the very life and end of the law.

But they sought by the works of the law; as if they were to expect justification by their observance of the precepts and ceremonial of the law, as the stumbling-stone at which they stumbled. They could not get over this corrupt principle which they had espoused. That law was given them for no end but that merely by their observance of it, and obedience to it, they might be justified before God; and so they could by no means be reconciled to the doctrine of Christ, which brought them off from that, to expect justification through his merit and satisfaction of another. Christ himself is to some a stone of stumbling, for which he quotes Isa. 8. 14.—28. 16. It is said that Christ should be set for the fall of any, and yet it is so; Luke 2. 34. That every person who shall be sucked out of the Balm of Gilead, that the foundation should be to any a stone of stumbling, and the rock of salvation a rock of offence; he is to multitudes; so he was to the unbelieving Jews, who rejected him, because he put an end to the ceremonial law. But still there is a remnant that do believe on him; and they shall not be ashamed, their hopes and expectations of justification by him shall not be disappointed, as their sires, who expected by the law.

So that, upon the whole, the unbelieving Jews have no reason to quarrel with God for rejecting them; they had a fair offer of righteousness, and life, and salvation, made them upon gospel-terms, which they did not like, and would not come up to; and therefore if they perish, they may thank themselves; their blood is upon their own heads.

CHAP. X.

The dissolving of the peculiar church-state of the Jews, and the rejection of the Jewish nation, is here by the apostle illustrated by the ceremonial law; the vacating of all the institutions of it, the abolishing of their priesthood, the burning of their temple, and the taking away of their place and nation, and in their room the setting up of a new order, and erecting of a catholic church-state among the Gentile nations; though in these things are long since done and completed, they may seem no great matter; yet to them who lived when they were doing, who knew how high the Jews had stood in God's favour, and how deplorable the condition of the Gentile world had been for many ages, it appeared very great and marvellous, and a mystery hard to be understood. The apostle, in this chapter, as in the foregoing and that which follows, is explaining and proving it; but with several very useful digressions, which a little interrupt the thread of his discourse. To two great truths I would reduce this chapter: 1. That there is a great difference between the righteousness of the law, which the unbelieving Jews were wedded to, and the righteousness of faith offered in the gospel, v. 1. 11. II. That there is no difference between Jews and Gentiles; but in point of justification and acceptance with God, the gospel sets them both upon the same level, v. 12, to the end.

1. BRETHREN, my heart's desire and prayer to God for Israel, is, that they might be saved. 2. For I bear them record that they have a zeal of God, but not according to knowledge. 3. For they, being ignorant of God's righteousness, and going about to establish their own righteousness, have not submitted themselves unto the righteousness of God. 4. For Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth. 5. For Moses describeth the righteousness which is of the law, That the man which doeth those things shall live by them. 6. But the righteousness which is of faith speaketh on this wise, Say not in thine heart, Who shall ascend into heaven? (that is, to bring Christ down from above :) 7. Or, Who shall descend into the deep? (that is, to bring up Christ again from the dead.) 8. But what saith it? The word is nigh thee, even in thy mouth, and in thy heart, that is, the word of faith, which we preach; 9. That if thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved. 10.
For with the heart man believeth unto righteousness; and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation. 11. For the scripture saith, Whosoever believeth on him shall not be ashamed.

The scope of the apostle in this part of the chapter is to shew the vast difference between the righteousness of the law and the righteousness of faith, and the great pre-eminence of the righteousness of faith above that of the law; that he might induce and persuade the Jews to believe in Christ, aggravate the folly and sin of those that refused, and justify God in the rejection of such refusers.

1. Paul here professes his good affection to the Jews, with the reason of it; (v. 1, 2.) where he gives them a good wish, and a good witness.

1. A good wish; (v. 1.) a wish that they might be saved; saved from the temporality of and destruction that were coming upon them; saved from the wrath to come, eternal wrath, which was hanging over their heads. It is implied in this wish, that they might be convinced and converted; he could not pray in faith, that they might be saved in their unbelief.

Though Paul preached against them, yet he prayed for them; herein he is not contrary to the Gospel and who is not willing that any should perish, (2 Pet. 3. 9.) desires not the death of sinners. It is our duty truly and earnestly to desire the salvation of the souls of others, next to the salvation of our own. This, he says, was his heart's desire and prayer: which intimates,

(1.) The strength and sincerity of his desire; it was his heart's desire; it was not a formal compliment, as good wishes are with many from the outward, but a real desire. This it was, before it was his prayer. The soul of prayer is the heart's desire. Cold desires do but beg denials: we must even breathe out our souls in every prayer.

(2.) The offering up of this desire to God. It was not only his heart's desire, but it was his prayer. There may be desires in the heart, and yet no prayer, unless those desires be presented to God. Whining and wounding, if that be all, are not praying.

2. A good witness, as a reason of his good wish; (v. 2.) I bear them record, that they have a zeal of God. The unbelieving Jews were the most bitter enemies Paul had in the world, and yet Paul gives them as good a character as the truth would bear. We should say the best we can even of our worst enemies; this is blessing them that curse us. Charity teaches us to have the best opinion of persons, and to put the best construction upon words and actions, that they will bear. We should take notice of that which is commendable even in bad people. They have a zeal of God. Their opposition to the gospel is from a principle of respect to the law, which they knew to have come from God. There is such a thing as blind misguided zeal: such was that of the Jews, who, when they hated Christ's people, and ministers, and cast them out, said, Let the Lord be glorified; (Isa. 66. 5.) nav, they killed them, and thought they did God good service, John 16. 2.

II. He here shews the fatal mistake that the unbelieving Jews were guilty of; which was their ruin. Their zeal was not according to knowledge. It is true, God has given that law which they were so zealous for; but they might have known that, by the appearance of the promised Messiah, an end was put to it. He introduced a new religion and way of worship, to which the former must give place: he proved himself the Son of God, gave the most convincing evidence that could be of his being the Messiah; and yet they did not know, and would not own him, but shut their eyes against the clear light, so that their zeal for the law was blind. This he shews further, v. 3. where we may observe,

1. The nature of their unbelief; they have not submitted themselves to the righteousness of God, they have not yielded to gospel-terms, nor accepted of the tender of justification by faith in Christ, which is made in the gospel. Unbelief is a non-submission to the righteousness of God, standing it out against the gospel-proclamation of indemnity. Have not all the Gentiles sinned? in true faith, there is need of a great deal of submission; therefore the first lesson Christ teaches, is, to deny ourselves. It is a great piece of condescension for a proud heart to be content to be beholden to free grace; we are loath to see sub forma, as pautier.

2. The causes of their unbelief, and those are two.

(1.) Ignorance of God's righteousness. They did not consider, and believe, and consider, the strict justice of God, in hating and punishing sin, and demanding satisfaction; did not consider what need we have of a righteousness, wherein to appear before him; if they had, they would never have stood out against the gospel-offer, nor expected justification by their own works, as if they could satisfy God's justice. Or, being ignorant of God's way of justification, which he has now appointed, and required of them, that they might appear in the presence of Christ, because they would not, they shut their eyes against the discoveries of it, and loved darkness rather.

(2.) A proud conceit of their own righteousness; going about to establish their own, a righteousness of their own devising, and of their own working out, by the merit of their works, and by their observance of the ceremonial law. They thought they needed not to be beholden to the merit of Christ, and therefore depended upon their own performances as sufficient to make up a righteousness wherein to appear before God. They could not with Paul disclaim a dependence upon this, (Phil. 3. 9.) Not having mine own righteousness. See an instance of this pride in the Pharisee, Luke 18. 10, 11. Compare v. 14.

III. He here shews the folly of that mistake, and what an unreasonable thing it was for them to be seeking justification by the works of the law, now Christ is come. It is brought in an everlasting righteousness; considering

1. The suberviency of the law to the gospel; (v. 4.) Christ is the end of the law for righteousness. The design of the law was to lead people to Christ. The moral law was but for the searching of the wound; the ceremonial law for the shadowing forth of the remedy; but Christ is the end of both; see Con. 3. 7. and compare Gal. 5. 23, 24. The use of the law was to direct people for righteousness to Christ.

Christ is the end of the ceremonial law; he is the period of it, because he is the perfection of it. When the substance comes, the shadow is gone. The sacrifices and offerings and purifications appointed under the Old Testament, prefigured Christ, and pointed at him; and their inability to take away sin disproved the necessity of that sacrifice, that should, by being once offered, take away sin.

Christ is the end of the moral law, in that he did that which the law could not do, (ch. 8. 3.) and secured the great end of it.

The end of the law was to bring men to perfect obedience, and so to obtain justification; this is now become impossible, by reason of the power of sin, and the corruption of nature: but Christ is the end of the law; the law is not destroyed, nor the intention of the lawgiver frustrated; but full satisfaction being made by the death of Christ for our breach of the law, the end is attained, and we put in another way of justification. Christ is thus the end of the law for righteousness, for justification.
but it is only to every one that believeth; upon our believing, our humble consent to the terms of the gospel, we become interested in Christ's satisfaction, and so are justified through the redemption that is in Jesus.

1. The excellency of the gospel above the law. This he proves, by shewing the different constitution of these two.

(1.) What is the righteousness which is of the law?

This he shews, v. 5. The tenor of it is, Do, and live. Though it direct us to a better and more effectual righteousness in Christ, yet in itself, considered as a law, abstracted from its respect to Christ and the gospel, (for the unbelieving Jews esteemed it not) it was no righteousness sufficient to justify a man, but that of perfect obedience. For this he quotes that scripture, (Lev. 18. 5.) Ye shall therefore keep my statutes, and my judgements, which if a man do, he shall live in them. To this he refers likewise, Gal. 3. 12. The man that doeth them, shall live in them.

Love, that is, be happy, not only in the land of Canaan, but in heaven, of which Canaan was a type and figure. The doing supposed, must be perfect and sinless, without the least breach or violation. The law which was given upon mount Sinai, though it was not a pure covenant of works, (for who then could be saved under that dispensation?) yet, that it might be the more effectual to drive people to Christ, and to make the covenant of grace welcome, it had a very great mixture of the strictness and terror of the covenant of works; it we create to ourselves such cross and cruel evidence of Christ and the gospel than there was in the first giving of the law: he quotes it from Deut. 30. 11—14. and shews,

[1.] That it is not at all hard or difficult. The way of justification and salvation has in it no such depths or knots as may discourage us, no insuperable difficulties attending it: but, as was foretold, it is a high-way, Isa. 35. 8. We are not put to climb so high in heaven; we are not put to dive for it, it is not in the deep.

First, We need not go to heaven, to search the records there, or to inquire into the secrets of the divine counsel. It is true, Christ is in heaven; but we may be justified and saved without going thither, to fetch him thence, or sending a special messenger to him.

Secondly, We need not go to the deep, to fetch Christ out of the grave, or from the state of the dead; Into the deep, to bring up Christ from the dead. This plainly shews that Christ's descent into the deep, or into sin, was no more than his going into the state of the dead, in allusion to Jonah. It is true, Christ was in the grave, and it is as true, that he is now i., heaven: but we need not perplex and puzzle ourselves with fancied difficulties, nor much meditate over the deep and deep ideas of these things, as if the method of salvation was impracticable, and the design of the revelation was only to amuse us. No, salvation is not put at so vast a distance from us.

[2.] But it is very plain and easy; The word is nigh thee. When we speak of looking upon Christ, and receiving Christ, and feeding upon Christ, it is not Christ in heaven, nor Christ in the deep, that we mean; but Christ in the promise, Christ exhibited to us, and offered, in the word. Christ is nigh thee, for the word is nigh thee: nigh thee indeed: it is in thy mouth, and in thy heart; there is no difficulty in understanding, believing, and owning of it. The work thou hast to do, lies within thee: the kingdom of God is within you, Luke 17. 21. Hence thou must fetch thy evidences, not out of the records of heaven. It is, that is, it is promised that it shall be, in thy mouth, (Isa. 59. 21.) and in thy heart, Jer. 31. 33. All that which is to be done for us, is already done to our hands. Christ is come down from heaven, we need not go to fetch him. He is come up from the deep, we need not perplex ourselves how to bring him up. There is nothing now to be done, but a work in us; that must be our care, to look upon Christ, and receive him.

Those that were under the law, were to do all themselves, Do this, and live; but the gospel discovers the greatest of the work done already, and what remains cut short in righteousness; salvation offered upon very plain and easy terms, brought to our door, as it were, in the word which is nigh us. It is in our mouth, we are reading it daily; it is in our heart, we are meditating it daily. Even the word of faith, the gospel and the promise of it; called the word of faith. First, Because it is the object of faith about which it is conversant, the word which we believe. Secondly, Because it is the precept of faith, commanding it, and making it the great condition of justification. Thirdly, Because it is the ordinary means by which faith is wrought and conveyed.

Now what is this word of faith? We have the tenor of it, v. 9, 10. the sum of the gospel, which is plain and easy enough. Observe,

1. What is promised to us; Thou shalt be saved. It is salvation that the gospel exhibits and tenders. Saved from guilt and wrath, with the salvation of the soul, an eternal salvation, which Christ is the author of, a Saviour to the uttermost.

2. Upon what terms. Two things are required as conditions to salvation, viz. Confessing the Lord Jesus; openly professing relation to him and dependence on him, as our Prince and Saviour; owning christianity in the face of all the allurements and affrightments of this world, standing by him in all weathers. Our Lord Jesus lays a great stress upon this confessing of him before men, see Matt. 10. 32, 33. It is the product of many graces, evidences a great deal of self-denial, love to Christ, and a great degree of courage and resolution. It was a very great thing, especially, when the profession of Christ and christianity hazardous estate, honour, preferment, liberty, life, and all that is dear in this world; which was the case in the primitive times.

(2.) Believing in the heart, that God raised him from the dead. The profession of faith with the mouth, if there be, or should ever be, in the heart, is but a mockery; the root of it must be laid in an unfeigned assent to the revelation of the gospel concerning Christ, especially concerning his resurrection, which is the fundamental article of the christian faith; for thereby he was declared to be the Son of God with power, and full evidence was given, that God accepted his satisfaction.

This is further illustrated, (v. 10.) and the order inverted, because there must first be faith in the heart, before there can be an acceptable confession with the mouth.

[1.] Concerning faith; it is with the heart that man believeth; which implies more than an assent of the understanding, and takes in the consent of the will, an inward, hearty, sincere and strong consent. It is not believing, (not to be reckoned so,) if it be not with the heart. This is unto righteousness.

There is the righteousness of justification, and the righteousness of sanctification. Faith is to both; it is the condition of our justification, (ch. 5. 1.) and it is the root and spring of our sanctification; in it, it is begun; by it, it is carried on, Acts 15. 9.

2. Concerning profession; it is with the mouth that confession is made; confession to God in prayer and praise; (ch. 15. 6.) confession to men, owning the ways of God before others, especially when we are called to it in a day of persecution. It is fit that God should be honored with the mouth, for he made man's mouth, (Exod. 4. 11.) and at such a time has promised to give his faithful people a mouth and wisdom, Luke 21. 15. It is part of the honour of Christ, that every tongue shall confess, Phil. 2. 11. And this is said to be unto salvation; because it is the performance of the condition of that promise, Matt. 10. 32. Justification by faith lays the foundation of our title to salvation; but by confession we build upon that foundation, and come at last to the full possession of that to which we were entitled.

So that we have here a brief summary of the terms of salvation; and they are very reasonable; in short this, that we must devote, dedicate, and give up, to God, our souls and our bodies; our souls in believing with the heart, and our bodies in confessing with the mouth. This do, and thou shalt live. For this, (v. 11.) he quotes Isa. 28. 16. Whoever believeth on him shall not be ashamed; i.e. to the Gentiles. That is,

First, He will not be ashamed to own that Christ, in whom he trusts; he that believes in the heart, will not be ashamed to confess with the mouth. It is sinful shame that makes people deny Christ, Mark 8. 38. He that believeth, will not make haste; (so the prophet has it;) will not make haste to run away from the sufferings he meets with in the way of his duty; will not be ashamed of a despised religion.

Secondly, He shall not be ashamed of his hope in Christ; he shall not be disappointed of his end. It is our duty that we must not, it is our privilege that we shall not, be ashamed of our faith in Christ. He shall never have cause to repent his confidence in reposing such a trust in the Lord Jesus.

12. For there is no difference between the Jew and the Greek: for the same Lord over all is rich unto all that call upon him.

13. For whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved. 14. How then shall they call on him in whom they have not believed? And how shall they believe in him of whom they have not heard? And how shall they hear without a preacher?

15. And how shall they preach, except they be sent? As it is written, How beautiful are the feet of them that preach the gospel of peace, and bring glad tidings of good things! 16. But they have not all obeyed the gospel. For Esaias saith, Lord, who hath believed our report? 17. So then faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God. 18. But I say, Have they not heard? Yes verily, their sound went into all the earth, and their words unto the ends of the world. 19. But I say, Did not Israel know? First Moses saith, I will provoke you to jealousy by them that are no people, and by a foolish nation I will anger you.

20. But Esaias is very bold, and saith, I was found of them that sought me not: I was made manifest unto them that asked not after me. 21. But to Israel he saith, All day long I have stretched forth my hands unto a disobedient and gainsaying people.

The first words express the design of the apostle through these verses, that there is no difference between Jews and Gentiles, but they stand on the same level in point of acceptance with God. In Jesus Christ there is neither Greek nor Jew, Col. 3. 11. God doth not save any, or reject any, because they are Jews, or because they are Greeks, but doth equally accept both upon gospel-terms. There is no difference.

For the proof of this, he urges two arguments.

I. That God is the same to all; The same Lord over all is rich unto all. There is not one God to the Jews, that is more kind, and another to the Gentiles, that is less kind; but he is the same to all, a common father to all mankind. When he proclaimed his name, The Lord, the Lord God, gracious and merciful, he thereby signified not only what he was to the Jews, but what he is, and will be, to all his creatures that seek unto him: not only good, but richly abounding in goodnes; of prayer; to wherein to supply them all, and he is free and ready to give out to them; he is both able and willing: not only rich, but rich unto us, liberal and bountiful in dispensing his favours, To all that call upon him. Something must be done by us, that we may reap of this bounty; and it is as little as can be, we must call upon him. He will for this be inquired of; (Ezek. 36. 37.) and surely that which is not worth the asking, is not worth the having. We have nothing to do but to draw out by prayer, as there is occasion.

II. That the promise is the same to all; (v. 13.) Whoever shall call; one as well as another, without exception. This extent, this undifferencing extent, of the promise both to Jews and Gentiles he thinks, should not be surprising, for it was foretold by the prophet, Joel 2. 32. Calling upon the name of the Lord is here put for all practical religion. What is the life of a Christian but a life of prayer? It implies a sense of our dependence on him, and entire dedication of ourselves to him, a believing expectation of our all from him. He that exemplifies these things shall be saved. It is but ask and have; what would we have more?

For the further illustration of this, he observes,

1. How necessary it was that the gospel should be preached to the Gentiles, v. 14. 15. This was it that the Lord desired through Paul for, that he was the apostle of the Gentiles, and preached the gospel to them. Now, he shews how needful it was to bring them within the reach of the forementioned promise, an interest in which they should not envy to any of their fellow-creatures.

(1.) They cannot call on him in whom they have not believed. Except they believe that he is God, the will, no interest can be given to prayer. To what purpose should they? The grace of faith is absolutely necessary to the duty of prayer; we cannot pray aright, nor pray to acceptance, without it. He that comes to God by prayer, must believe, Heb. 11. 6. Till they believed the true God, they were calling upon idols, O Baal, hear us.

(2.) They cannot believe in him of whom they have not heard. Some way or other the divine revelation must be made known to us, before we can receive it and assent to it; it is not born with us. In hearing is included reading, which is tantamount, and by which many are brought to believe; (John 20. 31.) These things are written, that you may believe. But hearing only is mentioned, as the more ordinary and natural way of receiving information.
Romans, x.

3. They cannot hear without a preacher; how should they? Somebody must tell them what they are to believe. Preachers and hearers are connected; it is a blessed thing when they mutually rejoice in each other—the hearers in the skill and faithfulness of the preacher, and the preacher in the willingness and obedience of the hearers.

4. They cannot preach except they be sent, except they be both commissioned, and in some measure qualified, for their preaching work. How shall a man act as an ambassador, unless he have both his credentials and his instructions from the prince that sends him? This proves, that to the regular ministry there must be a regular mission and ordination. It is God's prerogative to send ministers; he is the Lord of the harvest, and therefore to him we must pray that he would send forth labourers, Matt. 9. 38. He only can qualify men for, and incline them to, the work of the ministry. But the competency of that qualification in this sin-scarred in- clination, must not be left to the judgment of every man for himself: the nature of the thing will by no means admit that; but for the preservation of due order in the church, this must needs be referred and submitted to the judgment of a competent number of those that are themselves in that office, and of approved wisdom and experience in it; who, as in all other callings, are presumed the most able judges; and therefore we are entitled to such as they find so qualified and inclined, to this work of the ministry; that by this preservation of the succession, the name of Christ may endure for ever, and his throne as the days of heaven. And they that are thus set apart, not only may, but must preach, as those that are sent.

2. How welcome the gospel ought to be to those to whom it was preached; because it shewed the way of peace for his hour, Matt. 21. 4.

7. The like passage we have, Nahum 1. 15. which, if it point at the glad tidings of the deliverance of Israel out of Babylon in the type, yet it looks further to the gospel, the good news of our salvation by Jesus Christ. Observe,

(1.) What the gospel is: it is the gospel of peace; it is the word of reconciliation between God and man, Luke 2. 14. Or, peace is put in general for all good communications. As in that, it is glad tidings of good things; the things of the gospel are good things indeed, the best things; tidings concerning them are the most joyful tidings, the best news that ever came from heaven to earth.

(2.) What the work of ministers is; to preach this gospel, to bring these glad tidings; to evangelize peace, (so the original is,) to evangelize good things. Every ambassador sent forth by Christ is an ambassador to treat: and the first gospel-preachers were angels, Luke 2. 13, &c.

(3.) How acceptable they should therefore be to the children of men for their work's sake; How beautiful are the feet, how welcome are they! Mary Magdalene expressed her love to Christ by kissing his feet, and afterward by holding him by the feet, Matt. 28. 9. And when Christ sends out his disciples, he washed their feet. Those that preach the gospel of peace, should see to it that their feet, their life and conversation, be beautiful: the holiness of ministers' lives is the beauty of their feet. How beautiful, in the eyes of them that hear them. Those that welcome the message, cannot but love the messengers. See 1 Thess. 5. 12, 13.

3. He answers an objection against all this, which might be taken from the small success which the gospel had in many places; (v. 16.) But they have not all obeyed the gospel. All the Jews have not, all the Gentiles have not; far the greater part of both remain in unbelief and disobedience. Observe, The gospel is given us not only to be known and believed, but to be obeyed. It is not a system of notions, but a method of practice. This little success of the word was likewise foretold by the prophet; (Isa. 53. 1.) Who hath believed our report? Very few have how to what one would think should have believed it; considering how faithful a report it is, and how well worthy of all acceptance; very few to the many that persist in unbelief. It is no strange thing, but it is a very sad and uncomfortable thing, for the ministers of Christ to bring the report of the gospel, and not to be believed in it. Under such a melancholy consideration it is good for us to go to God and make our complaint to him. Lord, who hath, &c.

In answer to this,

(1.) He shews that the word preached is the ordinary means of working faith; (v. 17.) So then, &c. —however, though many that hear, do not believe, yet those that believe, have first heard. Faith cometh by hearing. It is the summary of what he had said before, v. 14. The beginning, progress and strength of faith, is by hearing. The word of God is therefore called the word of faith: it begets and nourishes it. God gives faith, but it is by the word as the instrument. Hearing, that hearing which works faith, is by the word of God. It is no: hearing the enticing words of man's wisdom, but hearing the word of God, that will befriend faith, and hearing it as the word of God. See 1 Thes. 2. 13.

(2.) That those who would proclaim the gospel, must believe the report of the gospel, yet, having heard it, they were thereby left inexcusable, and may thank themselves for their own ruin, v. 18. to the end.

[1.] The Gentiles have heard it; (v. 18.) Have they not heard? Yes, more or less, they have; either heard the gospel, or however heard of it. Their sound went into all the earth; not only a confused sound, but their words, more distinct and intelligible notices of the gospel, went out into the ends of the world. The commission which the apostles received, runs thus; Go ye into all the world, preach to every creature, disciple all nations; and they did with indefatigable industry and wonderful success pursue that commission. See the extent of Paul's province, ch. 15. 19. To this remote island of Britain, one of the utmost corners of the world, not only the sound, but the words of the gospel came within a few years after Christ's ascension. It was in order to this, that the gift of tongues was at the very first poured so plentifully upon the apostles, Acts 2. In the expression here he plainly alludes to Ps. 19. 4. which speaks of the notices which the visible works of God in the creation give to all the world of the power and Godhead of the Creator. As under the Old Testament God spake as he spake to Moses and the congregation of Israel; so to the apostles, and the Gentile world also, in giving it the distribution of the gospel.

[2.] The Jews have heard it too, v. 19—21. For this he appeals to two passages of the Old Testament, to shew how inexcusable they are. Did not Israel know that the Gentiles were to be called? They might have known it from Moses and Isaiah.

First, One is taken from Deut. 32. 21. I will provoke you to jealousy. The Jews not only had the offer, but saw the Gentiles accepting of it, and advantaged by that acceptance, by the same token that they were vexed at it. They had the refusal; To you first, Acts 3. 26. In all places where the apostles came, still the Jews had the first offer, and the Gentiles had but their leavings. If one would not, another would. Now this provoked them to jealousy. They, as the elder brother in the parable, (Luke 15.) envied the reception and entertainment of the prodigal Gentiles upon their repentance. The Gentiles are here called no people, and a foolish nation, not the professing people of God. How much sorer there be of the wit and wisdom of the world, those that are not the people of God, are, and in the end will be found to be, a foolish people. Such was the state of the Gentile world, who yet were made the people of God, and Christ to them the Wisdom of God. What a provocation it was to see the Gentiles taken into favour, we may see, Acts 13. 45. 17. 5, 13. and especially Acts 22. 22. It was an instance of the great wickedness of the Jews, that they were thus enraged; and this in Deuteronomy is the matter of a threatening. God often makes people’s sin their punishment. A man needs no greater plague than to be left to the impetuous rage of his own lusts.

Secundum. Another is taken from Isa. 65. 1, 2, which is very full, and in it Esaias is very bold; bold indeed, to speak so plainly of the rejection of his own countrymen. Those that will be found faithful have need to be very bold. Those that are resolved to please God, must not be afraid to displease any man. Now Esaias speaks boldly and plainly, 1. Of the preventing grace and favour of God in the Gentiles. Esaias 1. and 2. Gentiles; (v. 20.) I was found of them that sought me not. The prescribed method is Seek and find; that is a rule for us, not a rule for God, who is often found of those that do not seek. His grace is his own, differing grace his own, and he dispenses it in a way of sovereignty, gives or withholds it at pleasure; prevents us with the blessings, the richest, choicest blessings, of his goodness. Thus he manifested himself to the Gentiles, by sending the light of the gospel among them, when they were so far from seeking him and asking after him, that they were following after lying vanities, and serving dumb idols. Was not this our own particular case? Did not God begin in love, and manifest himself to us when we did not ask after him? And was not that a time of love indeed, to be often remembered with a great deal of thankfulness?

2. Of the obstinacy and perverseness of Israel, notwithstanding the fair offers and affectionate invitations they had, v. 21. Observe, (1.) God’s great goodness to them; All day long I have stretched forth my hands. [1.] His offers; I have stretched forth my hands; offering them life and salvation with the greatest sincerity and seriousness that can be, with all possible expressions of earnestness and importunity; showing them the highest kindness and love he could possibly show them, with the greatest evidence, reasoning the case with them. Stretching forth the hands, is the gesture of those that require audience, (Acts 26. 1.) or desire acceptance, Prov. 1. 24. Christ was crucified with his hands stretched out. Stretched forth my hands as offering reconciliation; come let us shake hands and be friends; and our duty is to give the hand to him. 2. His patience, setting it before them with the greatest evidence, reasoning the case with them. The patience of God toward provoking sinners is admirable. He waits to be gracious. The time of God’s patience is here called a day, lightsome as a day, and fit for work and business; but limited as a day, and a night at the end of it. He bears long, but he will not bear always.

(2.) Their great badness to him. They were a day, a day long, a day, a day’s light. He left in the Hebrew, in Isaiah, is here well explained by two; not only disobedient to the call, not yielding to it, but guaing and quarrelling with it, which is much worse. Many that will not accept of a good proposal, yet will acknowledge that they have nothing to say against it; but the Jews who believed not, rested not there, but contradicted and blasphemed. God’s patience with them was a very great aggravation of their disobedience, and rendered that the more exceeding sinful; as their disobedience advanced the honour of God’s patience, and rendered that the more exceeding gracious. It is a wonder of mercy in God, that his goodness is not overcome by man’s badness; and it is a wonder of wickedness in man, that his badness is not overcome by God’s goodness.

CHAP. XI.

The apostle, having reconciled that great truth of the rejection of the Jews with the promise made unto the fathers, is, in this chapter, further labouring to mould the harshness of it, and to reconcile it to the divine goodness in general. It might be said, Hath God then cast away his people? The apostle therefore sets himself, in this chapter, to make a return to this objection; and that two ways: 1. He shews at large what the mercy is, that is mixed with this wrath, v. 1. ... 2. He infers from thence the infinite wisdom and sovereignty of God; with the adoration of which he concludes this chapter and subject, v. 33. 36.

1. I SAY then, Hath God cast away his people? God forbid. For I also am an Israelite, of the seed of Abraham, of the tribe of Benjamin. 2. God hath not cast away his people which he foreknew. Wot ye not what the scripture saith of Elias? How he maketh intercession to God against Israel, saying, 3. Lord, they have killed thy prophets, and digged down thine altars; and I am left alone, and they seek my life. 4. But what saith the answer of God unto him? I have reserved to myself seven thousand men, who have not bowed the knee to the image of Baal. 5. Even so then at this present time also there is a remnant according to the election of grace. 6. And if by grace, then is it no more of works: otherwise grace is no more grace. But if it be of works, then is it no more grace: otherwise work is no more work. 7. What then? Israel hath not obtained that which he seeketh for; but the election hath obtained it, and the rest were blinded. 8. (According as it is written, God hath given them the spirit of slumber, eyes that they should not see, and ears that they should not hear;) unto this day. 9. And David saith, Let their table be made a snare, and a trap, and a stumbling-block, and a recompence unto them: 10. Let their eyes be darkened, that they may not see, and bow down their back alway. 11. I say then, Have they stumbled that they should fall? God forbid: but rather through their fall salvation is come unto the Gentiles, for to provoke them to jealousy. 12. Now if the fall of them be the riches of the world, and the diminishing of them the riches of the Gentiles: how much more their fulness? 13. For I speak to you Gentiles, in as much as I am the apostle of the Gentiles, I magnify mine office: 14. If by any means I may provoke to emulation them which are my flesh, and might save some of them. 15. For if the casting away of them be the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them be, but life from the dead? 16. For if the first-fruit be holy, the lump is also holy: and if the root be holy, so are the branches. 17. And if some of the branches be broken off, and thou, being a wild olive-tree, wert grafted in among them, and with them partakest of the root and fatness of the olive-tree; 18. Beast not against the branches. But if thou boast, thou bearest not the root, but the root the thee. 19. Thou wilt say then, The branches were broken off, that I might be grafted in. 20. Well; because of unbelief they were broken off, and thou standest by faith. Be not high-minded, but fear: 21. For if God spared not the natural branches, take heed lest he also spare not thee. 22. Behold therefore the goodness and severity of God: on them which fell, severity; but towards thee, goodness, if thou continue in his goodness: otherwise, thou also shalt be cut off. 23. And they also, if they abide not still in unbelief, shall be grafted in: for God is able to graft them in again. 24. For if thou wert cut out of the olive-tree which is wild by nature, and wert grafted contrary to nature into a good olive-tree: how much more shall these, which be the natural branches, be grafted into their own olive-tree? 25. For I would not, brethren, that ye should be ignorant of this mystery, lest ye should be wise in your own conceits; that blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in. 26. And so all Israel shall be saved: as it is written, There shall come out of Sion the Deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob: 27. For this is my covenant unto them, when I shall take away their sins. 28. As concerning the gospel, they are enemies for your sakes: but as touching the election, they are beloved for the fathers' sakes. 29. For the gifts and calling of God are without repentance. 30. For as ye in times past have not believed God, yet have now obtained mercy through their unbelief: 31. Even so have these also now not believed, that through your mercy they also may obtain mercy. 32. For God hath concluded them all in unbelief, that he might have mercy upon all.

The apostle proposes here a plausible objection, which might be urged against the divine conduct in casting off the Jewish nation; (v. 1.) "Hath God cast away his people? Is the rejection total and final? Are they all abandoned to wrath and ruin, and that eternal? Is the extent of the sentence so large as to be without reserve, or the continuance of it so long as to be without repeal? Will he have no more a peculiar people to himself?"

In opposition to this, he shews that there was a great deal of goodness and mercy expressed along with this seeming severity; particularly, he insists upon three things. 1. That though some of the Jews were cast off, yet they were not all so. 2. That though the body of the Jews were cast off, yet the Gentiles were taken in. And, 3. That though the Jews were cast off at present, yet in God's due time they should be taken into his church again.

The Jews, it is true, were many of them cast off, but not all. The apostle shews that God foreknew that he would introduce with a God forbid. He will by no means endure such a suggestion. God had made a distinction between some and others of them.

1. There was a chosen remnant of believing Jews, that obtained righteousness and life by faith in Jesus Christ, (v. 1-7.) These are said to be such as he foreknew, (v. 2.) that is, had thoughts of love to, and purpose concerning them; and this was said of them, that he did predestinate. There lies the ground of the difference. They are called the election, (v. 7.) the elect, God's chosen ones: whom he calls the election, because that which first distinguished them from, and dignified them above, others, was, God's electing love. Believers are the election, all these, and those only, whom God hath chosen. Now,

(1.) He shews that he himself was one of them; (v. 4.) and also all that have the name of being Jews.

"Should I say that all the Jews are rejected, I should cut off my own claims, and see myself abandoned." Paul was a chosen vessel, (Acts 9. 15.) and yet he was of the seed of Abraham; and particularly of the tribe of Benjamin, the least and youngest of all the tribes of Israel.

(2.) He suggests, that, as in Elias's time, so now, this chosen remnant was really more given to and beloved than one would think it was: which intimates likewise, that it is no new or unusual thing for God's grace and favour to Israel to be limited and confined to a remnant of that people; for so it was in Elijah's time. The scripture saith it of Elias, (1 Kings 19. 14.) "In the story of Elias, the great reformer of the Old Testament. Observe,

[1.] His mistake concerning Israel; as if their apostacy in the days of Ahab was so general, that he himself was the only faithful servant God had in the world. He refers to 1 Kings 19. 14. where (it is here said) he maketh intercession to God against Israel. A strange kind of intercession: 1. to pray against him; 2. He deals with God against Israel; so it may be read; so it is translated, Acts 25. 24. The Jews were unwilling to have dealt with God, in prayer they dealt with him, and were in prayer against him. It is said of Elijah, (Jam. 5. 17.) that he prayed in praying. We are then likely to pray in praying, to make a business of that duty, when we pray as those that are dealing with God in the duty. Now Elijah in this prayer spoke as if there were none left faithful in Israel but himself only. See to what a low ebb the profession of religion may sometimes be brought, even the most religious of men. But how much more ought the most wise and observing men may give it up for gone. So it was in Elijah's time. That which makes the show of a nation, is, the powers and the multitude. The powers of Israel were then persecuting powers: They have killed thy prophets, and digged down thine altars, and they seek thy life. The multitude of Israel were then idolatrous: I am a stranger to thee. They were few that were faithful to God, and were not only lost in a crowd of idolaters, but crushed and driven into corners by the rage of persecutors. When the wicked rise, a man is hidden, Prov. 28. 12.

Diggéd down thine altars; not only neglected them, and let them go out of repair, but digged them down. When altars were set up for Baal, it is no wonder if God's altars were pulled down; they could not endure that standing testimony against their idolatry. This was his intercession against Israel; as if he had said, "Lord, is not this a people ripe for ruin, worthy to be cast off? What else canst thou do for thy great name? It is a very sad thing for any people to have to fear the righteous judgment of God's people against them; especially of God's prophets: for God espouses, and sooner or later will visibly own, the cause of his praying people.

[2.] The rectifying this mistake by the answer of God; (v. 4.) I have reserved. Note, First, Things are often much better with the church of God than wise and good men think they are. They are ready to conclude hastily, and to give up all for gone, whether the people, or the saddest. Secondly, In times of general apostasy, there is usually a remnant that keep their integrity; some, though but a few; all do not go one way. Thirdly, That when there is a remnant who keep their integrity in times of general apostacy, it is God that reserves to himself that remnant. If he had left them to themselves, they had gone down the stream with the rest. It is his free and almighty grace that makes the difference between them and the others.

Seven thousand: a competent number to bear their testimony against the idolatry of Israel; and yet, compared with the many thousands of Israel, a very small number; one of a city, and two of a tribe, like the grape-gleanings of the vintage. Christ's flock is but a little flock: and yet, when they come all together at last, they will be a great and innumerable multitude. Now the description of this remnant, is, that they have not bowed the knee to the image of Baal. That was then the reigning sin of Israel. In court, city, and country, Baal had the ascendancy; and the generality of people, more or less, paid their respect to Baal. The best evidence of integrity is a freedom from the present prevailing corruptions of the times and places that we live in; to swim against the stream when it is strong. Those God will own for his faithful witnesses, that are bold in bearing their testimony to the present truth, 2 Pet. 1. 12. This is thank-worthy; not to bow to Baal when every body bows. Sober singularity is commonly the badge of true sincerity.

[3.] The application of this instance to the case in hand; (v. 5.—7.) Even so at this present time. God's methods of dispensation toward his children are often much hid, as they have been, as it is. In Elijah's time there was a remnant, and so there is now. If then there was a remnant left under the Old Testament, when the displays of grace were less clear, and the pourings out of the Spirit less plentiful; much more now under the gospel, when the grace of God, which bringeth salvation, appears more illustrious.

A remnant, a few of many; a remnant of believing Jews, when the rest were obstinate in their unbelief. This is called a remnant according to the election of grace; they are such as were chosen from eternity in the counsels of divine love, to be vessels of grace and glory. Whom he did predestinate them he called. If the difference between them and others be made purely by the grace of God, as certain I have reserved them, saith he, to my self, then it must needs be according to the election; for we are sure that whatever God does, he does it according to the counsel of his own will.

Now concerning this remnant, we may observe,

First, Whence it takes its rise; from the free grace of God, (v. 6.) that grace which excludes works. The eternal election, in which the difference between some and others is first founded, is purely of grace, free grace; not for the sake of works done, or foreseen; if so, it would not be grace. Gratia non est ullo modo gratia, si non sit omni modo gratia—It is not grace, properly so called, if it be not perfectly free. Election is purely according to the good pleasure of his will, Eph. 1. 5. Paul's heart was so full of the freeness of God's grace, that, in the midst of his discourse he turns aside, as it were, to make the remark, If of grace, then not of works. And some observe, that faith itself, which in the matter of justification is opposed to works, is here included in them; for faith has a peculiar receptivity to receive the free grace of God for our justification, but not to receive that grace for our election.

What it obtains: that which Israel, that is, the body of that people, in vain sought for; (v. 7.) Israel hath not obtained that which he seeketh for; justification, and acceptance with God; (see ch. 9. 31.) but the election has obtained it. In them the promise of God has its accomplishment, and God's ancient kindness for that people is remembered. He calls the remnant of believers, not the elect, but the election, to shew that the sole foundation of their election is laid in election. They were the persons whom God had in his eye, in the counsels of his love; they are the election, they are God's choice.

Such was the favour of God to the chosen remnant. But,

2. The rest were blinded, v. 7. Some are chosen and called; and the call is made effectual. But others are left to perish in their unbelief; nay, they are made worse by their own hands. They are blinded, so much that they know not what is better. The gospel, which to them that believed was the favour of life unto life, to the unbelieving was the favour of death unto death. The same sun softens wax and hardens clay. God old Simeon foresaw that the child Jesus was set for the fall, as well as for the rising again, of many in Israel, Luke 2. 34.

Were blinded; ingrates—they were hardened; so some. They were sealed, and made brawny and insensible. They could neither see the light, nor feel the touch, of gospel-grace. Blindness and hardness are expressive of the same senselessness and stupidity of spirit. They shut their eyes, and would not see; that was their sin: and then God, in a way of righteous judgment, blinded their eyes, that they could not see; there was their punishment made manifest.

This seemed harsh doctrine: to qualify it therefore he vouches two witnesses out of the Old Testament, which speak of such a thing.

(1.) Isaiah, who spake of such a judgment in his day, ch. 29. 10.—6. 9. The spirit of slumber, that is, an indisposition to mind either their duty or interest. They are under the power of a prevailing unconcernedness, like people that are slumbering; not that their judgment is not affected, but that they do not use it as they should; for they were resolved to continue as they were, and would not stir. The following words explain what is meant by the spirit of slumber; eyes, that they should not see, and ears, that they should not hear. They had the faculties, but in the things that belonged to their peace they had not the use of those faculties; they were quite infatuated, they saw Christ, but they did not believe him; they heard, but they did not receive it; and so both their hearing and their seeing were in vain. It was all one as if they had neither seen nor heard. Of all judgments spiritual judgments are the sorest, and most to be dreaded, though they make the least noise.

Unto this day. Ever since Elias prophesied, this hardening work hath been in the doing; some among them have been blind and senseless. Or rather, ever since the first preaching of the gospel, though they have had the most convincing evidences, that could be of the truth of it, the most powerful preaching, the fairest offers, the clearest calls from Christ himself; and from his apostles; yet to this day they were blinded. It is still true concerning multitudes of them, even to this day in which we live; they are hardened and blinded; the obstinacy and unbelief go by succession, from generation to generation, according to their own fearful imprecation, which entailed the curse; His blood be upon us, and upon our children.

(2.) David, (v. 9, 10.) quoted from Ps. 69. 22, 23, where David having in the Spirit foretold the sufferings of the Messiah from the People the Jews, particularly that of their giving him vino vineae dein, (v. 21. which was literally fulfilled, Matt. 27. 48.) an expression of the greatest contempt and malice that could be; in the next words, under the form of an imprecation, he foretells the dreadful judgments of God upon them for it; Let their table become a snare: which the apostle here applies to the present blindness of the Jews, and the offence they took at the gospel, which increased their hardness.

This teaches us how to understand other prayers of David against his enemies; they are to be looked upon as prophetical of the judgments of God upon the public and obstinate enemies of Christ and his kingdom. His prayer that it might be so, was a prophecy that it should be so, and not the private expressions of his own angry resentment. It was Blasphemous to justify God, and to clear his righteousness in such judgments. He speaks here,

1. [1.] Of the ruin of their comforts; Let their table be made a snare, that is, as the psalmist explains it, Let that which should be for their welfare, be a trap to them. The curse of God will turn meat into poison. It is a threatening like that, (Mal. 2. 2.) I will curse your blessings. Their table a snare, that is, an occasion of sin, and an occasion of misery; their very food, that should nourish them, shall choke them.

2. [2.] Of the ruin of their powers and faculties, (v. 10.) their eyes darkened, their backs bowed down; that they can neither find the right way, nor, if they could, are able to walk in it. The Jews, after their national rejection of Christ and his gospel, became infuriated in their politics, so that the apostles, the Jews, and Gentiles, entreated the ruin of the Romans. They looked like a people designed for slavery and contempt, their backs bowed down, to be ridden and trampled upon by all the nations about them.

Or, it may be understood spiritually; their backs are bowed down in carnality and worldly-mindedness. Curse in terra animae—They mind earthly things. This is an exact description of the state and temper of the present remainder of that people, than whom, if the accounts we have of them be true, there is not a more worldly, wilful, blind, selfish, ill-natured, people in the world. They are manifested to this day under the power of this curse. Divine curses will work long. It is a sign we have our eyes darkened, if we are bowed down in worldly-mindedness.

The other thing which qualified this doctrine of the rejection of the Jews, was, that though they were cast off and unchurched, yet the Gentiles were taken in, (v. 11—14.) which he applies by way of caution to the Gentiles, v. 17—22.

1. The rejection of the Jews made room for the reception of the Gentiles. The Jews' leavings were a feast for the poor Gentiles; (v. 11.) Have they stumbled, that they should fall? Had God no other in the forsaking and rejecting of them than their destruction? He startles at that, rejecting the thought with abhorrence, as usually he does when any thing is suggested which seems to reflect upon the wisdom or righteousness, or goodness of God; God forbid; no, through their fall salvation is come to the Gentiles. Not but that salvation might have come to the Gentiles if they had stood; but by the divine appointment it was ordered, that the gospel should be preached to the Gentiles, and the Jews' refusal of it. Thus in the parable; (Matt. 22. 8, 9.) They that were first hidden were not worthy, Go ye therefore into the highways, Luke 14. 21. And so it was in the history; (Acts 13. 46.) *It was necessary that the word of God should first have been spoken to you; but seeing ye put it from you, the Gentiles were ordered, Acts 18. 6. God will have a church in the world; and the wedding furnished with guests; and if one will not come, another will, or why was the offer made? The Jews had the refusal, and so the tender came to the Gentiles. See how infinite Wisdom brings light out of darkness, good out of evil, meat out of the eater, and sweetness out of the strong.

To the same purport he says, (v. 12.) The fall of them was the riches of the world, it hastened the gospel so much the sooner into the Gentile world. The gospel is the richest of the places where it is; it is better than thousands of gold and silver. Or, The riches of the Gentiles was the multitude of converts among them. True believers are God's jewels.

To the same purport, (v. 15.) The casting away of them is the education of the world. God's displeasure toward them was, no doubt, a way for his favour toward the Gentiles. God was in Christ reconstituting the world, 2 Cor. 5. 19. And therefore he took occasion from the unbelief of the Jews, openly to disavow and disown them, though they have been his peculiar favourites; to shew that in dispensing his favours he would now no longer act in such a way of peculiarity and restriction, but that in every nation he that feared God and wrought righteousness, should be accepted of him, Acts 10. 34, 35.

2. The use that the apostle makes of this doctrine concerning the substitution of the Gentiles in the room of the Jews. (1.) As a kinsman to the Jews, here is a word of excitement and exhortation to them; to stir them up to receive and embrace the gospel-offer. This, God intended in his favour to the Gentiles, to prepare them to receive the gospel; (v. 16.) who will have their endea-vours to enforce it accordingly; (v. 14.) If by any means I might provoke to emulation them who are my flesh, "Shall the despised Gentiles run away with all the comforts and privileges of the gospel, and shall we not repent our refusal, and now at last put in for a share? Shall not we believe and obey, and be pardoned and saved, as well as the Gentiles?" See an instance of such an emulation in Esau, Gen. 28. 6—9. There is a commendable emulation in the affairs of our souls; why should not we be as holy and happy as any of our neighbours? In this emulation there needs no suspicion, undermining or countermanning; for the church hath room enough, and the new covenant grace and comfort enough, for us all. The blessings are not lessened by the multitudes of the sharers. And might save some of them. See what was Paul's business, to save souls; and yet the utmost he promises himself but to save some. Though he were such a powerful preacher, spoke and wrote with such evidence and demonstration of the Spirit, yet of the many he dealt with he could but save some. Ministers must think their pains well bestowed, if they can but be instrumental to save some.

(2.) As an apostle to the Gentiles, here is a word of caution for them. I speak to you Gentiles. You believing Romans, you hear what riches of salvation are come to you by the fall of the Jews, but take heed lest you do anything to forfeit it." Paul takes this, as other occasions, to apply his discourse to the Gentiles, because it was the apostle of the Gentiles, appointed for the service of their faith, to plant and water churches in the Gentile nations. This was the purport of his extraordinary mission, Acts 22. 21.

First, The privilege which the Gentiles had by being taken into the church. They were grafted in, (v. 17.) as a branch of a wild olive into a good olive tree; so he speaks contrary to the way and custom of the husbandman, who grafts the good olive into the bad; but those that God grafts into the church, he finds wild and barren, and good for nothing. Men graft, to mend the tree; but God grafts, to mend the branch.

1. The church of God is an olive-tree; flourishing and fruitful as an olive; (Ps. 52. 8. Hos. 14. 6.) the fruit useful for the honour both of God and man, Judg. 9. 9.

2. Those that are out of the church, are as wild olive-trees; not only useless, but what they do produce is sour and unsavoury. Wild by nature, v. 24. This was the state of the poor Gentiles, that wanted church privileges, and in respect of real sanctification; and it is the natural state of every one of us, to be wild by nature.

3. Conversion is the grafting in of wild branches into the good olive. We must be cut off from the old stock, and be brought into union with a new root. Gentiles, which it was here spoken of a visible church-membership, from which the Jews were as branches broken off; and so the Gentiles were grafted in, &c.—among them that continued, or in the room of them that were broken off.

The Gentiles, being grafted into the church, partake of the same privileges that the Jews did, the root and fitness. The olive-tree is the visible church (called so Jer. 11. 16.) the root that was Abraham; not the root of communication, so Christ only is the root; but the root of administration, he being the first with whom the covenant was so solemnly made. Now the believing Gentiles partake of this root; he also is a son of Abraham, (Luke 19. 9.) the blessing of Abraham comes upon the Gentiles, (Gal. 3. 14.) the same fitness of the olive-tree, as the same substance, special protection, lively oracles, means of salvation, a standing ministry, instituted ordinances; and among the rest, the visible church-membership of their infant seed, which was part of the fitness of the olive-tree that the Jews had, and cannot be imagined to be denied to the Gentiles.

Secondly, A caution not to abuse these privileges.

1. "Be not proud; (v. 18.) Boast not against the branches. Do not make the Gentiles, that are now the branch borne by the root, nay, and an engrafted branch, brought into the good olive contrary to nature, (v. 24.) not free-born, but by an act of grace enfranchised and naturalised. Abraham, the root of the Jewish church, is not behelden to thee; but thou art greatly obliged to him, as the trustee of the covenant, and the father of many nations. Therefore, if thou boast, know, (that word must be supplied to clear the sense,) thou boast not the root but the root thee."

2. "Be not secure; (v. 20.) Be not high-minded, but fear. Be not too confident of your own strength and standing. A holy fear is an excellent preservative against high-mindedness: happy is the man that thus feareth the Lord. We need not fear but God will be true to his word; all the danger is lest we be false to our's. Let us therefore fear, Heb. 4. 1. The church of Rome now boasts of a patent of perpetual preservation; but the apostle here, in his epistle to that church when she was in her infancy and integrity, enters an express caveat against that boast, and all claims of that kind.

"Why lest thou commit a forfeiture as they have done; lest thou lose the privileges thou now enjoyest, as they have lost theirs." The evils that befall others, should be our warnings. Go (saith God to Jerusalem, Jer. 7. 12.) and see what I did to Shiloh; so now, let all the churches of God go see what he did to Jerusalem, and what is become of the day of their visitation: that we may hear and fear; and take heed of Jerusalem's sin. The patience which churches have of their privileges, is not for a certain term, or entailed upon them and their heirs; but it runs as long as they carry themselves well, and no longer.

Consider. (1.) "How they were broken off. It was not undeservedly, by an act of absolute sovereignty and prerogative, but because of unbelief."
It seems then, it is possible for churches that have long stood by faith, to fall into such a state of infidelity as may be their ruin. Their unbelief did not only provoke God to cut them off, but they did by that cut themselves off: it was not only the meritorious, but the formal cause of their separation. "Now, thou art liable to the same infirmity and corruption that they fell by." Further observe, they were "cut off" (v. 21.) not only "from the vine," as in Abraham's covenant, but descending from Abra- ham's loins; and so born upon the promises, and thence had a kind of tenant-right: yet when they sunk into unbelief, God did not "save" them. Prescription, long usage, the faithfulness of their anestors, would not secure them. It was in vain to plead, though they insisted much upon it, that they were of the stock, and it is here applied to the unchurching of the Jews. God is most severe toward those that have been in profession nearest to him, if they rebel against him, Amos 3. 2. Patience and privileges abused, turn to the greatest wrath. Of all judgments, spiritual judgments are the sorest; for of those he is here speaking, v. 8.

(2.) "How thou standest; thou that art engraven in,' he speaks to the Gentile churches in general; though perhaps tactfully reflecting on some particular person, who might have expressed some such pride and triumph in the Jews' rejection. "Consider then,"

[1] By what means thou standest; by faith, which is a depending grace, and fetches in strength from heaven. Thou dost not stand in any strength of thy own, of which thou mightest be confident: thou art no more than the free grace of God makes thee, and his grace is his own, which he gives and withholds at pleasure. That which ruined them was unbelief, and by faith thou standest: therefore thou hast no faster hold than they had, thou standest on no firmer foundation than they did."

[2] On what terms; (v. 22.) "toward thee goodness, if thou continue in his goodness, continue in a dependence upon, and compliance with, the free grace of God, it's called, v. 22. which it was that, ruined true, they were the husbandmen to whom the vineyard was first let out; but when they forfeited it, it was justly taken from them, Matt. 21. 41, 42. This is called here severity, v. 22. God laid righteousness to the line, and judgment to the plummet, and dealt with them according to their sins. Seve-ritv is a word that sounds harsh; and I do not remember that it is any where else in scripture ascribed to God, and it is here applied to the unchurching of the Jews. God is most severe toward those that ther's sake, is therefore called the kindness of God;

2 Sam. 9, 3, 7.

Though, as concerning the gospel, that is, in the present dispensation of it, they are enemies to it for your sakes, for the sake of the Gentiles against whom they have such an antipathy; yet when God's time is come, that will wear off, and God's love to their fathers will be remembered. See a promise that points at this, Lev. 26. 42. The iniquity of the fathers is visited but to the third and fourth generation; but there is mercy kept for thousands. Many fare the better for the sake of their godly ancestors.

Upon this account that the church is called their own olive-tree. Long it had been their own peculiar; which is some encouragement to us to hope that there may be room for them in it again, for old acquaintance-sake. That which hath been may be again.

Though particular persons and generations wear off in unbelief, yet there having been a national church-membership, though for the present suspended, we may expect that it will be revived again.

(2.) Because of the power of God; (v. 23.) God is able to graft them in again. The conversion of souls is a work of almighty power; and when they seem most hardened, and blinded, and obstinate, our comfort is, that God is able to work a change, able to graft those in, that have been long cast out and withered. When the house is kept by the strong man armed, with all his force, yet God is stronger than he.

The condition of their restoration is faith; if they abide not still in unbelief. So that nothing is to be done but to remove that unbelief, that is the great obstacle; and God is able to take that away, though nothing less than an almighty power will do it; the same power that raised up Christ from the dead, Eph. 1, 19, 20. Otherwise, can these dry bones live?

(3.) Because of the grace of God manifested to the Gentiles. Those that have themselves experienced the grace of God, preventing, distinguishing grace, may from thence take encouragement to hope well concerning others. This is his argument, (v. 24.) "If thou wert grafted into a good olive, that wast wild by nature, much more shall these that were the natural branches, and may therefore be presumed somewhat nearer to the divine acceptance, their turning to God, be able to their restoration."

This is a suggestion very proper to check the insolence of those Gentile Christians, that looked with disdain and triumph upon the condition of the rejected Jews, and trampled upon them; as if he had said, "Their condition, bad as it is, is not so bad as your was before your conversion; and therefore why may it not be made as good as your is?" This is his argument, (v. 30, 31.) As ye in time past have not believed, God is able to have mercy upon them, with God, to be often thinking what they were in time past, and how they obtained that mercy. This would help to soften our censures of, and quicken our prayers for, those that still continue in unbelief.

He argues further from the occasion of the Gentiles' call, that is, the unbelief of the Jews; thence it took rise. "You have obtained mercy through their unbelief;" and consequently shall they obtain mercy through your mercy. If your sins were so great, and such an obstacle to your entrance to God, that He could only receive you by a kind of cast-off, or an accident; much more was your sin a great hindrance to the gentiles. He takes it for granted, that the believing Gentiles would do their utmost endeavours to work upon the Jews; that when God had persuaded Japhet, he would be labouring to persuade them. True grace hates monopolies. Those that have found mercy themselves, should endeavour that through their mercy others also may obtain mercy.

Because of the promises and prophecies of the Old Testament, which are peculiar; he quotes a very remarkable one, v. 26, from Isa. 59, 29, 21. Where we may observe,

[1.] The coming of Christ promised; There shall come out of Zion the Deliverer. Jesus Christ is the great Deliverer, which supposes mankind in a state of misery and danger. In Isaiah it is, the Redeemer shall come to Zion. There he is called the Redeemer; this is the Deliverer; he delivers in a way of redemption, but price.

The Deliverer delivered, 2. that he comes to Zion, because when the prophet prophesied, he was yet to come into the world, and Zion was his first head-quarters; thither he came, there he took up his residence; but when the apostle wrote this, he was come, he had been in Zion; and he is speaking of the fruits of his appearing, which shall come out of Zion; from thence, as from the spring, issued forth those streams of living water, in which the everlasting gospel watered the nations. Out of Zion went forth the law, Isa. 2, 3. Compare Luke 24, 47.

[2.] The end and purpose of this coming; He shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob. Christ's errand into the world was to turn away ungodliness, to turn away the guilt by the purchase of pardoning mercy, and to turn away the power by pouring out of renewing grace; to save his people from their sins, (Matt. 1, 21.) to part between us and our sins; that iniquity might not be our ruin, and that it might not be our ruler.

Especially to turn it away from Jacob; which is that for the sake of which he quotes the text, as a proof of the great kindness God intended for the seed of Jacob. What greater kindness could he do them than to turn away ungodliness from them, to give them the new birth, which is to bring them between them and all happiness; take away sin, and then make way for all good? This is the blessing that Christ was sent to bestow upon the world, and to tender it to the Jews in the first place, (Acts 3, 26.) to turn people from their iniquities.

In Isaiah, it is, The Redeemer shall come to Zion, and unto them that turn from transgression in Jacob; which shews who in Zion were to have a share in, to turn from sin; and that that deliverance promised, those, and those only, that leave their sins to God; to them Christ comes as a Redeemer, but as an Avenger to them that persist in impenitence. See Deut. 30, 2, 3. Those that turn from sin, will be owned as the true citizens of Zion, (Eph. 2, 19.) the rightJacob, Ps. 24, 4, 6. Putting both these readings together, we learn that none have an interest in Christ but those that turn from their sins, nor can any turn from their sins, but in their sins but by the strength of the grace of Christ.

For this is my covenant with them; this, that the Deliverer shall come to them; this, that my Spirit shall not depart from them, as it follows, Isa. 59, 21. God's gracious intentions concerning Israel were made the matter of a covenant, which the God that cannot lie could not but be true and faithful to. They were the children of the covenant, Acts 2, 23. They were the children of the new covenant; Acts 3, 25. And the apostles add, when I shall take away their unbelief, which some think refers to Isa. 27, 9, or only to the foregoing words, to turn away ungodliness. Pardon of sin is laid as the foundation of all the blessings of the new covenant; (Heb. 8, 12.) For I will be merciful. Now from all this he infers, that certainly God had great mercy in store for that people, something answerable to the extent of these rich promises; and he proves his inference, (v. 20.) by this truth, For the gifts and callings of God are without Repentance. Repentance is sometimes taken for a change of mind, and so God never repents, for he is in one mind, and who can turn him? Sometimes for a change of way, and that is here understood; intimating the constancy and unchangeableness of that love of God, which is founded in election. Those gifts and callings are immutable; whom he so loves, he loves to the end. We find God repenting that he had given man grace (though the Lord had made man,) and repenting that he had given a man honour and power; (1 Sam. 15. 11. It repenteth me that I have set up Saul to be king;) but we never find God repenting that he had given man grace, or effectually called him; those gifts and callings are without repentance.

3. The time and extent of this conversion, when and where it is to be expected. It is called a mystery, (v. 25.) that which was not obvious, and which one would not expect upon the view of the present state of that people; who appeared generally so obstinate against Christ and christianity, that it was a riddle to talk of their unanimous conversion. The conversion of the Gentiles is called a mystery, Eph. 3. 3, 6, 9. The case of the rejected Jews seemed as bad now as that of the Gentiles had been. The work of conversion was carried on in a mystery. Now we know the secret of the work very well. The mystery as to keep them humble, lest you be wise in your own conceit, lest you be so much puffed up with your church-membership, and trample upon the Jews. Ignorance is the cause of our self-conceit, would not have you ignorant, lest you be wise in your own conceits. Observe,

1. Their present state; Blindness, in part, is happened to Israel, v. 23. Here is something to quench your exultations about their apostasy. There is a reason that those things belong to their peace; though part, the far greater part, are in blindness, v. 7, 8.

To the same purport, (v. 32.) God has concluded them all in unbelief; shut them up as in a prison; given them over to their own hearts' lusts. Shutting up is sometimes put for conviction, as Gal. 3. 22. They all stand before God convicted of unbelief, and they would not believe. "Why then (said with God) you shall not." They peremptorily refused to submit to Christ and his government; which refusal of theirs was, as it were, entered upon record in the court of Heaven, and was conclusive against them.

2. When this blessed change should be; when the fulness of the Gentiles shall come in, when the gospel has had its intended success, and made its progress in the Gentile world; compare, v. 12. The Jews shall continue in blindness, till God hath performed his whole work among the Gentiles, and then their turn will come next to be remembered. This was the purpose and ordinance of God, for wise and holy ends; things should not be ripe for the Jews' conversion, till the church was replenished with the Gentiles; that it might appear that God's taking them again, was not because he had need of them, but of his own free grace.

3. The extent of it; all Israel shall be saved, v. 26. He will have mercy upon all, v. 32. Not every individual person, but the body of the people. Not that ever they should be restored to their covenant or peculiarity again, to have their priesthood and temple, and ceremonies again; (an end is put to all those things;) but they should be brought to believe in Christ the true Messiah whom they crucified, and be incorporated in the Christian church, and become one sheep-fold with the Gentiles under Christ the great Shepherd.

But the question is, concerning the accomplishment of all this.

[1.] Some think it is done already; when before, and in, and after, the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, multitudes of the Jews were convinced of their iniquity, and turned Christians; so many, that, considering how many millions of them were cut off in the destruction, we may reasonably conclude, that of those which survived, the greater part were Christian, and embodied in the Christian church; and it was a very considerable number that persisted obstinate. For many ages Judea had, as other Christian provinces, their ministers and churches, and a face of religion. And most of this work, they suppose, was done toward the close of the ministry of the apostles, when the Gentiles were generally come in.

[2.] Others think, that it is yet to have its accomplishment toward the end of the world; that those Jews which yet wonderfully remain distinct from the rest of the nations by their name, customs, and religion, and are very numerous, especially in the Levant parts, shall, by the working of the Spirit with the word, be convinced of their sin, and brought generally to embrace the Christian faith, and to join in with the Christian churches; which will contribute much to their strength and beauty. Alas! who shall live when God doeth this?

33. 34. O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out! 34. For who hath known the mind of the Lord, or who hath been his counsellor? 35. Or who hath first given to him, and it shall be recompensed unto him again? 36. For of him, and through him, and to him, are all things: to whom be glory for ever. Amen.

The apostle having insisted so largely, through the greatest part of this chapter, upon reconciling the rejection of the Jews with the divine goodness, he concludes here with the acknowledgment and admiration of the divine wisdom and sovereignty in all this. He has the apostle does, with great affection and awe, adore. I. The secrecy of the divine counsels; O the depth! in these proceedings toward the Jews and Gentiles; or, in general, the whole mystery of the gospel, which we cannot fully comprehend. The riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God, the abundant instances of his wisdom and knowledge, in the contriving and carrying on the work of our redemption by Christ; a depth which the angels as yet cannot fathom, 1 Pet. 1. 12. Much more may it puzzle any human understanding to give an account of the methods, and reasons, and designs, and reaches of it. Paul was as well acquainted with the mysteries of the kingdom of God as ever any mere man was; and yet he confesses himself at a loss in the contemplation; and despairing to find the bottom, he humbly rests in the fact that this is a mystery. Those that know most in this state of imperfection, cannot but be most sensible of their own weakness and short-sightedness; and that after all their searches, and all their attainments in those searches, while they are here, they cannot order their speech by reason of darkness. Praise is silent to thee, Ps. 65. 1.

The depth of the riches. Men's riches of all kinds are shallow; you may soon see the bottom: but God's riches are deep; (Ps. 36. 6.) Thy judgments are a great deep. There is not only depth in the divine counsels, but riches too; which denotes an abundance of that which is precious and valuable; so complete are the dimensions of the divine counsels, they have not only depth and height, but breadth and length, (Eph. 3. 18.) and that passing knowledge, v. 19.

Riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God. His seeing of all things by one clear, and certain, and infallible view; all things that are, or ever were, or ever shall be; that all is naked and open before him; there is his knowledge. His ruling and ordering of all things, directing and disposing of them to his own glory; and the bringing about of his own purposes and ends, as he wills: that is his wisdom. And the vast reach of both these is such a depth as is past our fathomning, and we may soon lose ourselves in the contemplation of them. Such knowledge is too wonderful for me, Ps. 139. 6. Compare v. 17, 18.

How unsearchable are his judgments! that is, his counsels and purposes: and his ways, that is, the execution of these counsels and purposes. We know not what he designs; whether in the bosom of motion, and Providence has begun to work, we know not what he has in view; it is past finding out. This does not only overturn all our positive conclusions about the divine counsels, but it also checks all our curious inquiries.

Secret things belong not to us, Deut. 29. 29. God's way is in the sea, Ps. 77. 19. Compare Job 23. 8, 9. Ps. 97. 2. What he does, we know not now, John 3. 35. Christ, who has not yet set forth his counsels, nor by searching find out God. See Job 5. 9.—9. 10. The judgments of his mouth, and the way of our duty, blessed be God, are plain and easy, it is a high-way; but the judgments of his hands, and the ways of his providence, are dark and mysterious, which therefore we must not pry into, but silently adore and acquiesce in.

The apostle speaks this here, especially with reference to that strange turn, the casting off of the Jews, and the entertainment of the Gentiles, with a purpose to take in the Jews again in due time; these were strange proceedings, the choosing of some, the refusing of others, and neither according to the probabilities of human conjecture. Even so, Father, because it seemed good in thine eyes. These are methods unaccountable, concerning which we must say, O the depth!

Past finding out, ἀνατρεπόμενος—cannot be traced. God leaves no prints or footsteps behind him, does not make a path to shine after him; but his paths of providence are new every morning; he does not go the same way so often as to make a track of it. How little a portion is heard of him! Job 26. 14. It follows, (v. 34.) For who hath known the mind of the Lord? Is there any creature made of his cabinet-council, or laid, as Christ, was in the bosom of motion, and Providence has begun to work, we know not what he has in view; it is past finding out. This does not only overturn all our positive conclusions about the divine counsels, but it also checks all our curious inquiries. God leaves no prints or footsteps behind him, does not make a path to shine after him; but his paths of providence are new every morning; he does not go the same way so often as to make a track of it.

He who makes the same challenge; (1 Cor. 2. 16.) For who hath known the mind of the Lord? And yet there he adds, But we have the mind of Christ: which intimates, that through Christ true believers, who have his Spirit, know so much of the mind of God as is necessary to their happiness. He that did know the mind of the Lord, he has declared him, John 1. 18. And so, though we know not the mind of the Lord, yet, if we have the mind of Christ, we have enough. The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him, Ps. 25. 14. Shall I hide from Abraham the thing which I do? See John 15. 15.

Or who has been his counsellor? He needs no counsellor, for he is infinitely wise; nor is any creature capable of being his counsellor; that would be like lighting a candle to the sun. This seems to refer to that scripture, (Isa. 40. 13, 14.) Who hath directed the Spirit of the Lord, or, being his counsellor, has taught him? With whom took he counsel? &c. It is the substance of God's challenge to Job concerning the work of creation, (Job 38.) and is applicable to all the methods of his providence. It is nonsense for any man to prescribe to God, or to teach him how to govern the world.

II. The sovereignty of the divine counsels. In all things that be done by the free agent, does what he will, because he will, and gives not account of any of his matters; (Job 23. 13.—53. 13.) and yet there is no unrighteousness with him. To clear which,

1. He challenges any to prove God a debtor to him; (v. 35.) Who hath first given to him? Who is there of all the creatures, that can prove God is beholden to him? Whatever we do for him, or devote to him, as the supreme privilege; to judgment, which is for ever an estoppel (a bar) to such demands; (1 Chron. 29. 14.) Of thine own we have given thee. All the duties we can perform, are not requisits, but restitutions rather.

If any can prove that God is their debtor, the apostle here stands bound for the payment, and proclaims, in God's name, that payment is ready. It shall be recompensed to him again. It is certain, God can in a moment make a man rich; but nobody lose by him; but never any one yet durst make a demand of this kind, or attempt to prove it.

This is here suggested, to silence the clamours of the Jews. When God took away their visible church-privileges from them, he did but take his own; and may he not do what he will with his own? Give or withhold his grace where and when he pleases. To silence likewise the insultings of the Gentiles. When God sent the gospel among them, he gave them many of them grace and wisdom to accept of it, it was not because he owed them so much favour, or that they could challenge it as a debt, but of his own good pleasure.

2. He resolves all into the sovereignty of God; (v. 36.) For of him, and through him, and to him, are all things: God is all in all. All things in heaven and earth, especially those things which relate to our salvation, the things that belong to our peace, they are all of him by way of creation, through him by way of providential influence, that they may be to him in their final tendency and result. Of God, as the spring and fountain of all; through Christ, God-man as the conveyance; to God as the ultimate end. These three include, in general, all God's casual relations to his creatures; of him, as the first efficient; through him, as the supreme agent; to him, as the ultimate final cause; for the Lord hath made all for himself, Rev. 4. 11.

If all be of him, and through him, there is all the reason in the world, that all should be to him, and for him. It is a necessary circulation; if the rivers receive their waters from the sea, they return them to the sea again, Eccl. 1. 7. To do all to the glory of God, is to make a virtue of necessity; for all shall in that be to him, whether we will or no.

And so he concludes with a short doxology: To whom be glory for ever, Amen. God's universal agency as the first cause, the sovereign ruler, and the last end, ought to be the matter of our adoration. Thus all his works do praise him objectively; but his saints do bless him actively; they hang that praise to him, which all the creatures do minister matter for.

He had been discoursing at large of the counsels of God concerning man, setting the point with a great deal of accuracy; but, after all, he concludes with the acknowledgment of the divine sovereignty, as that into which all these things must be ultimately resolved, and in which alone the mind can safely and sweetly rest. This is, if not the scholastical way, yet the christian way, of disputation. Whatever are the premises, let God's glory be the conclusion; especially when we come to talk of the divine counsels and actions, it is best for us to turn our arguments into awful and serious discussions. The glorified saints, that see furthest into these mysteries, never dispute, but praise to eternity.

CHAP. XII.

The apostle, having at large cleared and confirmed the prime fundamental, doctrines of christianity, comes in the next place to press the practical duties which we must take up, or, as we look upon it only as a system of notions, and a guide to speculation. No, it is a practical religion, that tends to the right ordering of the conversation. It is designed not only to inform our judgments, but to reform our heart and lives. From the methods of the apostle's writing in this, as in some other of the epistles, (as from the managers of the principal ministers of state in Christ's kingdom,) the stewards of the mysteries of God may take direction how to divide the word of truth: not to press duties abstracted from privilege, nor privilege abstracted from duty; but let both go together, with a complicated design, they will greatly promote and befriend each other. The duties are the measure of the privileges, by which we are to judge of inferiors. The foundation of christian practice must be laid in christian knowledge and faith. We must first understand how we receive Christ Jesus the Lord, and then we shall know the behaviour due to him to be taken accordingly.

There is a great deal of duty prescribed in this chapter: the exhortations are short and pithy, briefly summing up what is good, and what the Lord our God in Christ requires of us. It is an abridgment of the christian directory, an excellent heap of rules for the right ordering of the conversation, as becomes the gospel.

It is joined to the foregoing discourse by the word, therefore. It is the practical application of doctrine, that is, the life of preaching. He had been discoursing at large of justification by faith, and of the riches of free grace, and the pledges and assurances we have of the glory that is to be revealed. From hence carnal libertines would be apt to infer, "And we live as if we walk by way of our hearts and the sight of our eyes." No, that does not follow; the faith that justifies, is a faith that works by love. And there is no other way to heaven, but the way of holiness and obedience. Therefore what God hath joined together, let no man put asunder. The particular exhortations of this chapter are reducible to the three principal heads of christian duty; our duty to God, our duty to our brethren; and our duty to ourSELVES. The grace of God teaches us, in general, to live Godly, soberly, and righteously, and to deny all that which is contrary hereunto. Now this chapter will give us to understand what godliness, sobriety, and righteousness, are, though somewhat intermixed.

1. I BESEECH you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service. 2. And be not conformed to this world: but be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind, that ye may prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect, will of God. 3. For I say, through the grace given unto me, to every man that is among you, not to think of himself more highly than he ought to think; but to think soberly, according as God hath dealt to every man the measure of faith. 4. For as we have many members in one body, and all members have not the same office: 5. So we, being many, are one body in Christ, and every one members one of another. 6. Having then giv'n differing according to the grace that is given to us, whether prophecy, let us prophesy according to the proportion of faith; 7. Or minis-
by the officer, who transferred to God all his right, title, and interest in it, by laying his hand on the head of it. Sacrifice is here taken for whatsoever is by God's own appointment dedicated to himself; see 1 Pet. 2. 5. We are both temple, priest, and sacrifice; as Christ was in his peculiar sacrificing. There were sacrifices of atonement, and sacrifices of acknowledgment. Christ is the only sacrifice of atonement, who was once offered to bear the sins of many; but our persons and performances, tendered to God through Christ our priest, are as sacrifices of acknowledgment. Presenting of them denotes a voluntary act, done by virtue of that absolute despotic power, which the will has over the body and all the members of it. It must be a free-will offering. Your bodies; not your beasts. Those legal offerings, as they had their power from Christ, so they had their period in Christ. The presenting of the body to God, implies not only the avoiding of the sins that are committed with or against the body, but the using of the body as a servant of the soul in the service of God. It is to glorify God with our bodies, (1 Cor. 6. 20.) to engage our bodies in the duties of immediate worship, and in a diligent attendance to our particular callings, and to be willing to suffer for God with our bodies, when we are called to it. It is to yield the members of our bodies, as instruments of righteousness, ch. 6. 13. Though bodily exercise alone profits little, yet in its place it is a proof and product of the dedication of our souls to God.

First, Present them a living sacrifice; not killed as the sacrifices under the law. A Christian makes his body a sacrifice to God, though he do not give it to be burned. A body sincerely devoted to God is a living sacrifice.

A living sacrifice; by way of allusion; (that which was dead of itself, might not be eaten, much less sacrificed, Deut. 14. 21.) and by way of opposition; "The sacrifice was to be slain, but you may be sacrificed, and yet live on," an unbloody sacrifice. The barrenness of these sacrifices their children to their idol-gods, not living, but slain sacrifices; but God will have mercy, and not such sacrifice, though life is forfeited to him. A living sacrifice, inspired with the spiritual life of the soul. It is Christ living in the soul by faith, that makes the body a living sacrifice, Gal. 2. 20. Love kindles the sacrifices, puts life into the duties; see ch. 6. 13. Alive, that is, to God, v. 11. Secondly, They must be holy. There is a relative holiness in every sacrifice, as dedicated to God. But beside that, there must be that real holiness, which stands in an entire rectitude of heart and life, by which we are conformed in both to the nature and will of God; even our bodies must not be made the instruments of sin and uncleanness, but set apart for God, and put to holy uses, as the vessels of the tabernacle were holy, being devoted to God's service. It is the soul that is the proper subject of holiness; but a sanctified soul communicates a holiness to the body by its acts and animates. That is holy, which is according to the will of God; when the bodily actions are so, the body is holy. They are the temples of the Holy Ghost, 1 Cor. 6. 19. Possess the body in sanctification, 1 Thess. 4. 4, 5.

First, Consider the mercies of God; I beseech you, be mercies of God. An affectionate entreaty, and which should melt us into a compliance; ti ναι ἀλλήλους ὑπερτερεῖσθαι. This is an argument most sweetly cogent. There is the mercy that is in God, and the mercy that is from God; mercy in the spring, and mercy in the streams: both are included here; but especially gospel-mercies, (mentioned, ch. 11.) the transferring of what the Jews forfeited and lost by their unbelief unto us Gentiles, (Eph. 2. 4-5.) the more merites of David, Isa. 53. 3. God is a merciful God, therefore let us present our bodies to him; he will be sure to use them kindly, and knows how to consider the frames of them, for he is of infinite compassion. We receive from him every day the fruits of his mercy; particularly, mercy to our bodies; he made them, he maintains them, he bought them, he has put a great dignity upon them. It is of the Lord's mercies, that we are not consumed; and our souls are dead in life; and the greatest mercy of all, is that Christ hath made not his body only, but his soul, an offering for sin; that he gave himself for us, and gives himself to us. Now, surely we cannot but be studying what we shall render to the Lord for all this. And what shall we render? Let us render ourselves as an acknowledgment of all these favours; all we are, all we have, all we can do; and after all, it is but very poor returns for very rich receivings: and yet, because it is what we have,

Secondly, It is acceptable to God. The great end we should all labour after, is, to be accepted of the Lord, (2 Cor. 5. 9.) to have him well-pleased with our persons and performances. Now these living sacrifices are acceptable to God; while the sacrifices of the wicked, though fat and costly, are an abomination to God, and the sacrifice of God is acceptable, Isa. 1. 18. God does not impose upon us any thing hard or unreasonable, but that which is altogether agreeable to the nature and will of God.

Thirdly, It is our reasonable service. There is an act of reason in it; for it is the soul that presents the body. Blind devotion, that has ignorance for the mother, is an imbecility of it, is fit to be paid only to those dung-hill gods, that have eyes, and see not. Our God must be served in the spirit and with the understanding. There is all the reason in the world for it, and no good reason can possibly be produced against it. Come now, and let us reason together, Isa. 1. 18. God does not impose upon us any thing hard or unreasonable, but that which is altogether agreeable to the nature and will of God.

To λατρεύειν ἀξιότιτως—your service according to the word; so it may be read. The word of God does not leave out the body in holy worship. That service only is acceptable to God, which is according to the written word. It must be gospel-worship, spiritual worship.

That is a reasonable service, which we are able and ready to give a reason for; in which we understand ourselves. God deals with us as with rational creatures, and will have us so to deal with him. Thus must the body be presented to God.

(2.) The mind must be renewed for him. This is pressed, (v. 2.) "Be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind; see to it that there be a saving change wrought in you, and that it be carried on." Conversion and sanctification are the renewing of the mind, the fitting up of it, not only for the duties of this world, but for the glory of God, in conformity to the image of Christ, into the likeness of God. God uses not the body, but the soul, to make us his children. The mind is the acting, ruling part of us; so that the renewing of that is the renewing of the whole man; for out of it are the issues of life, Prov. 4. 23. The progress of sanctification, dying to sin more and more, and living to righteousness more and more, is the carrying on of this renewing work, till it be perfected in glory.

This is called the transforming of us; it is like pulling on a new shape and figure.

†Be ye transformed; The transfiguration of Christ is expressed by this word, (Matt. 17. 2.) when he put on a heavenly glory, which made his face to shine like the sun; and the same word is used, (2. Cov. 3. 18.) where we are said to be changed into the same image from glory to glory.

This transformation is here pressed as a duty; not that we must change our actions and habits, but our hearts and minds. We could as soon make a new world as make a new heart by any power of our own; it is God's work, Ezek. 11. 19.—36. 27. But be ye transformed, that is, "use the means which God hath appointed and ordained for it." It is God that turns us, and then we are turned; but we must frame our doings to turn, Hes. 3. 4. "Lay your souls under the changing transforming influences of the blest Spirit; seek unto God by faith to make the use of all the means of grace."

Though the new man be created of God, yet we must put it on, (Eph. 4. 24.) and be pressing forward toward perfection.

Now in this verse we may further observe,

[1.] What is the great enemy to this renewing, which we must avoid; and that is, conformity to this world; Be not conformed to this world. All the discourses of the apostles (especially Colossians) are against conformity to the world. More persons are conformed to the world than we believe.

Do not fashion yourselves according to the world. We must not conform to the things of the world; they are mutable, and the fashion of them is passing away; do not conform either to the lusts of the flesh, or the lusts of the eye. We must not conform to the men of the world, of that world which lies in wickedness; not walk according to the course of this world, Eph. 2. 2.) that is, we must not follow a multitude to do evil, Exod. 23. 2. If sinners entice us, we must not consent to them, but in our places witness against them. Nay even in things indifferent, and which are not in themselves sinful, we must so far not conform to the custom and way of the world, as not to act by the world's dictates as our chief rule, nor to aim at the world's favours as our highest end.

True Christianity consists much in a sober singularity; we must adopt, and by the force of the extreme of affected rudeness and moneroseness, which some run into. In civil things, the light of nature and the custom of nations take place for our conduct; and the rule of the gospel in those cases is a rule of direction, not a rule of contraries.

[2.] What is the great effect of this renewing, which we must labour after; That ye may prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect, will of God. By the will of God here we are to understand his revealed will concerning our duty, what the Lord our God requires of us. This is the will of God in general, even our sanctification: that will which we pray may be done by us as it is done by the angels; especially his will, as it is revealed in the New Testament, where he hath in these last days spoken to us by his Son. He will with his Son, will that God is good, and acceptable, and perfect: three excellent properties of a law. It is good, (Mic. 6. 8.) it is exactly consonant to the eternal reason of good and evil. It is good in itself, it is good for us. Some think the evangelical law is here called good, in distinction from the ceremonial law, which consisted of statutes that were not good, Ezek. 20. 25. It is acceptable, it is pleasing to God; that and this only is so, which is prescribed by him. The only way to attain his favour as the end, is to conform to his will as the rule. It is perfect, to which nothing can be added. The revealed will of God is a sufficient rule of faith and practice, containing all things which tend to the perfection of the man of God, to furnish us thoroughly to every good work, 2 Tim. 3. 16, 17.}

us to work, but by sitting still quietly when he calls us to suffer. Patience for God's sake, and with an eye to his will and glory, is true piety. Observe, Those that rejoice in hope, are likely to be patient in tribulation. It is a believing prospect of the joy set before us, that bears up the spirit under all outward necessities.

(5.) Continuing instant in prayer. Prayer is a friend to hope and patience, and we do in it serve the Lord. It signifies both fervency and perseverance in prayer. We should not be cold in the duty, nor soon weary of it, Luke 18. 1. 1 Thess. 3. 17. Eph. 6. 18. Col. 4. 2. This is our duty, which immediately respects God.

To God, we owe our duty which respects ourselves; this is sobriety.

1. A sober opinion of ourselves, v. 3. It is ushered in with a solemn preface: I say, through the grace given unto me: the grace of wisdom, by which he understood the necessity and excellency of this duty; the grace of apostleship, by which he had authority to press and enjoy it. "I say it, who am commissioned to say it, in God's name. I say it, and it is made known to me.*

It is said to every one of us, one as well as another. Pride is a sin that is bred in the bone with all of us, and we have therefore each of us need to be cautioned and armed against it. Not to think of himself more highly than he ought to think. We must take heed of having too great an opinion of ourselves, or putting too high a valuation upon our own judgments, abilities, persons, performances. We must not be self-conceited, not esteem too much our own wisdom and other attainments; not think ourselves to be something, Gal. 6. 3. There is a high thought of ourselves, which we may and must have, to think ourselves too good to be the slaves of sin and drudges to this world. But, on the other hand, we should think soberly, we must have a low and modest opinion of ourselves and our own abilities, our gifts and graces, according to what we have received from God, and not otherwise; not to be confident and hot in matters of doubtful disputations; not stretch ourselves beyond our line; not judge and.censure those that differ from us; not desire to make a fair shew in the flesh. These and the like are the fruits of a sober opinion of ourselves.

The words will bear yet another sense agreeable enough. Of himself; is not in the original; therefore it may be read, That no man be wise above what he is wise to be wise; but, be wise according to sobriety. We must not exercise ourselves in things too high for us, (Ps. 131. 1, 2.) not intrude into those things which we have not seen, (Col. 2. 18.) those secret things which belong not to us, (Deut. 29. 29.) not covet to be wise above what is written. There is a knowledge that puff's up, which reaches after forbidden fruit. We must take heed of that, and labour after that knowledge which tends to sobriety, to the rejection of self-conceit, and the restoring of the mind.

Some understand it of the sobriety which keeps us in our own place and station, from intruding into the gifts and offices of others. See an instance of this sober, modest care in the exercise of the greatest spiritual gifts, 2 Cor. 10. 13-15.

To this head refers also that exhortation, (v. 16.) Be not wise in your own conceits. It is good to be wise, to have our own wisdom, and to make use of it; yet, for there is more hope of a fool, than of his own wisdom, to be wise in his own eyes. It was an excellent thing for Moses to have his face shine, and not know it.

Now the reasons why we must have such a sober opinion of ourselves, and our own abilities and attainments, are these:

What have we that we have not received? And if we have received it, why then do we boast? 1 Cor. 4. 7. The best and most useful man in the world is no more, no better, than what the free grace of God makes him every day. When we are thinking of ourselves, We must remember we have attained, as though our might and the power of our hand had gotten us these gifts; but think how kind God hath been to us, for it is he that gives us power to do any thing that is good, and in him is all our sufficiency.*

(2.) Because God doth out his gifts in a certain measure; according to the measure of faith. Observe, the measure of spiritual gifts he calls the measure of faith; that is, the measure of God's grace. What we have and do, that is good, is so far right and acceptable as it is founded in faith, and flows from faith, and no further. Now, faith and other spiritual gifts with it are dealt by measure, according as Infinite Wisdom sees meet for us. Christ had the Spirit given him without measure, John 3. 34. But the saints have it by measure, see Eph. 4. 7. Christ, who had gifts without measure, was meek and lowly and still we, that are stunted, be proud and self-conceited?

(5.) Because God has dealt out gifts to others, as well as to us: Dealt to every man. Had we the monopoly of the Spirit, or a patent to be sole proprietors of spiritual gifts, there might be some pretence for this conceit of ourselves; but others have their share as well as we, God is a common Father, and Christ a common Root, to all the saints, who all derive virtue from him; and therefore it all becomes us to lift up ourselves, and to despise others, as if we only were the people in favour with Heaven, and wisdom should die with us.

This reasoning he illustrates by a comparison taken from the members of the natural body; (as 1 Cor. 12. 12. Eph. 4. 16.) As we have many members in one body, &c. v. 4, 5. Here observe,

[1.] All the parts are not members of the same Christ, who is the Head of the body, and the common Centre of their unity. Believers lie not in the world as a confused disorderly heap, but are organized and knit together, as they are united to one common Head, and acted and animated by one common Spirit.

[2.] Particular believers are members of this body, constituent parts, which speak them less than the whole; and in relation to the whole, deriving life and spirits from the head, the members; and the body are bigger and more useful than others, and each receives spirits from the head according to its proportion. If the little finger should receive as much nourishment as the leg, how unseemly and prejudicial would it be! We must remember, that we are not the whole; we think above what is meet, if we think so; we are but parts and members.

[3.] All the members have not the same office, (v. 4.) but each part has its gifts and graces assigned to it. The office of the eye is to see, the office of the hand is to work, &c. So in the mystical body, some are qualified for, and called to, one sort of work; others are, in like manner, fitted for, and called to, another sort of work. Magistrates, ministers, and people, in a christian commonwealth, have their several offices, and must not intrude one upon another, or clash in the discharge of their several offices.

[4.] Each member hath its place and office, for the good and benefit of the whole, and of every other member. We are not only members of Christ, but we are members one of another, v. 5. We stand in relation one to another; we are engaged to do all the good we can one to another, and to act in conjunction for the common benefit. See this illustrated at large, 1 Cor. 12. 14, &c. Therefore we must not be puffed up with a conceit of our own attainments, because, whatever we have, as we received it, so we received it not for ourselves, but for the good of others.

2. A sober use of the gifts that God hath given us. As we must not on the one hand be proud of our talents, so on the other hand we must not bury them. Take heed lest, under a pretense of humility and self-denial, we be slothful in laying out ourselves for the good of others. We must not say, "I am nothing, therefore I will sit still, and do nothing;" but, "I am nothing in myself, and therefore I will lay out my self in the utmost in the strength of the grace of Christ." He specifies the ecclesiastical offices appointed in particular churches; in the discharge of which, each must study to do his own duty, for the preserving of order, and the promoting of edification in the church; each knowing his place, and fulfilling it.

Gifts differing. The immediate design is different, though the ultimate tendency of all is the same. According to the grace, χρήσιμα κατά τίνα χρήσιν. The free grace of God is the spring and original of all the gifts that are meant by the word grace. To appoint the office, qualifies and inclines the person, works both to will and to do. There were in the primitive church extraordinary gifts of tongues, of discerning, of healing; but he speaks here of those that are ordinary. Compare 1 Cor. 12. 4. 1 Tim. 4. 14. 1 Pet. 4. 10.

Seven particular gifts he specifies, (v. 6—8.) which seem to be meant of so many distinct offices, and duties. He had spoken (v. 3.) of the nature of faith, which is every body's work, is no body's work; and he despatches his business best, that is vir unus negotii—attends to one thing. Thus David sorted the Levites; (1 Chron. 23. 4, 5.) and in this, wisdom is profitable to direct. The five latter will therefore be reduced to the two first.

(1.) Prophesy. Whether prophesy, let us prophesy according to the proportion of faith. It is not meant of the extraordinary gifts of foretelling things to come, but the ordinary office of preaching the word; so prophesying is taken, 1 Cor. 14. 1—3, &c. 1 Cor. 11. 4. 1 Thess. 5. 20. The work of the Old Testament prophets was not only to foretell future things, but to warn the people concerning sin and duty, and to be their remembrancers concerning that which they knew before. And thus gospel-preachers are prophets, and do indeed, as far as the revelation of the word goes, foretell things to come. Prophesy refers to the eternal condition of the children of men, points directly at a future state.

Now those that preach the word, must do it according to the proportion of faith—κατά τίνα διαλειπτεῖαι τίνος; that is, [1.] As to the manner of our prophesying, it must be according to the proportion of the grace of faith, for he that prophesies with the Spirit is edified—and he that prophesies edifies all. Moreover, it must be according to the proportion of the grace of faith, for he that prophesies with the Spirit is edified—and he that prophesies edifies all. Furthermore, it must be according to the proportion of the grace of faith, for he that prophesies with the Spirit is edified—and he that prophesies edifies all. Finally, it must be according to the proportion of the grace of faith, for he that prophesies with the Spirit is edified—and he that prophesies edifies all. And therefore we must allow others to have a share of knowledge and ability to instruct, as well as we, even those that in lesser things differ from us. "Hast thou faith? Have it to thyself; and do not make it a ruling rule to others, remembering that thou hast but thy proportion."

[2.] As to the matter of our prophesying, it must be according to the proportion of the doctrine of faith, as it is revealed in the holy scriptures of the Old and New Testament. By this rule of faith the Bereans tried Paul's preaching, Acts 17. 11. Compare Acts 26. 22. Gal. 1. 9. There are some simple-true words, as I may call them; some prima axioma—first axioms, plainly and uniformly taught in the scripture, which are the touchstone of preaching, by which (though we must not despise prophesying,) we must prove all things, that which is good, 1 Thess. 5. 20. 21. Truths that are more dark, must be examined by those that are more clear; and then entertained, when they are found to agree and comport with the analogy of faith; for it is certain, one truth can never contradict another.

See here what ought to be the great care of preachers—to teach sound doctrine, according to the form of wholesome words, Tit. 2. 8. 2 Tim. 1. 13. It is not so necessary that the prophesying be according to the proportion of art, the rules of logic and rhetoric; but it is necessary that it be according to the proportion of faith: for it is the word of faith that we preach.

Now there are two particular works, which he that prophesieth hath to mind—teaching and exhorting; prophesieth to be done by the same person, at the same time, and when he is called; he gives the man mind that; when he does the other, let him do that too as well as he can. If, by agreement between the ministers of a congregation, this work be divided, either constantly or interchangeably, so that one teaches and the other exhorts, is, (in our modern dialect,) one expounds, and the other preaches, let each do his work according to the proportion of faith.

First, Let him that teacheth wait on teaching. Teaching is the bare explaining and proving of gospel-truths, without practical application, as in the expounding of the scripture. Pastors and teachers are the same office, (Eph. 4. 11.) but the particular work somewhat different. Now he that has a faculty of teaching, and has undertaken that province, let him stick to it. It is a good gift, let him use it, and give his mind to it. He that teacheth, let him be in his teaching; so some supply it, ὁ διδάσκων, ἐν τῇ διδασκαλίᾳ. Let him be frequent and constant, and diligent in it; let him abide in that which is his proper work, and be in it as his element. See 1 Tim. 4. 15. 16. where it is explained by two words, ἐν τῷ τόπῳ ἑστὶν, and ἐν ταῖς αὐτοῖς, ἐν τοῖς τοῖς ἔχουσιν, ἐν ταῖς αὐτοῖς, ἐν τοῖς ἔχουσιν, in those things and continue in them.

Secondly, Let him that exhorteth, wait on exhortation. Let him give himself to that. This is the work of the pastor, as the former of the teacher; to apply gospel-truths and rules more closely to the case and condition of the people, and to press upon them that which is more practical. Many that are very accurate in teaching, may yet be very cold and unskilful in exhorting; and on the contrary. The one requires a clearer head, the other a warmer heart. Now where these gifts are evidently separated, (that is, the one exerts itself in teaching and the other in the other;) it conduces to edification to divide the work accordingly; and whatsoever the work is, that we undertake, let us mind it.

To wait on our work, is to bestow the best of our time and thoughts, if there be any occasion, to lay hold on all opportunities for it, and study, not only to do it, but to do it well.

(2.) Ministry. If a man hath office — the office of a deacon, or assistant to the pastor and teacher, let him use that office well; a churchwarden, (suppose,) an elder, or an overseer of the poor; and perhaps there were more put into these offices, and there was more solemnity in them, and a greater stress of care and business laid upon them in the primitive churches, than we are now well aware of, and includes all those offices which concern the business of the house of God. See Neh. 11. 16. Serving tables, Acts 6. 2. Now he on whom this care of ministering is devolved, let him attend to it with faithfulness and diligence; particularly,

[1.] He that giveth, let him give it with simplicity. Some church-officers, that were the stewards of the church’s alms, collected money, and distributed it in as the necessities of the poor were; let them do it liberally—liberally and faithfully; not converting what they receive, to their own use, or distributing it with any sinister design, or with respect of persons: not froward and peevish with the poor, or seeking pretences to put them by; but with all sincerity and integrity, having no other intention in it than to glorify God, and do good.

Some in general do it in almsgiving; He that hath wherewithal, let him give, and give plentifully and liberally; so the word is translated, 2 Cor. 8. 2.—9.13. God loves a cheerful, bountiful giver.

[2.] He that ruleth, with diligence. It should seem, he means those that were assistants to the pastors, in exercising church-discipline, as their eyes, and hands, and mouth, in the government of the church; or those ministers that in the congregation in word, and that are and apply themselves to this ruling work; for we find those ruling, that laboured in the word and doctrine, 1 Tim. 5. 17. Now such must do it with diligence. It denotes both care and industry to discover what is amiss, to remove those that go astray, to reprove and admonish those that are fallen, to keep the church pure. Those must take a great deal of pains, that will approve themselves faithful in the discharge of this trust, and will not let any opportunity that may facilitate and advance that work.

[3.] He that showeth mercy, with cheerfulness. Some think it is meant in general of all that in any thing shew mercy; let them be willing to it, and take a pleasure in it; God loves a cheerful giver. But it seems to be meant of some particular church-officers, whose work it was to take care of the sick, and strangers; and they were generally widows, that were in that matter servants to the church; deaconeses; (1 Tim. 5. 9, 10.) though others, it is likely might be employed. Now this must be done with cheerfulness. A pleasing countenance in acts of mercy is a great relief and comfort to the miserable; when they see it is not done grudgingly and unwillingly, but with pleasant looks and gentle words, and all possible indications of readiness and alacrity. Those that have to do with them who are sick and sore, and commonly cross and peevish, have need to put on not only patience, but cheerfulness, to make the work the more easy and pleasant to them, and the more acceptable to God.

III. Concerning that part of our duty which respects our brethren: of which we have many instances, in brief exhortations.

Now all our duty towards one another, is summed up in the word, love. Love is that laid the foundation of all our mutual duty; and therefore he mentions that first, which is the love of Christ’s disciples, and the great law of our religion: Let love be without dissimulation: not in compliment and pretence, but in reality: *not in word and tongue only, 1 John 3. 18. The right love is the love of God, and not as the perfidious enemy, which are deceitful. We should be glad of an opportunity to prove the sincerity of our love, 2 Cor. 8. 8.

More particularly, there is a love owing to our friends, and to our enemies. He specifies both.

1. To our friends. He that hath friends, must shew himself friendly. There is a mutual love that christians owe, and must pay.

(1.) An affectionate love: *towards another, love, 1 John 3. 18; it signifies not only love, but a readiness and inclination to love; the most genuine and free affection, kindness flowing out as from a spring. It properly denotes the love of parents to their children; which as it is the most tender, so it is the most natural, of any other; unforced, unconstrained; such must our love be to one another; and such it will be, where there is a new nature, and the law of love is written in the heart. This kind affection puts us on to express ourselves both in word and action with the most courtesy and obligingness that may be. One to another. This may recommend the grace of love to us, that, as it is made our duty to love others, so it is as much their duty to love us. And what can be sweeter on this side heaven, than to love and be beloved? He that thus watereth, shall be watered also of himself.

(2.) A respectful love: *In honour preferring one another. Instead of contending for superiority, let us be forward to give to others the pre-eminence. This is explained, Phil. 2. 3. Let each esteem other better than themselves.

And there is this good reason for it, because, if we know our own hearts, we know more evil by ourselves than we do by any one else in the world. We should be forward to take note of the good in others, encouraging brothers and sisters in their work and practice, that is done in the church, as well as elsewhere; and thereby we shall encourage each other, and not discourage each other; which is what we should have no need of, if we were all in these ways, and there is no progress as there is occasion. Let all your contention be, which shall be most humble, and useful, and condescending.” So the sense is the same with Tit. 3. 14. Let them learn, that it is better to go before in good works. For though we must prefer others (as our translation reads it,) and put on others, as more capable and deserving than ourselves, yet we must not make that an excuse for our lying by, and doing nothing, nor, under a pretence of honouring others, and their serviceableness and performances, indulge ourselves in ease and slothfulness. Therefore he immediately adds, (v. 11.) Not slothful in business.

(3.) A liberal love: v. 13. Distributing to the necessities of saints. It is but a mock love, which rests in the verbal expressions of kindness and respect, while the wants of our brethren call for real supplies, and it is in the power of our hands to furnish them.

[1.] It is no strange thing for saints in this world to want necessaries for the support of their natural life. In those primitive times, prevailing persecutions must needs reduce many of the suffering saints to great extremities; and still, the poor, even the poor saints, we have always with us. Surely the things of this world are not the best things; if they were, they who have the favours of heaven would not be put off with so little of them.

[2.] It is the duty of those who have wherewitha, to distribute, or (as it might better be read,) to communicate to those necessities. It is not enough to draw out the soul, but we must draw out the purse, to the hungry. See Jam. 2. 15, 16. 1 John 3. 17.

Co-operating—possible. It intimates that our poor brethren have a kind of interest in that which God hath given us; and that our relieving of them should come from a sense and fellow-feeling of their wants, as though we suffered with them. The charitable benevolence of the Philippians to Paul, is called their communicating with his affliction, Phil. 4. 14.

We must be ready, as we have ability and opportunity, to relieve any that are in want; but we are in a special manner bound to communicate to the saints. There is a common love owing to our fellow-creatures, but a special love owing to our fellow-christians; (Gal. 6. 10.) Especially to them who are of the household of faith.

Communicating. ταῖς μνήμεσιν—to the memories of the saints; so some of the ancients read it, instead of, as in our version, οἱ μνήμεσιν. It intimates, therefore, that so much of the convenience of common insns as we have; or the wandering christians durst not frequent them; or they had not wherewithal to bear the charges; and therefore it was a special kindness to bid them welcome on free-cost. Nor is it yet an antiquated, superseded duty; as there is occasion, we must welcome strangers, for we know not the heart of a stranger. I was a stranger, and ye took me in, (1. Cor. viii. 1.) in the instance of the merciful-ness of those that shall obtain mercy: τοιοῦτοι μοι ἐξαναμένοι—following or pursuing hospitality. It intimates, not only that we must take opportunity, but that we must seek opportunity, thus to shew mercy. As Abraham, who sat at the tent-door, (Gen. 18. 1.) and Lot, who sat in the gate of Sodom, (Gen. 19. 1.) expecting travellers, whom they might meet; or rather, as a kind of invitation, and so they entertained angels unawares, Heb. 13. 2.

(4.) A sympathizing love; (v. 15.) Rejoice with them that do rejoice, and weep with them that weep. Where there is a mutual love between the members of the mystical body, there will be such a fellow-feeling. See 1 Cor. 12. 26. True love will interest us in the sorrows and joys of one another, and teach us to make them our own. Observe the common mixture of joy and sorrow, in our compassion; (as the people, Ezra 3. 12, 13.) for the trial, as of other graces, so of brotherly love and christian sympathy. Not that we must participate in the sinful mirths or mournings of any, but only in just and reasonable sorrows and joys: not envying those that prosper, but rejoicing with them; truly glad that others have the success and comfort which we have not; not despising those that are in trouble, but concerned for them, and ready to help them, as being ourselves in the body. This is to do as God does; who not only has pleasure in the prosperity of his servants, (Ps. 35. 27.) but is likewise afflicted in all their afflictions, Isa. 63. 9.

(5.) A united love; "Be of the same mind one toward another; (v. 16.) labour, as much as you can, to agree in apprehension; and wherein you come short of that, yet agree in affection; endeavour to be all one, not affecting to clash, and contradict, and thwart one another; but keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace, Phil. 2. 2.—3. 15, 16. 1 Cor. 1. 10. τῇ ἑν ἐνία πνεύμα—wishing the same good to others, that you do to yourselves;" so some understand it. This is to love our brethren as ourselves, desiring their welfare as our own.

(6.) A love that is not confined to things, but "condescend to men of low estate, v. 16. True love cannot be without lowliness, Eph. 4. 1, 2. Phil. 2. 3. When our Lord Jesus washed his disciples' feet, to teach us brotherly love, (John 13. 5.—14. 34.) it was designed especially to intimate to us, that to love one another aright, is to be willing to stoop to the meanest offices of kindness for the good of one another. Love is a condescending grace; Non bene conuenit arie—majestas et amor—Majesty and love do but ill assort with each other. Observe how it is pressed here:

[1.] Mind not high things. We must not be ambitious of honour and preferment, nor look upon worldly pomp and dignity with any inordinate value or desire, but rather with a holy contempt. When David's advancements were high, his spirit was low; Prov. 15. 11.) I do not exercise myself in great matters. The Romans, living in the imperial city, which reigned over the kings of the earth, (Rev. 17. 18.) and was at that time in the meridian of its splendour, were perhaps ready to take occasion from thence to think the better of themselves. Even the holy seed were tainted with this leaven. Roman christians would be ready to look scornfully upon other christians, as some citizens do upon the countrymen of other cities; Prov. 28. 22.) there were many of them against higher-mindedness; compare ch. 9. 10. They lived near the court, and conversed daily with the gaiety and grandeur of it; "Well," saith he, "do not mind it, be not in love with it."

[2.] Condescend to men of low estate—Τὸ ταυτός εὐαγγελίζειν. First, It may be meant of mean things, to which we must condescend. If our condition in the world be poor and mean and despised, as the apostle means, our employments despicable and contemptible, yet we must bring our minds to it, and acquiesce in it. So the margin; Be contented with mean things. Be reconciled to the place which God in his providence hath put us in, whatever it be. We must account nothing below us but sin; stope to mean habitations, mean fare, mean clothing; mean accommodations when they are our lot, and not grudge. Nay, we must be contented with far surpassing mean and contemptible things, for the sake of the new nature, (so the word εὐαγγελίζειν properly signifies, and it is very significant,) toward mean things, when God appoints us to them; as the old corrupt nature is carried out toward high things. We must accommodate ourselves to mean things. We should make a low condition and mean circumstances more the centre of our desires, than a high condition.

Secondly, It may be meant of mean persons; so we read it, (I think both are to be included,) Condescend to men of low estate. We must associate ourselves with, and accommodate ourselves to, those that are poor and mean in the world, if they be such as fear God. David, though a king upon the throne, was a companion for all such, (Ps. 119. 63.) We need not be ashamed to converse with the lowly, while the great God overlooks heaven and earth, to look at such. True love values grace in rags as well as in scarlet. A jewel is a jewel, though it lie in the dirt. The contrary to this condescension is reproved, Jam. 2. 1—4. Condescend; suit yourselves to them, stope to them for their good; as Paul, 1 Cor. 9. 19, 20. Some think the original word is a metaphor taken from travellers, who those that are stronger and swifter of foot, stay for the lessened and feeble, and give them a halt, and take them with him; thus must christians be tender toward their fellow-travellers.

As a means to promote this, he adds, Be not wise in your own conceits; to the same purport with v.
3. We shall never find in our hearts to condescend to others, while we find there so great a conceit of ourselves: and therefore, that must needs be mortified. Nay, first: opium, nay is it worth— Be not wise by yourselves, be not confident of the sufficiency of your own wisdom, so as to despise others, or think you have no need of them, (Prov. 3. 7.) nor be shy of communicating what you have to others. We are members one of another, depend upon one another, are obliged to one another; and therefore, Be not wise by yourselves; remembering it is the merchandise of wisdom that we profess; how merchandise consists in commerce, receiving and returning—

(7.) A love that engages us, as much as *lives in us, to live peaceably with all men, v. 18. Even those with whom we cannot live intimately and familiarly, by reason of distance in degree or profession; yet we must with such live peaceably, we must be harmless and inoffensive, not giving others occasion to quarrel with us; and we must be gall-less and unrevengeful, not taking occasion to quarrel with them. Thus must we labour to preserve the peace, that it be not broken, and to piece it again, when it is broken. The wisdom from above is pure and peaceable. Observe how the exhortation is limited. It is not expressed so as to oblige us to impossibilities; if it be possible, as much as lives in you. Thus Heb. 12. 14. Follow peace. Eph. 2. 1. 3. Endeavouring to keep.

It is possible. It is not possible to preserve the peace, when we cannot do it without offending God and wounding conscience: Id possumus quod puris possumus—That is possible, which is possible without occurring blame. The wisdom that is from above, is first pure, and then peaceable, Jam. 3. 17. Peace without purity, is the peace of the devil's palace. As much as lieth in you.

It must be two words to the bargain of peace. We can but speak for ourselves. We may be unavoidably striven with; as Jeremiah, who was a man of contention. (Jer. 15. 10.) and that we cannot help: our care must be, that nothing be wanting on our parts, to preserve the peace, Ps. 120. 7. I am for peace, though, when I speak, they are for war.

2. To our enemies. Since men became enemies to God, they have become enemies to one another. Let but the centre of love once forsaken, and the lines will either clash and interfere, or be at an uncomfortable distance. And of all men, those that embrace religion have reason to expect to meet with enemies in a world whose words smiles seldom concur with Christ's.

Now Christianity teaches us how to behave towards our enemies; and in this instruction it quite differs from all other rules and methods, which generally aim at victory and domination; but this at inward peace and satisfaction. Whoever are our enemies, that wish us ill, and seek to do us ill, our rule is, to do them no hurt, but all the good we can.

(1.) To do them no hurt; (v. 17.) Recompense to no man evil for evil. For that is a brutish recompense, and befitting only those animals, which are not sensible, or are not able to understand, or be enemies to any state before them. Or if mankind were made (as some dream) in a state of war, such recompeneses as these were agreeable enough; but we have not so learned God, who does so much for his enemies, (Matt. 5. 43.) much less have we so learned Christ, who died for us when we were enemies, (ch. 5. 8, 10.) loved that world, which had hated and been a cause to hate us.

To no man; neither to Jew nor Greek; not to one that has been thy friend, for by recompensing evil for evil, thou wilt certainly lose him; not to one that has been thine enemy, for by not recompensing evil for evil, thou mayest perhaps gain him.

To the same purport, v. 19. Deary beloved, avenge not yourselves. And why must this be ushered in with such an affectation of politeness, rather than any other of the exhortations of this chapter? Surely, because this is intended for the composing of angry spirits, that are hot in the resentment of a provocation. He addresses himself to such in this enduring language, to mollify and qualify them. Any thing that breathes love, sweetness the blood, lays the storm, and cools the temperate heat. Would you pacify a brother offended? All him that is not offended, or if the evil spoken, may be effectual to turn away wrath.

Avenge not yourselves: when any body has done you any ill turn, do not desire or endeavour to bring the like mischief or inconvenience upon him. It is not forbidden to the magistrate to right those that are wronged, by punishing the wrong-doer; or to make and execute just and wholesome laws against malefactors; but it forbids private revenge, which flows from anger and ill-will; and this is fitly forbidden, for it is presumed that we are incompetent judges in our own case. Nay, if persons wronged in seeking the defence of the law, and magistrates in granting it, act from any particular personal pique or quarrel, and not from a concern that public peace and order be maintained, and right done; even such proceedings, though seemingly regular, will fall under this prohibition of revenge.

See now the direct purpose of Christ is this matter, Matt. 5. 38—40. It is forbidden not only to take it into our own hands to avenge ourselves, but to desire and thirst after even that judgment in our case, which the law affords, for the satisfying of a revengeful humour.

This is a hard lesson to corrupt nature; and therefore he subjoins,

[4.] But truly against it; Rather give place unto wrath. Not to our own wrath; to give place to that, is to give place to the devil, Eph. 4. 26, 27. We must resist and stifle, and smoother, and suppress that; but, First, To the wrath of our enemy. Give place to it, be of a yielding temper, do not answer wrath with wrath, but with love yielding. Pacifies great offences, Eccl. 10. 4. Receive affronts and injuries, as a stone is received into the ground, and there it cools and does not rebound back, or go any further. So it explains that of our Saviour, (Matt. 5. 39.) Whoever shall smite thee on the right cheek, turn to him the other also. Instead of meditating how to revenge one wrong, prepare to receive another. When men's passions are up, and the stream is strong, let it have its course; lest by an unseasonable opposition it be made to rage and swell the more. When others are angry, let us be calm; this is a remedy against revenge, and seems to be the genuine sense. But, Secondly, Many apply it to the wrath of God; Give place to that, make room for him to take the throne of judgment, and let him alone to deal with thine adversary.

To him it belongs to administer justice; for, being a God of infinite knowledge, by him actions are weighed in unerring balances; and, being a God of infinite purity, he hates sin and cannot endure to look upon iniquity. Some of this power he hath trusted in the hands of the civil magistrates; (Gen. 9. 6. ch. 13. 4.) their legal punishments therefore will be looked upon as a branch of God's revengings. This is a good reason, why we should not avenge ourselves; for if vengeance be God's, then, First, We may not do it. We step into the throne of God, if we do, and take his work out of his hand.
Secondly, We need not do it, for God will, if we meekly leave the matter with him; he will avenge us as far as there is reason and justice for it; and further we cannot desire it. See Ps. 38. 14. 15. I heard not, for thou wilt hear; and what need is there for me to hear, and God hear too.

(2.) We must not only not do hurt to our enemies, but our relatives and our friends; and teaches us to do them all the good we can. It is a command peculiar to Christianity, and which does highly commend it; Love your enemies. Matt. 5. 44. We are here taught to shew that love to them, both in word and deed.

[1.] In word; (v. 14.) Bless them who persecute you. It has been the common lot of God's people, to be thus treated, with a spiteful tongue. Now we are here taught to bless those that so persecute us. Bless them; First, “Speak well of them. If there be any thing in them, that is commendable and praise-worthy, take notice of it, and mention it to their honour.” Secondly, “Speak respectfully to them, according as their place is; not rendering railing for railing, and bitterness for bitterness.” And, Thirdly, We must wish them well, though they have been our enemies, so far from seeking any revenge. Nay, Fourthly, We must offer up that desire to God, by prayer for them. If it be not in the power of our hand to do any thing else for them, yet we can testify our good will by praying for them; for which our master hath given us not only a rule, but an example to back that rule, Luke 23. 34.

Bless, and curse not. It denotes a thorough good-will in all the instances and expressions of it; not, “Bless them when you are at prayer, and curse them at other times;” but, “Bless them always, and curse not at all.” Cursing ill becomes the mouth of those whose work it is to bless God, and whose happiness it is to be blessed of him.

[2.] In deed; (v. 20.) “If thine enemy hunger, as thou hast ability and opportunity, be ready and forward to shew him any kindness, and do him any office of love for his good; and never the less forward for having been thine enemy, but rather the more that thou mayest thereby testify the sincerity of thy forgiving of him.” It was said of Archbishop Cranmer, that the way for a man to make his friend, was to do him an ill turn. It is quoted from Prov. 25. 21, 22. So that, high a precept as it seems to be, the Old Testament was not behind the New in such a thing. First, What we must do. We must do good to our enemies. “If he hunger, do not insult over him, and say, ‘Now God is avenging me of him, and pleading my cause,’ do not make such a construction of his wants. But feed him. Then, when he has need of thine help, and thou hast an opportunity of helping him, and trampling upon him, then feed him,” (4-wax εἰπότα, a significant word,) “feed him carefully and indigently;” frustration faster—feed him with small pieces; “feed him, as we do children and sick people, with much tenderness. Contrive to do it so as to express thy love. If he thirst, give him drink: τρίτε ὕδῶν—drink to him, in token of reconciliation and friendship. So confirm your love to him.” Secondly, Why we must do this. Because in so doing, thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head. Two senses are given of this, which I think are both to be taken in disjunctively. Thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head; that is, “Thou shalt either.” 1. “Melt him into repentance and friendship, and mollify his spirit toward thee;” alluding to those who melt metals; they not only put fire under them, but heap fire upon them; thus Saul was melted and conquered with the kindness of David, 1 Sam. 24. 16.—26. 21. “thou wilt win a friend by it, and if thy kindness have not that effect, then,” 2. “It will aggravate his condemnation, and make his malice against thee the more inexusable. Thou wilt hereby hasten upon him the tokens of God's wrath and vengeance.” Not that this must be our intention in shewing him kindness, but, for our concernment, such will be the effect.

To this purpose is the exhortation in the last verse, which suggests a paradox not easily understood by the world; that in all matters of sin and contention, those that revenge are the conquered; and those that forgive are the conquerors.

(1.) “Be not overcome of evil.” Let not the evil of any provocation that is given you, have such a power over you, or make such an impression upon you; as to make you think, that anything you do, or will do, to disturb your peace, to destroy your love, to ruffle and discompose your spirits, to transport you to any indecencies, or to bring you to study or endeavour any revenge.” He that cannot quietly bear an injury, is perfectly conquered by it.

(2.) “But overcome evil with good;” with the good of patience and forbearance, nay, and of kindness and beneficence to those that wrong you; learn to bear defeat their ill designs against you, and either to change them, or however to preserve your own peace.” He that hath this rule over his spirit, is better than the mighty.

To conclude, there remain two exhortations yet untouched, which are general, and which recommend all the rest as good in themselves, and of good report.

[1.] As good in themselves; (v. 9.) “Abhor that which is evil, cleave to that which is good.” God hath shewed us what is good; these Christian duties here enjoined; and that is evil, which is opposite to them. Now observe, First, We must not only do evil, but we must abhor that which is evil. We must hate sin with an utter and irreconcilable hatred; have an antipathy to it as the worst of evils, contrary to our new nature, and to our true interest; hating all the appearances of sin, even the garment spotted with the flesh.

Secondly, We must not only do that which is good, but we must cleave to it. It denotes a deliberate choice of, a sincere affection for, and a constant perseverance in, that which is good. “So cleave to it, as not to be allured or affrighted from it, cleave to him that is good, even to the Lord, (Acts 11. 23.)” With delight and perseverance, and yield not to the precept of brotherly love, as directive of it; we must love our brethren, but not love them so much as for their sakes to commit any sin, or omit any duty; not think the better of any sin for the sake of the person that commits it, but forsake all the friends in the world, to cleave to God and duty.

[2.] As of good report; (v. 17.) “Provide things honest in the sight of all men;” do not only do, but study and forecast and take care to do, that which is amiable and creditable, and recommends religion to all with whom you converse.” See Phil. 4. 8. These acts of charity and beneficence are in a special manner of good report among men; and therefore are to be industriously followed by all that consult the glory of God, and the credit of their profession.

There are three good lessons taught us in this chapter, where the apostle enlarges more upon his precepts than he had done in the foregoing chapter, finding them more to be fully pressed. I. A lesson of subjection to lawful authority, v. 1. 6. II. A lesson of justice and love to our brethren, v. 7. 10. 11. A lesson of sobriety and godliness in ourselves, v. 11, to the end.
1. Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers. For there is no power but of God: the powers that be are ordained of God. 2. Whosoever therefore resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God: and they that resist shall receive to themselves damnation. 3. For rulers are not a terror to good works, but to the evil. Wilt thou then not be afraid of the power? Do that which is good, and thou shalt have praise of the same: 4. For he is the minister of God to thee for good. But if thou do that which is evil, be afraid; for he beareth not the sword in vain: for he is the minister of God, a revenger to execute wrath upon him that doeth evil. 5. Wherefore ye must needs be subject, not only for wrath, but also for conscience' sake. 6. For this cause pay ye tribute also: for they are God's ministers, attending continually upon this very thing.

We are here taught how to conduct ourselves toward magistrates, and those that are in authority over us; called here, the higher powers; intimating their authority, they are powers; and their dignity, they are higher powers; including not only the king as supreme, but all inferior magistrates under him: and yet it is expressed, not by the persons that are in that power, but the place of power itself, in which they are. However the persons themselves may be wicked, and of those vile persons which the citizen of Zion contemneth, (Ps. 15. 4.) yet the just power which they have must be submitted to and obeyed.

He had taught us, in the foregoing chapter, not to avenge ourselves, or to recompense evil for evil; lest it should seem as if that did cancel the ordinance of a civil magistrate among Christians, he takes care to assert the necessity of it, and of the duty; in frightened of punishment upon evil doers, however it looks like recompensing evil for evil. Observe I. The duty enjoined; let every soul be subject. Every soul, every person, one as well as another, not excluding the clergy, who call themselves spiritual persons; however the church of Rome does not only exempt such from subjection to the civil powers, but place them in authority above them, making the greatest princes subject to the pope, who thus exalteth himself above all that is called God. Every soul. Not that our consciences are to be subjected to the will of any man. It is God's prerogative to make laws immediately to bind conscience, and we must render to God the things that are God's. But it intimates that our subjection must be free and voluntary, sincere and hearty. Curse not the king, nor in thy thought, Eccl. 10. 20. To obey and to exalt is treason begun.

This subjection of soul here required, includes inward honour, (1 Pet. 2. 17.) and outward reverence and respect, both in speaking to them and in speaking of them; obedience to their commands in things lawful and honest, and in other things a patient subjection to the penalty without resistance; a conformity in every thing to the place and duty of subjects, bringing our minds to the relation and condition, and the inferiority God's ordination of it. "They are higher powers; be content, they should be so, and submit to them accordingly." Now there was good reason for the pressing of this duty of subjection to civil magistrates: 1. Because of the reproach which the Christian religion lay under in the world, as an enemy to public peace, order, and government; as a sect that turned the world upside down, and the embroilers of it, enemies to Cæsar, and the more because the leaders were Galileans; an old slander; Jerusalem was represented as a rebellious city, hurtful to kings and provinces, Ezr. 4. 15, 16. Our Lord Jesus was so reproached, though he told them his kingdom was not of this world: no marvel then, if his followers have been loaded in all ages with the like calumnies; called fœderales, magistrates, and turbulent, and looked upon as the troublers of the land; their enemies having found such representations needful for the justifying of their barbarous rage against them.

The apostle therefore, for the obviating of that reproach, and the clearing of Christianity from it, shews that obedience to civil magistrates is one of the laws of Christ, whose religion helps to make good subjects; and it was very unjust to charge the disciples of Christianity that faction and rebellion, which its principles and rules are so directly contrary to. 2. Because of the temptation which the Christians lay under to be otherwise affected to civil magistrates; some of them being originally Jews, and so heaved with a principle, that it was unmeet for any of the seed of Abraham to be subject to one of another nation; their king must be of their own nation, v. 17, 15. Besides, Paul had taught them, that they were not to be made free by Christ. Lest that liberty should be turned into licentiousness, and misconstrued to contemn faction and rebellion, the apostle enjoins obedience to civil government; which was the more necessary to be press'd now, because the magistrates were heathen and unbelievers; which yet does not destroy their civil power and authority. Besides, the civil powers were persecuting powers; a body of the law was against them.

II. The reasons to enforce this duty. Why must we be subject?

1. For wrath's sake. Because of the danger we run ourselves into by resist. e. Magistrates bear the sword, and to oppose them, is to hazard all that is dear to us in this world; for it is no purpose to contend with him that bears the sword. The Christians were then in those persecuting times obnoxious to their wrath, who in the present state of the magistrate, they needed not make themselves more obnoxious by their rebellions. The least shew of resistance or sedition in a Christian would soon be aggravated and improved, and would be very prejudicial to the whole society: and therefore they had more need than others to be exact in their subjection, that those who had so much occasion against them in the matter of their God, might have no other occasion to.

To this head must that argument be referred, (v. 2.) They that resist shall receive to themselves damnation: a sin so heinous, they shall be called to an account for it. God will reckon with them for it, because the resistance reflects upon him; the magistrate will reckon with them for it, for they will come under the lash of the law, and will find the higher powers too high to be trampled upon, all civil governments being justly strict and vindictive upon treason and rebellion; so it follows. (v. 3.) Rulers are a terror. This is a good argument, but it is low for a Christian.

2. We must be subject, not only for wrath, but for conscience' sake: not so much formidine formiæ from the fear of punishment, as virtutum amor— from the love of virtue. This makes common civil offices acceptable to God, so they are those for conscience' sake, with an eye to God, to his providence putting us into such relations, and to his precept making subjection the duty of those relations. Thus the same thing may be done from a very different principle.
Now to oblige conscience to this subjection, he argues, v. 1—4, 6.

(1.) From the institution of magistracy; There is no power but of God; God, as ruler and governor of the world, hath appointed the ordinance of magistracy; so that all civil power is derived from him as from its original, and he hath by his providence put the dignity and trust of it in those hands, whatever they are, that have it. By him kings reign, Prov. 8. 15.

The usurpation of power and the abuse of power are not of God, for he is not the author of sin; but the power itself is. As our natural powers, though often abused and made instruments of sin, are from God's creating power, so civil powers are from God's governing power. The most unjust and oppressive power in the world is no power but what has been given them from above; (John 19. 11.) The Divine Providence being in a special manner conversant about those changes and revolutions of governments, which have such an influence upon states and kingdoms, and such a multitude of particular persons and lesser communities.

Or, it may be meant of government in general: it is an instance of God's wisdom, power, and goodness. Through the waste and ruin of his power, and has disposed them into such a state as distinguishes between governors and governed; and has not left them like the fishes of the sea, where the greater devour the lesser. He did herein consult the benefit of his creatures.

The powers that be: whatever the particular form and method of government are; whether by monarchy, aristocracy, or democracy; wherever the government is lodged, if it is an ordinance of God, and it is to be received and submitted to accordingly; though immediately an ordinance of man, (1 Pet. 2. 13.) yet originally an ordinance of God.

Ordained of God; τέκτων, a military word, signifying not only the ordination of magistrates, but the subordination of inferior magistrates to the supreme, as in an army; for among magistrates there is a government of sorts, as of the sun and moon.

Hence it follows, (v. 2.) that whosoever resists the power, resists the ordinance of God. There are other things from God, that are the greatest calamities: but magistracy is from God, as an ordinance, it is a great law, and it is a great blessing; so that the children of Belial, that will not endure the yoke of government, will be found breaking a law, and despising a blessing. Magistrates are therefore called God's ministers, (Ps. 2. 10.) because they bear the image of God's authority. And those who resist power, reflect upon God himself. This is not at all applicable to the particular rights of kings and kingdoms, and the branches of their constitution; nor can any certain rule be fetched from hence for the modelling of the original contracts between the governors and governed; but it is intended for direction to private persons in their private capacity, to behave themselves as kings and governors in that sphere which God has set them in, with a due regard to the civil powers which God in his providence has set over them, 1 Tim. 2. 1, 2.

Magistrates are here again and again called God's ministers. He is the minister of God, v. 4, 6. Magistrates are in a more peculiar manner God's servants; the dignity they have, calls for duty. Though they are lords to us, they are servants to God, have work to do for him, and an account to make up to him. In the administration of public justice, the determining of quarrels, the protecting of the innocent, the righting of the wronged, the punishing of offenders, and the preserving of national peace and order, that every man may not do what is right in his own eyes; in these things it is that magistrates act as God's ministers. As the killing of an inferior magistrate, while he is actually doing his duty, is accounted treason against the prince; so the resisting of any magistrates in the discharge of these duties of their place, is the resisting of an ordinance of God.

(2.) From the intention of magistracy; Rulers are not a terror to good works, but to the evil, &c. Magistracy was designed to this end.

[1.] A terror to evil works, and evil workers. They bear the sword; not only the sword of war, but the sword of justice. They are heirs of restraint, to put offenders to shame; Laish wanted such, Judg. 18. 7. Such is the power of sin and corruption, that many will not be restrained from the greatest enormities, and such as are most pernicious to human society, by any regard to the law of God and nature or the wrath to come; but only by the other temporal punishments, which the wilfulness and perverseness of degenerate mankind have made necessary. Hence it appears, that laws with penalties for the lawless and disobedient, (1 Tim. 1. 9.) must be constituted in christian nations, and are agreeable with, and not contradictory to, the gospel. When men are become such beasts, such ravenous beasts, one to another, they must be dealt with accordingly. This is the outward sign of the inward disposition of the heart. The horse and the mule must thus be held in with bit and bridle.

In this work the magistrate is the minister of God, v. 4. He acts as God's agent, to whom vengeance belongs; and therefore must take heed of infusing into his judgments any private personal resentments of his own. To execute wrath upon him that doeth evil; In this the judicial processes of the most vigilant faithful magistrates, though some faint with constancy and labor, are blamable and preludium of the judgments of the great day, yet come far short of the judgment of God: they reach only to the evil act, can execute wrath only on him that doeth evil: but God's judgment extends to the evil thought, and is a discerner of the intents of the heart.

He beareth not the sword in vain. It is not for nothing that God hath put such a power into the magistrate's hand; but it is intended for the restraining and suppressing of disorders. And therefore, "If thou do that which is evil, which falls under the cognizance and censure of the civil magistrate, be afraid; for civil powers have quick eyes and long arms."

It is a good thing when the punishment of male-factors is managed as an ordinance of God, instituted and appointed by himself. First, As a holy God, that hates sin; against which, as it appears and puts up its head, a public testimony is thus borne. Secondly, As King of nations, and the God of peace and order, which are hereby preserved. Thirdly, As the Protector of the good whose persons, families, estates, and names, are by this means hedged about. Fourthly, As one that desires not the eternal ruin of sinners, but by punishment and punishment of sinners, who would terrify others and so prevent the like wickedness, that others may hear and fear, and do no more presumptuously. Nay, it is intended for a kindness to those that are punished, that by the destruction of the flesh the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus.

[2.] A praise to them that do well. Those that keep in the way of their duty, shall have the commendation and protection of the civil powers, to their credit and comfort. Do that which is good, (v. 3.) and thou needest not be afraid of the power, which, though terrible, reaches none but those that by their own sin make themselves obnoxious to it; the fire burns only that which is combustible: nay, thou shalt have praise of it."

This is the intention of magistracy, and therefore we must; for conscience-sake, be subject to it; as a constituted designed for the public good, to which all private interests must give way. But pity it is, that ever this gracious intention should be perverted, and that those who bear the sword, while they contain and confines, should be a terror to those who do well. But so it is, when the vilest men are exalted; (Ps. 12, 1, 8.) and yet even then, the blessing and benefit of a common protection and a face of government and order, are such, that it is out of the case rather to submit to persecution for well-doing, and to take it patiently, than by any irregular and disorderly practices to attempt a redress. Never did sovereign prince pervert the ends of government as Nero did, and yet to him Paul appealed, and under him had the protection of the law and the inferior magistrates more than once. Better a bad government than none at all.

(3.) From our interest in it; “He is the minister of God to thee for good. Thou hast the benefit and advantage of the government, and therefore must do what thou canst to preserve it, and nothing to disturb it.” Protection draws allegiance. If we have protection from the government, we owe subjection to it; by upholding the government, we keep up our own hedge. This subjection is likewise consented to by the tribute we pay; (v. 6.) “Pay to him that is in authority, not only for conscience’ sake, but as a testimony of your submission, and an acknowledgment that in conscience you think it to be due. You do by paying taxes contribute your share to the support of the power; if therefore you be not subject, you do but pull down with one hand what you support with the other; and is that conscience?”

By your paying tribute, you not only owe the magistrate’s authority, but the blessing of that authority to yourselves; a sense of which you thereby testify, giving him that as a recompense for the great pains he takes in the government; for honour is a burthen; and if he do as he ought, he is attending continually upon this very thing: for it is enough to take up all a man’s thoughts and time; in consideration of which fatigue, we pay tribute, and must be subject.”

Pay you tribute, φησιν τινες. He does not say, “You give it as an alms,” but, “You pay it as a just debt, or lend it to be repaid in all the blessings and advantages of public government, which you reap the benefit of.” This is the lesson the apostle teaches, and it becomes all Christians to learn and practise it, that the godly in the land may be found (whatever others are,) the quiet and the peaceable in the land.

7. Render therefore to all their dues: tribute to whom tribute is due; custom to whom custom; fear to whom fear; honour to whom honour. 3. Owe no man anything, but to love one another: for he that loveth another, hath fulfilled the law. 9. For this, Thou shalt not commit adultery, Thou shalt not kill, Thou shalt not steal, Thou shalt not bear false witness, Thou shalt not covet; and if there be any other commandment, it is briefly comprehended in this saying, namely, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. 10. Love worketh no ill to his neighbour: therefore love is the fulfilling of the law.

We are here taught a lesson of justice and charity. I. Of justice; (v. 7.) “Render therefore to all their dues; especially to magistrates, for this refers to what goes before; and likewise to all with whom we have to do. To be just, is to give to all their due, to give every body his own. What we have, we have.

it is stewards; others have an interest in it, and must have their dues.” Render to God his due in the first place, to yourselves, to your families, your relations, to the commonwealth, to the church, to the poor, to those that you have dealings with, in buying, selling, exchanging, &c. Render to all their dues; and that readily and cheerfully, not tarrying till you are by law compelled to it. He specifies,

1. Due taxes; “Tribute to whom tribute is due, custom to whom custom. Most of the countries where the gospel was first preached, were subject at this time to the Roman yoke, and were made provinces of the empire. He wrote this to the Romans who, as they were rich, so they were drained by taxes and impositions, to the just and honest payment of which they are here pressed by the apostle. Some distinguish between tribute and custom, the former standing by the former constant standing taxes, and by the other those which were occasionally required: both which are to be faithfully and conscientiously paid as they become legally due. Our Lord was born when his mother went to be taxed; and enjoined the payment of tribute to Caesar. Many, who in other things seem to be just, yet make no conscience of this, but pass it off with a false ill-favoured maxim, that it was needful to cheat the King; directly contrary to Paul’s rule, “Tribute to whom tribute is due.”

2. Due respect; “Fear to whom fear, honour to whom honour. This sums up the duty which we owe not only to magistrates, but to all superiors, parents, masters, all that are over us in the Lord, according to the fifth commandment; Honour thy father and mother. Compare Lev. 19. 3. Ye shall fear every man his mother and his father; not with a fear of management, but a loving, reverent, respectful, obediential fear. Where there is not this respect in the heart to our superiors, no other duty will be paid aright.

3. Due payment of debts; (v. 8.) “Owe no man any thing; do not continue in any one’s debt, while you are able to pay it, farther than by, at least, the tacit consent of the person to whom you are indebted. Give every one his own. Do not spend that upon yourselves, much less heap it up for yourselves, which you owe to others.” The wicked borroweth, and payeth not again, Ps. 37. 21. Many that are very sensible of the trouble, think little of the sin of being in debt.

II. Of charity; “Owe no man any thing; so much you owe do owe no man any thing; so some read it; Whatever you owe to any relation, or any friend, or any other than what you can pay; and it is eminently summed up and included in this debt of love. But to love another, that is a debt that must be always in the paying, and yet always owing. Love is a debt; the law of God and the interest of mankind made it so; it is not a thing which we are left at liberty about; but it is enjoined us, as the principle and summary of all duty owing one to another; for love is the fulfilling the law the law the law, which is fulfilled, that is, perfectly, but has a good step towards it. It is inclusive of all the duties of the second table, which he specifies v. 9, and those suppose the love of God. See 1 John 4. 20. If the love be sincere, it is accepted as the fulfilling of the law. Surely we serve a good master, that has summed up all our duty in one word, and that a short word and a sweet word, love, the beauty and harmony of the universe, is, Love is the figure, joy, and happiness, of an intelligent being. God is love. (1 John 4. 16.) And love is his image upon the soul: where it is, the soul is well moulded, and the heart fitted for every good work. Now, to prove that love is the fulfilling of the law, he gives us,

1. An induction of particular precepts, v. 9. He specifies the five last of the ten commandments, which he observes to be all summed up in this royal law, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself; with an as of quality, not of equality; " with the sincerity that thou lovest him, though not in the same measure and degree." He that loves his neighbour as himself, will be desirous of the welfare of his neighbour's body, goods, and good name, as of his own. On this is built that golden rule, of doing as we would be done by. Were there no restraints of human laws in these things, no punishments incurred, (which the malignity of human nature hath made necessary,) the love of love would of itself be effectual to prevent all such wrongs and injuries, and to keep peace and good order among us. In the enumeration of these commandments, he puts the seventh before the sixth, and mentions this first, Thou shalt not commit adultery; for though that commonly goes under the name of love, (pity it is that so good a word should be so abused,) yet it is really as great a violation of it as killing and stealing is; which shews that true brotherly love is love to the souls of our brethren in the first place. He that tempts others to sin, and defiles their minds and consciences, though he may pretend the most passionate love, (Prov. 7. 15, 18.) does really hate them, just as the devil does, who wars against the soul.

2. A general rule concerning the nature of brotherly love; Love worketh no ill; (v. 10.) he that walks in love, that is acted and governed by a principle of love, he worketh no ill; he neither practices nor contrives any ill to his neighbour, to any one that he has any thing to do with: as in 213:22, &c., the projecting of evil is in effect the performing of it. Hence devising of iniquity is called the working of evil, upon the bed, Mic. 2. 1. Love intends and designs no ill to any body, is utterly against the doing of that which may turn to the prejudice, offence, or grief, of any. It worketh no ill; it prohibits the working of evil, and has no ill design. It not only worketh no ill, but it worketh all the good that may be, deviseth liberal things. For it is a sin not only to devise evil against thy neighbour, but to withhold good from them to whom it is due; both are forbidden together, Prov. 3. 27—29. This proves that love is the fulfilling of the law, answers all the end of it; for what else is that but to restrain us from evil-doing, and to constrain us to well-doing? Love is the fulfilling of the third and eighth rules of obedience to the whole law. The whole law is written in the heart if the law of love be there.

11. And that, knowing the time, that now it is high time to wake out of sleep: for now is our salvation nearer than when we believed. 12. The night is far spent, the day is at hand: let us therefore cast off the works of darkness, and let us put on the armour of light. 13. Let us walk honestly as in the day; not in rioting and drunkenness, not in chambering and wantonness, not in strife and envying. 14. But put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ, and make not provision for the flesh, to fulfill the lusts thereof.

We are here taught a lesson of sobriety and godliness in ourselves. Our main care must be to look to ourselves. Four things we are here taught, as a Christian's directory, for his day's work; when to awake, how to dress ourselves, how to walk, and what to do. 1. When to awake; Now it is high time to awake; (v. 11.) to awake out of the sleep of sin; for a sinful condition is a sleeping condition; out of the sleep of carnal security, sloth and negligence; out of the sleep of spiritual death, and out of the sleep of spiritual darkness. There is an hour of the winter and Polish virgins slumbered and slept, Matt. 25. 1, 2. They are to be often excited and stirred up to awake. The word of command to all Christ's discipless, is, Watch.

Awake, be concerned about your souls and your eternal interest; take need of sin, be ready to, and serious in, that which is good, and live in a constant expectation of the coming of our Lord. Considering," 1. "The time we are cast into; Knowing the time. Consider what time it is. Therefore, there must be a sense of the accepted time, it is working time; it is a time when more is expected than was in the times of that ignorance which God winked at, when people sat in darkness. It is high time to awake; for the sun hath been up a great while, and shines in our faces. Have we this light to sleep in? See 1 Thess. 5. 5, 6. It is high time to awake; for others are waking and shall make an end of time; we have a great deal of work to do, and our master is calling us to it again and again. Know the time to be a perilous time; we are in the midst of enemies and snares; it is high time to awake, for the Philistines are upon us; our neighbour's house is on fire, and our own in danger. It is time to awake, for we have slept enough, (1 Pet. 4. 3.) high time indeed, for Behold, the Bridegroom cometh.

"This is the working of evil; of New is our salvation nearer than when we believed; than when we first believed, and so took upon us the profession of christianity. The eternal happiness we chose for our portion, is now nearer us than it was when we became christians. Let us mind our way, and mend our pace, for we are now nearer our journey's end, than we were when we had our first love. The nearer we are to our centre, the quicker should our motions be. The step betwixt us and heaven, and shall we be so very slow and cold on our christian course, and move so heavily? The more the days are shortened, and the more grace is increased, the nearer is our salvation, and the more quick and vigorous we should be in our spiritual motions."

11. How to dress ourselves. That is the next care, when we are awake and up; "The night is far spent, the day is at hand: let us therefore cast off the works of darkness, and put on the armour of light. Clearer discoveries will be quickly made of gospel-grace than have been yet made, as light gets ground. The night of Jewish rage and cruelty is just at an end; their persecuting power is near a period; the day of our deliverance from them is at hand, that day of redemption which Christ promised, Luke 21. 28. And the day of our complete salvation, in the heavenly glory, is at hand. Observe then, 1. "What we must put off; put off our nightclothes, which it is a shame to appear abroad in; cast off the works of darkness." Sinful works are works of darkness; they come from the darkness of ignorance and mistake, they covet the darkness of privacy and concealment, and they end in the darkness of hell and destruction. Let us therefore, who are of the day, cast them off; not only cease from the practice of them, but detest and abhor them, and have no more to do with them. Because eternity is just at the door, let us take heed lest we be found doing that which will then make us against us, 2 Pet. 3. 11, 14. 2. "What we must put on." The christian's care must be wherever shall we be clothed, how shall we dress our souls? (1.) Put on the armour of light. Christians are soldiers in the midst of enemies and the world's warfare, therefore their array must be armour, that they may stand upon their defence; the armour of God, which we are directed to, Eph. 6. 13, &c. A christian may reckon himself undressed, if he be unarmed. The graces of the Spirit are this armour, to secure the soul from Satan's temptations, and the assaults of this present evil world.

This is called the armour of light, some think, alluding to the bright glittering armour which the Roman soldiers used to wear; ensucharmour as becomes us to wear in the day-light. The graces of the Spirit are suitable, splendid ornaments; are, in the sight of God, of great price.

(2.) Put on the Lord Jesus Christ, v. 14. This stands in opposition to a great many base lusts, mentioned v. 13. "Rioting and drunkenness," which must be cast off; one would think it should follow, but, "Put on Light, to tenderness; Chastity, to the opposite virtues;" no, "Put on Christ, that includes all. Put on the righteousness of Christ for justification; be found in him, (Phil. 3. 9.) as a man is found in his clothes; put on the priestly garments of the elder brother, that in them you may obtain the blessing; put on the spirit and grace of Christ for sanctification; put on the new man, (Eph. 4. 24.) get the habit of grace confirmed, the acts of it quickened." Jesus Christ is the best clothing for christians to adorn themselves with, to arm themselves with; it is decent, distinguishing, dignifying, and defending. Without Christ, we are naked, deformed; all other things are filthy rags, fig-leaves, a sorry shelter. God has provided us coats of skins; large, strong, warm, and durable. By baptism we have in profession put on Christ, Gal. 3. 27. Let us do it in truth and sincerity.

The Lord Jesus Christ; "Put him on as Lord to rule you, as Jesus to save you, and in both, as Christ anointed and appointed by the Father, to this ruling, saving work." 4. 1. Walk honestly as in the day. Compare Eph. 5. 8. Walk as children of light. Our conversation must be as becomes the gospel.

Walk honestly; ἀληθινῶς—decently and becomingly, so as to credit your profession, and to adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour, and recommend religion in its beauty to others. We should be in so good a temper of heart to careful to conduct themselves well in those things wherein men have an eye upon them, and to study that which is lovely and of good report. Particularly, here are three pair of sins we are cautioned against.

1. We must not walk in rioting and drunkenness; we must abstain from all excess in eating and drinking. We must not give the least countenance to revelling or intemperance, nor indulge our sensual appetite in any private excesses. Christians must not overcharge their hearts with surfeiting and drunkenness, Luke 21. 34. This is not walking as in the day; for they that are drunk, are drunk in the night, 1 Thess. 5. 7.

2. Not in chambering and wantonness; not in any of those lusts of the flesh, those works of darkness, which are forbidden in the seventh commandment. Deforning the body, and the corruption of it are the chambering forbidden; lascivious thoughts and affections, lascivious looks, words, books, songs, gestures, dances, dalliances, which lead to, and are degrees of, that uncleanness, are the wantonness here forbidden; whatsoever transgresseth the pure and sacred law of chastity and modesty.

3. Not in strife and envying. These are also works of darkness; though the acts and instances of strive and envy are very common, yet none are willing to own the principles, or to acknowledge themselves envious and contentious. It may be the lot of the best saints to be envied and striven with; but to strive and to envy, ill becomes the disciples and followers of the peaceable and humble Jesus. Where there are riot and drunkenness, there usually are chambering and wantonness, and strife and envy. Solomon puts them all together, Prov. 23. 29, &c. Those that tarry long at the wine, (v. 30.) have contentions and wounds without cause, (v. 29.) and their eyes behold strange women, v. 33.

IV. What provision to make; (v. 14.) "Make not provision for the flesh. Be not careful about the body." Our great care must be to provide for our souls; but must not we also take care about our bodies? Must we not provide for them, when they need it? Yes, but two things are here forbidden;

1. Preplexing ourselves with an inordinate care, intimated in those words, γεννάτε μιν πενήντα; Be not solicitous in forecasting for the body; do not stretch your wits, nor set your thoughts, upon the tenter-hooks in making this provision: be not careful and cumbered about it, do not take thought. Matt. 6. 31. It forbids an anxious incurring care.

2. Indulging ourselves in an irregular desire. We are not forbidden barely to provide for the body, (it is a lamp that must be supplied with oil,) but we are forbidden to fulfil the lusts thereof. Those necessities of the body must be considered, but the lusts of it must not be gratified. Natural desires must be answered, but wanton appetites must be checked and denied. To ask meat for our necessities, it is duty, we are taught to pray for daily bread; but to ask meat for our lusts, is provoking, Ps. 78. 18. Those who profess to walk in the spirit, must not fulfil the lusts of the flesh, Gal. 5. 16.

CHAP. XIV.

The apostle having, in the former chapter, directed our conduct one towards another in civil things, and prescribed the sacred laws of justice, peaceableness, and order, to be observed by us as members of the commonwealth; he comes, in this, and part of the following chapter, in like manner, to direct our demeanour one towards another in sacred things, which pertain more immediately to conscience and religion, and which we observe as members of the church. Particularly, he gives rules how to manage our different apprehensions about indifferent things; in that management of which, it seems, there was something amiss among the Roman christians, to whom he wrote, which he here labours to redress. But the rules are general, and of standing: the thing is the same, which we are to preserve of that christian love which he had so earnestly prescribed in the foregoing chapter as the fulfilling of the law. It is certain that nothing is more threatening, nor more often fatal, to christian unity, than the controversies and divisions of their members. By these wounds the life and soul of religion expire. Now in this chapter, we are furnished with the sovereign balm of Gilead; the blessed apostle prescribes like a wise physician. Why then is not the hurt of the daughter of my people received, but his directions are not followed? This chapter, rightly understood, made use of, and lived up to, would set things to rights, and heal us all.

1. HIM that is weak in the faith receive ye, but not to doubtful disputations.

2. For one believeth that he may eat all things: another, who is weak, eateth herbs.

3. Let not him that eateth despise him that eateth not; and let not him which eateth not judge him that eateth: for God hath received him.

4. Who art thou that judgest another man's servant? to his own master he standeth or falleth. Yea, he shall be holden up: for God is able to make him stand. One man esteemeth one day above another: another esteemeth every day alike. Let every man be fully persuaded in his own minde. 6. He that regardeth the day, regardeth it unto the Lord; and he that regardeth not the day, to the Lord he doth not regard it. He that eateth, eateth to the Lord, for he giveth God thanks; and he that eateth not, to the Lord he eateth not, and giveth God thanks. 7. For none of us liveth to himself, and no man dieth to himself. 8. For whether we live, we live unto the Lord; and whether we die, we die unto the Lord; whether we live therefore, or die, we are the Lord's. 9. For to this end Christ both died, and rose, and revived, that he might be Lord both of the dead and living. 10. But why dost thou judge thy brother? Or why dost thou set at nought thy brother? for we shall all stand before the judgment-seat of Christ. 11. For it is written, As I live, saith the Lord, every knee shall bow to me, and every tongue shall confess to God. 12. So then every one of us shall give account of himself to God. 13. Let us not therefore judge one another any more: but judge this rather, that no man put a stumbling-block or an occasion to fall in his brother's way. 14. I know, and am persuaded by the Lord Jesus, that there is nothing unclean of itself: but to him that esteemeth any thing to be unclean, to him it is unclean. 15. But if thy brother be grieved with thy meat, now walkest thou not charitably. Destroy not him with thy meat, for whom Christ died. 16. Let not then your good be evil spoken of: 17. For the kingdom of God is not meat and drink; but righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost. 18. For he that in these things serveth Christ is acceptable to God, and approved of men. 19. Let us therefore follow after the things which make for peace, and things wherewith one may edify another. 20. For meat destroy not the work of God. All things indeed are pure; but it is evil for that man who eateth with offence. 21. It is good neither to eat flesh, nor to drink wine, nor any thing whereby thy brother stumbleth, or is offended, or is made weak. 22. Hast thou faith? Have it to thyself before God. Happy is he that condemneth not himself in that thing which he alloweth. 23. And he that doubteth is damned if he eat, because he eateth not of faith: for whatsoever is not of faith is sin.

We have, in this chapter, 1. An account of the unhappy contention which had broken out in the Christian church. Our master had foretold that offences would come; and, it seems, so they did, for want of that wisdom and love which would have prevented it, and kept up union among them.

1. There was a difference among them about the distinction of meats and days; those are the two things specified. There might be other similar occasions of difference, while these made the most noise, and were most taken notice of. The case was this: the members of the christian church at Rome were some of them originally Gentiles, and others of them Jews. We find Jews at Rome, believing, Acts 8. 24. Now those that had been Jews, were trained up in the observance of the ceremonial institutions, touching meats and days. This, which had been bred in the bone with them, would hardly be got out of the flesh, even after they turned christians; especially with some of them, who were not easily weaned from what they had long been wedded to. They were not well instructed touching the cancelling of the ceremonial law by the death of Christ, and therefore retained the ceremonial institutions, and practised accordingly; while other christians, that understood themselves better, and knew their christian liberty, made no such difference.

(1.) Concerning meats; (v. 2.) One believeth that he may eat all things, he is well satisfied that the ceremonial distinction of meats into clean and unclean, is not to be observed; but that every creature of God is good, and nothing to be refused: nothing unclean of itself, v. 14. This he was assured of, not only from the general tenor and scope of the gospel, but particularly from the revelation, which Peter, the apostle of the circumcision, (and therefore more immediately concerned in it,) had to this purport, Acts 10. 15, 28. This the strong christian is clear in, and practises accordingly; eating what is set before him, and asking no question for conscience-sake, 1 Cor. 10. 27.

On the other hand, another, who is weak, is dissatisfied in this point, is not clear in his christian liberty, but rather inclines to think, that the meats forbidden by the law, remain still unclean; and therefore, to keep at a distance from them, he will eat no flesh at all, but eateth herbs, contenting himself only with the fruits of the earth. See to what degrees of mortification and self-denial a tender conscience will submit. None know but they that experience it, how great both the restraining and the constraining power of conscience is.

(2.) Concerning days; (v. 5.) Those who thought themselves still under some kind of obligation by the ceremonial law, esteemed one day above another; kept up a respect to the times of the passover, pentecost, and tabernacles, 7. 8. 9. Romans, 13. 14. thought those days better than other days, and solemnized them accordingly with particular observances, binding themselves to some religious rest and exercise on those days. Those who knew that all these things were abolished and done away by Christ's coming, esteemed every day alike. We must understand it with an exception of the Lord's days, which were not abolished; but they made no account, took no notice, of those antquated festivals of the Jews.

Here the apostle speaks of the distinction of meats and days as a thing indifferent, when it went no further than the opinion and practice of some particular persons, who had been trained up all their days to such observances, and therefore were the more excused by the church having united with them. But in the epistle to the Galatians, where he deals with those that were originally Gentiles, but were influenced by some judaizing teachers, not only to believe such a distinction, and to practise accordingly, but to lay a stress upon it as necessary to salvation, and to make the observation of the Jewish festivals public and congregational; here the case was altered, and it is charged upon them as the frustrating of the design of the gospel, falling from
A page from a book discussing the problem of finding mediators and their role in conflict resolution. The text references Romans, Galatians, and other biblical passages to illustrate the importance of understanding the role of the mediator. It emphasizes the need for mediators to be impartial and to understand the dynamics of conflict, using examples from day-to-day life to illustrate points. The text also discusses the importance of understanding the strengths and weaknesses of different parties to facilitate a successful resolution.
(A) Because both the one and the other, if they be true believers, and are right in the main, have an eye to God, and do approve themselves to God in what they do, v. 6.

He that regards the day, makes conscience of observing the Jewish fasts and festivals, not imposing it upon others, nor laying a stress upon it, but willing to be as he thinks on the oner side, as thinking there is no harm in resting from worldly labours for worshipping God on those days, it is well. We have reason to think, because in other things he conducts himself like a good christian, that in this also his eye is single, and that he regarded it unto the Lord; and God will accept of his honest intention, though he be under a mistake about the observation of days; for the sincerity and uprightness of the heart were never rejected for the weakness and inconstancy of the head: so good a master do we serve.

On the other hand, he that regards not the day, that does not make a difference between one day and another; does not call one day holy, and another profane; one day lucky, and another unlucky; but esteems every day alike: he does not do it out of a spirit of opposition, contradiction, or contempt of his brethren, but he has no care in the name of time; he does not, he dares not, do it from such a principle of the world; but we charitably conclude, that to the Lord he doth not regard it. He therefore makes no such difference of days, because he knows God hath made none; and therefore intends his honour in endeavouring to dedicate every day to him.

So for the other instance; He that eateth whatever is set before him, though it be blood, though it be swine's flesh, if it be food convenient for him, he eateth to the Lord. He understands the liberty that God has granted him, and uses it to the glory of God, with an eye to his wisdom and goodness, in enlarging our allowance now under the gospel, and taking off the yoke of legal restraints; and he giveth God thanks, for the variety of food he has, and the liberty he has to eat it, and that in those things his conscience is not fettered.

On the other hand, he that eateth not those meats which were forbidden by the ceremonial law, to the Lord he eateth not; it is for God's sake, because he is afraid of offending God by eating that which he is sure was once prohibited; and he giveth God thanks too, that there is enough beside. If he conscientiously deny himself that which he takes to be forbidden fruit, yet he blesses God that of other trees he may freely eat. Thus while both have an eye to God in what they do, and approve themselves to him in their integrity, why should either of them be judged or despised?

Observe, Whether we eat flesh, or eat herbs, it is athankful regard to God, the author and giver of all our mercies, that sanctifies and sweetens it.

Bishop Sanderson, in his 34th sermon, upon 1 Tim. iv. 4, observes this observation: It appears by this, that saying grace (as we commonly call it, perhaps from 1 Cor. 10. 30.) before and after meat, was the common known practice of the church, among christians of all sorts, weak and strong: an ancient, commendable, apostolical, christian practice, derived down from Christ's example through all the ages of the church: (Matt. 14. 19.—15. 35. Luke 9. 13. John 6. 11. Matt. 26. 26, 27. Acts 27. 35.) how he, as king of God's glory, before we use them, and blessing the name of God for them after, both included; for εὐχαρίστησιν and εὐχήστησιν are used promiscuously.

To clear this argument against rash judging and despising, he shews how essential it is to true christianity, to have a regard to God, and not to ourselves; which therefore, unless the contrary do manifestly appear, we must presume, concerning those that in lesser things differ from us. Observe his description of true christians, taken from their end and aim, (v. 7, 8.) and the ground of it, v. 9.

[1.] Our end and aim: not self, but the Lord. As the particular end specifies the action, so the general scope and tendency specify the state. If we would know what way we walk in, we must inquire what end we walk toward.

First, Not to self. We have learned to deny ourselves; that is, to live not to ourselves. None of us liveth to himself. This is a thing in which all the people of God are one, however they differ in other things; though some are weak and others are strong, yet both agree in this, not to live to themselves. Not one that hath given up his name to Christ, is allowed a self-seeker; it is contrary to the foundation of true christianity.

Neither we ourselves, nor die to ourselves, we are not our own masters, nor our own proprietors; we are not at our own disposal. The business of our lives is not to please ourselves, but to please God. The business of our deaths, which we are every day exposed to, and delivered to, is not to make ourselves talked of; we run not such hazards out of vain-glory, while we are dying daily. When we come to die actually, neither is that to ourselves; we do not set at all value on the ease of the soul, nor on the ease of the burden of the flesh; but it is to the Lord, that we may depart, and be with Christ, may be present with the Lord.

Secondly, But to the Lord, (v. 8.) to the Lord Christ, to whom all power and judgment are committed, and in whose name we are taught, as christians, to do every thing we do, (Col. 3. 17.) with an eye to the will of Christ as our rule, to the glory of Christ as our end, Phil. 1. 21. Christ is the grain we aim at, living and dying. We live, to glorify him in all the actions and affairs of life; we die, whether a natural or a violent death, to glorify him, and to go to be glorified with him. Christ is the centre, in which all the lines of life and death do meet. This is true christianity, which makes Christ all in all.

So that, whether we live or die, we are the Lord's, devoted to him, depending on him, designed and designing for him. Though some christians are weak, and others strong; though of different sizes, capacities, apprehensions and practices, in lesser things, yet they are all the Lord's: alloying, and serving, and approving themselves to Christ, and are accordingly owned and accepted of him. Is it for us then to judge or despise them, as if we were their masters, and they were to make it their business to please us, and to stand or fall by our dooms?

[2.] The ground of this, v. 9. It is grounded upon Christ's absolute sovereignty and dominion, which were the fruit and end of his death and resurrection. To this end he both died, and rose, and revived, (he, being risen, entered upon a heavenly life, as the glorious Christ, v. 6.) before, that he might be Lord, both of dead and living, that he might be the universal Monarch, Lord of all, (Acts 10. 36.) all the animate and inanimate creatures; for he is head over all things to the church. He is Lord of those that are living, to rule them, of those that are dead, to revive them, and raise them up. This was that name above every name, which God gave him as the reward of his humiliation, Phil. 2. 8, 9. It was after he had died and risen, that he said, All power is given unto me; (Matt. 28. 18.) and presently he exerts that power in issuing out commissions, v. 19, 20.

Now if Christ paid so dear for his dominion over souls and consciences, and has such a just and undisputed right to exercise that dominion; we must not so much as seem to invade it, or intrude upon it, by judging the consciences of our brethren, and arraigning them at our bar.

When we are ready to reproach, and reflect upon, the name and memory of those that are dead and gone, and to pass a censure upon them, (which some the rather do, because such judgments of the dead are more likely to pass uncontrolled and uncontradicted,) we must consider that Christ is Lord of the dead, as well as of the living. If they are dead, they have already given up their account, and let that suffice.

And this leads to another reason against judging and despising;

(4.) Because both the one and the other must shortly give an account, v. 10—12. A believing regard to the judgment of the great day, would silence all these rash judgments; Why dost thou that art weak, judge thy brother that is strong? And why dost thou that art strong, set at nought thy brother that is weak? Why is all this clashing, condemning, and censuring, among christians? We shall all stand before the judgment-seat of Christ, 2 Cor. 5. 10. Christ will be the Judge, and he has both authority and ability to determine men's eternal state according to their works, and before him we shall stand as persons to be tried, and to give up an account; expecting our final doom from him, which will be severally pronounced.

To illustrate this, (v. 11.) he quotes a passage out of the Old Testament, which speaks of Christ's universal sovereignty and dominion, and that established with an oath; As I live, (saith the Lord,) every knee shall bow to me. It is quoted from Isa. 45. 23. there it is, I have sworn by myself; here it is, As I live. So that whenever God saith, As I live, it is to be interpreted as swearing by himself; for it is God's end and purpose to have life in himself: there is a further ratification of it there, The word is gone out of my mouth. It is a prophecy, in general, of Christ's dominion; and here very fully applied to the judgment of the great day, which will be the highest and most illustrious exercise of that dominion. Here is a proof of Christ's godhead, he is the Lord, and he is God, equal with the Father. Divine honour is due to him, and will be paid. It is paid to God through him as Mediator. God will judge the world by him, Acts 17. 31.

The bowing of the knee to him, and the confession made with the tongue, are but outward expressions of inward adoration and praise. Every knee, and every tongue, either freely, or by force.

[1.] All his friends do it freely; are made willing in the day of his power. Grace is the soul's cheerful nature, and avowed subjection to Jesus Christ. First, Bowing to him; the understanding bowed to his truths, the will to his laws, the whole man to his authority; and this expressed by the bowing of the knee, the posture of adoration and prayer. It is proclaimed before our Joseph, Bow the knee, Gen. 41. 43. Though bodily exercise alone profits little, yet as it is guided by inward fear and reverence, it will be effectual. Secondly, Confessing to him; acknowledging his glory, grace, and greatness; acknowledging our own meanness and vulgarity, confessing our sins to him; so some understand it.

[2.] All his foes shall be constrained to do it, whether they will or no. When he shall come in the clouds, and every eye shall see him; then, and not till then, will all those promises, which speak of his victories over his enemies and their subjection to him, be realized; their complete accomplishment; then his foes shall be his footstool, and all his enemies shall lick the dust.

Hence he concludes, (v. 12.) Every one of us shall give account of himself to God. We must not give account for others, nor they for us: but every one for himself. We must give account how we have spent our time, how we have improved our opportunities: what we have done, and how we have done it.

And therefore, First, We have little to do, to judge others, for they are not accountable to us, nor are we accountable for them; (Gal. 2. 6.) Whatever they were, it maketh no matter to me, God accepteth no man's person. Whatever they are, and whatever they do, they must give account to their own master, and not to us; if we can in any thing be helpers of their joy, it is well; but we have not dominion over their faith. And, Secondly, We have the more to do, to judge ourselves, we have an account of our own to make up; and that is enough for us; let every man prove his own work, (Gal. 6. 4.) state his own accounts, search his own heart and life; let that take up his thoughts, and he that is strict in judging himself and abasing himself, will be apt to judge and despise his brother. Let all these differences be referred to the arbitration of Christ at the great day.

(5.) Because the stress of christianity is not to be laid upon these things, nor are they at all essential to religion, either on the one side or on the other. This is his reason, (v. 17, 18.) which is reducible to this branch of exhortation;

Why should you spend your zeal either for or against these things, which are so meagre and unconsiderable in religion? Some make it a reason, why, in case of offence likely to be taken, we should refrain the use of our christian liberty; but it seems directed in general against that heat about those things, which he observed on both sides. The kingdom of God is not meat, &c. Observe here,

[1.] The nature of true christianity, what it is, is here called, The kingdom of God; it is a religion intended to rule us, a kingdom: it stands in a double sense, and of two distinct objects of dominion. The gospel-dispensation is in a special manner called the kingdom of God, in distinction from the legal dispensation, Matt. 3. 2.—4. 17.

First, It is not meat and drink; it does not consist either in using, or in abstaining from, such and such meats and drinks. Christianity gives no rule in that case, either in one way or other. The Jewish religion consisted much in meats and drinks; (Heb. 9. 9.) but there are abstinence and some means highly rejoiced at, (v. 11.) eating other meats religiously; as in several of the sacrifices, part of which were to be eaten before the Lord: but all those appointments are now abolished, and are no more, Col. 2. 21, 22. The matter is left at large; every creature of God is good, 1 Tim. 4. 4. So, as to other things, it is neither circumcision nor uncircumcision, (Gal. 5. 6.—6. 15. 1 Cor. 7. 19.) it is not being of this party and persuasion, of this or the other opinion in lesser things, that will recommend us to God. It will not be asked at the great day, "Who ate flesh, and who ate herbs?" "Who kept holy days, and who did not?" Nor will it be asked, "Who was conformist, and who was nonconformist?" But it will be asked, "Who feared God, and worked righteousness, and who did not?" Nothing more destructive to true christianity than placing it in modes and forms, and circumstances, which have no essentials.

Secondly, It is righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost. These are some of the essentials of christianity; things in which all the people of God are agreed; in the pursuit of which we must spend our zeal, and which we must mind with an excelling care. Righteousness, peace, and joy, are very comprehensive words; and each of them includes much, both of the foundation and the superstructure of religion. Might I limit the sense of them, it should be thus. As to God, our great concern is righteousness; to appear before him justified by the merit of Christ's death, sanctified by the spirit of his grace; for the righteous and holy righteousness. As to our peace, it is peace; to live in peace and love, and charity with them; following peace with all men; Christ came into the world, to be the great Peace-maker. As to ourselves, it is joy in the Holy Ghost; that spiritual joy which is wrought by the blessed Spirit in the hearts of believers, which respects God as their reconciled Father, and heaven is their expected home. Next to our companionship with Christ, the life of religion consists in some complacency in him; to delight ourselves always in the Lord. Surely we serve a good Master, who makes peace and joy an essential to our religion. Then and then only we may expect peace and joy in the Holy Ghost, when the foundation is laid in righteousness, Isa. 32. 17.

Thirdly, It is in these things to serve Christ, (v. 18.) This out of respect to Christ himself; our Master, to his will as our rule, and to his glory as our end. That which puts an acceptableness upon all our good duties, is, a regard to Christ in the doing of them. We are to serve his interests and designs in the world; which are in the first place to reconcile us to God, and then to reconcile us one to another. What is Christianity but the serving of Christ? And we may well afford to serve him, who is pleased to provide for our salvation, that form of a servant.

[2.] The advantages of it. He that duly observeth these things,

First, Is acceptable to God. God is well pleased with such a one, though he be not in every thing just of our length. He has the love and favour of God; his person, his performances, are accepted of God, and we need no more to make us happy. If God now accepts thy works, thou mayest eat the bread with joy. Those are most pleasing to God, that are best pleased with him; and they are those that abound most in peace and joy in the Holy Ghost.

Secondly, He is approved of men, of all wise and good men, and the opinion of others is not to be regarded. The persons and things, which are acceptable to God, should be approved of us. Should not we be pleased with that which God is pleased with? What is it to us that God is pleased with? Observe, The approbation of men is not to be slighted; for we must provide things honest in the sight of all men, and study those things that are lovely and of good report: but the acceptance of God is to be desired and aimed at in the first place, because, sooner or later, God will bring all the world to be of his mind.

Another rule here given, is this, that in these doubtful things, every one not only may, but must, walk according to the light that God hath given him. This is laid down, v. 5. Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind; that is, Practice according to your own judgment in those things, and leave others to do so too. Do not censure the practice of others, let them enjoy their own opinion; if they be persuaded in their own mind that they ought to do so and so, do not condemn them; but if your sober sentiments be otherwise, do not make their practice a rule to you, any more than you must prescribe yours as a rule to them. Take heed of acting contrary to the dictates of a doubting conscience. First, be persuaded that what you do is lawful, before you venture to do it." In doubtful things, it is good keeping on the sure side of the hedge. We need not accept every Christian doubt whether it be lawful to eat flesh, while he remains under that doubt he had best forbear, till he be fully persuaded in his own mind. We must not pin our faith upon any one's sleeve, or make the practice of others our rule; but follow the dictates of our own understanding.

To this purport he argues, v. 14. and v. 23. Which two verses explain this, and give us a rule not to act against the dictates.

(1.) Of a mistaken conscience, v. 14. If a thing be indifferent, so that it is not in itself a sin not to do it, if we really think it a sin to do it, it is to us a sin, though not to others, because we act against our consciences, though mistaken and misinformed. He specifies the case in hand, concerning the difference of meats. Observe,

[1.] His own cleanness in this matter; "I know and am persuaded, I am fully persuaded, I am acquainted with my christian liberty, and am satisfied in it, without any doubt or scruple, that there is nothing unclean of itself, no kind of meat that lies under any ceremonial uncleanness, nor is forbidden to be eaten, if it be food proper for human bodies." Several kinds of meat were forbidden to the Jews, in this sense, to him who was a peculiar and separate people, Lev. 11. 44. Deut. 14. 2, 3. Sin had brought a curse upon the whole creation, Cursed is the ground for thy sake; the use of the creatures and dominion over them were forfeited, so that to man they were all unclean, Tit. 1. 15. In token of which, God in the ceremonial law prohibited the use of some, to shew what he might have done concerning all; but now that Christ has purchased the sin of the world, that prohibition now stands at large again, and that prohibition is taken away.

Therefore he says that was persuaded by the Lord Jesus, not only as the author of that persuasion, but as the ground of it; it was built upon the efficacy of Christ's death, which removed the curse, took off the forfeiture, and restored our right to the creature in general, and, consequently, put a period to that particular distinguishing prohibition. So that now there is nothing uncleanly of itself, every creature of God is good; nothing common: so the margin, είναι κακός; nothing which is common to others to eat, from the use of which the professors of religion are restrained: nothing profane; in this sense the Jews used the word common. It is explained by the word ἄσπόστροφος, Acts 10. 14. nothing common or unclean.

It was not only from the revelation made to Peter in this matter, but from the tenor and tendency of the whole gospel, and the manifest design of Christ's death in general, that Paul learned to count nothing common or unclean. This was Paul's own clearness, and he practised accordingly.

[2.] But here is a caution he gives to those who had not that clearness in this matter, which he had; To him that esteemeth any thing to be unclean, though it be his error, yet to him it is unclean. This particular case, thus determined, gives a general rule, That he who does a thing which he verily believes to be unlawful, however the thing be in itself, to him it is a sin. This arises from that unchangeable law of our creation, which is, that our wills, in all their choices, motions and directions, should follow the dictates of our understandings, and the order of the creature's nature, which order is taken, if the understanding (though the precept tell us that such a thing is a sin, and yet we will do it. This is a will to do evil; for if it appears to us to be sin, there is the same pravity and corruption of the will in the doing of it, as if really it were a sin; and therefore we ought not to do it. Not that it is in the power of any man's conscience to alter the nature of the action in itself, but only as to himself. It must be understood likewise, that this precept, though men's judgments and opinions may make that which is good in itself, to become evil to them, yet they cannot make that which is evil in itself, to become good, either in itself or to them. If a man were verily persuaded (it is Dr. Sander-son's instance, sermon on ch. 14. 25.) that it were evil to ask his father's blessing, that mispersuasion would make it become evil to him: but if he should be as verily persuaded that it were good to curse his father, that would not make it become good. The litigious taunting of a son to his father, which they made corban, an excuse for denying relief to their parents, Matt. 15. 5, 6. But that would not serve any more than Paul's erroneous conscience would justify his rage against Christianity, (Acts 26. 9.) or their's, John. 16. 2.

(2.) Nor must we act against the dictates of a doubting conscience. In those indifferent things which we are sure it is no sin not to do, and yet are not clear that it is lawful to do them, we must not do them while we continue under those doubts; for he that doubteth, is damned if he eat, (v. 23.) it turns into sin to him; he is damned, κακονοητος— he is condemned of his own conscience, because he eateth not of faith, because he does that which he is not fully persuaded he may lawfully do. He is not clear that it is lawful for him to eat swine's flesh, (suppose,) and yet is drawn, notwithstanding his doubts, to do that which he knows not to be lawful

This seems to be the meaning of that aphorism, which is either laid down in the text (v. 17.) or deduced from it, (v. 22.) here, he that condemns not himself in that thing which he allows. Many a one allows himself in practice to do that, which yet in his judgment and conscience he condemns himself for; allows it for the sake of the pleasure, profit, or credit of it; allows it in conformity to the custom; and yet whilst he does it, and pleads for it, his own heart gives him the lie, and his conscience condemns him for it. Now, how great is to act in this way, than to be of an opinion as not in any action to expose himself to the challenges and reproaches of his own conscience; that does not make his own heart his adversary, as he must needs do, who does that which he is not clear he may lawfully do. He is happy, that has peace and quietness within; for the testimony of conscience will be a special cordial in troublesome times. But if he condemns, it is well enough if our hearts condemn us not, 1 John 3. 21.

4. Another rule here prescribed is to those who are clear in these matters, and know their Christian liberty, yet to take heed of using it so as to give offence to a weak brother. This is laid down, v. 13. “Let us not judge one another any more. Let it suffice, that you have hitherto continued in this uncharitable practice, and do so no more.” The better to insinuate the exhortation, he puts himself in; Let us not; as if he had said, “It is what I have resolved against, therefore do you leave it: but judge this rather; instead of censoring the practice of others, let us look to the conduct of our own, that no man put a stumbling-block, or an occasion to fall, in his brother’s way,” γεγονοσται, και καιναι. We may condone, or overlook his injustices, which may occasion our brother’s stumbleable fall; the one signifies a lesser, the other a greater degree of mischief and offense, that which may be an occasion, (1.) Of grief to our brother. “One that is weak, and thinks it unlawful to eat such and such meats, will be gradually troubled to see thee eat them, out of a concern for the honour of the law which he thinks forbids them, and for the good of thy soul which he thinks is wounded by them; especially when thou dost it willfully, and with a seeming deliberate consumption, and not with that tenderness and that care to give satisfaction to thy weak brother, which would become thee.” Christians should take heed of grieving one another, and of saddening the hearts of Christ’s little ones. See Matt. 18. 6. 10.

(2.) Of guilt to our brother. The former is a stumbling-block, that gives our brother a great shock, and is a hindrance and discouragement to him; but this is an occasion to fall. “If thy weak brother, purely by thine example and influence, without any satisfaction received concerning his christian liberty, be drawn to act against his conscience, and to walk contrary to the light he has, and so to contract guilt upon the soul; though the thing were lawful to thee, yet not being so to him, (he having not yet thereto attained,) thou wast to be blamed of judgement in this occasion.” See this case explained, 1 Cor. 8. 9—11.

To the same purport, (v. 21.) he recommends it to our care, not to give offence to any one by the use of lawful things. It is good neither to eat flesh, nor to drink wine; these are things lawful indeed and comfortable, but not necessary to the support of human life; and therefore we may, and must, deny ourselves in them, rather than give offence: It is good, pleasing to God, profitable to our brother, and no harm to ourselves. Daniel and his fellows were in better liking with pulse and water, than they were, who ate the portion of the king's meat. It is a generous piece of self-denial, for which we have Paul's example; (1 Cor. 8. 13.) If meat make my brother to offend; he does not say, I will eat no meat, that is to destroy himself: I am not flesh, that is to deny himself, while he is doing the world some good. This is common to many in such indifferent things, whereby thy brother stumbleth, or is offended, is involved either in sin or in trouble: or, is made weak; his graces weakened, his comforts weakened, his resolutions weakened. Is made weak, that is, takes occasion to shew his weakness by his censures and scruples. We must not weaken those that are weak; that is to quench the smoking flax, and put out the candle in the darkness. Observe the motives to enforce this caution.

[1.] Consider the royal law of christian love and charity, which is hereby broken; (v. 15.) If thy brother be grieved with thy meat, be troubled to see thee eat those things which the law of Moses did forbid, which yet thou mayest lawfully do; possibly thou art ready to say, “Now he talks foolishly and weakly, and it is no great matter, which is no evil, which a little life may lay all the blame on that side. But the reproof here is given to the stronger and more knowing christian: Now walkest thou not charitably. Thus the apostle takes part with the weakest, and condemns the defect in love on the one side more than the defect in knowledge on the other side; agreeably to his principles elsewhere, that the way of love is the more excellent way, 1 Cor. 12. 31. Knowledge puffeth up, but charity edifieth, 1 Cor. 8. 1—3. Now walkest thou not charitably. Charity to the souls of our brethren. is the best charity. True love would make us tender of their peace and purity, and beget a regard to their consciences as well as to our own. Christ dealt gently with those that have true grace, though they are weak in it.

[5.] Consider the design of Christ's death; Destroy not him with thy meat, for whom Christ died, v. 5. First, Drawing of a soul to sin, threatens the destruction of that soul. By shaking his faith, provoking his passion, and tempting him to act against the light of his own conscience, thou dost, as much in thee lies, destroy him, giving him an occasion to turn from the true and unfeigned word of God. The beginning of sin is as the letting forth of water; we are not sure that it will stop any where on this side eternal destruction. Secondly, The consideration of the love of Christ in dying for souls, should make us very tender of the happiness and salvation of souls, and careful not to do any thing which may obstruct and hinder it. Did Christ quit a life for souls, such a life, and shall we not quit a morsel of meat for them? Shall we despise those whom Christ valued at so high a rate? Did he think it worth while to deny himself so much for them as to die for them, and shall we not think it worth while to denounce ourselves so little for them as abstaining from flesh comes to?

With thy meat. Thou pleadest that it is thy own meat, and thou mayest do what thou wilt with it; but thou art not thy brother's meat. If thy brother offended by it, is Christ's, and a part of his purchase. While thou destroyest thy brother, thou art helping forward the Devil's design, for he is the great destroyer; and, as much as in thee lies, thou art crossing the design of Christ, for he is the great Saviour; and dost not only offend thy brother, but offend Christ; for the work of salvation is that with our own heart is concerned.

But are any destroyed, for whom Christ died? If we understand it of the sufficiency and general intendment of Christ's death, which was to save all upon gospel terms, no doubt but multitudes are. If of the particular determination of the efficacy of his death to the elect, then, though none that were given to Christ shall perish, (John 6. 39.) yet thou mayest, as much as in thy power, destroy such. Not that thou dost, but by doing that which hath a tendency to it, thou dost manifest a great opposition to Christ. Nay, and thou mayest utterly destroy some, whose profession may be so justifiable, that thou art bound to believe in a judgment of charity, that Christ died for them. Compare this with 1 Cor. 8. 10, 11.

[5.] Consider the work of God; (v. 20.) For meat destroy not the work of God, the work of grace, particularly the work of faith in thy brother's soul. The works of peace and comfort are destroyed by such an offence given; take heed of it therefore: do not undo that which God hath done; you should work together with God, do not countermine his work.

First, The work of grace and peace is the work of God: it is wrought by him, it is wrought for him; it is a good work of his beginning, Phil. 1. 6. Observe, The same for whom Christ died, are here called the work of God; beside the work that is wrought for us, there is a work to be wrought in us, in order to our salvation. Every saint is God's workmanship, his husbandry, his building, Eph. 2. 10. 1 Cor. 3. 9.

Secondly, We must be very careful to do nothing which tends to the destruction of this work, either in ourselves or others. We must deny ourselves, our appetites, inclinations, and in the use of christian liberty, rather than obstruct and prejudice our own or others' grace and peace. Many do for meat and drink destroy the work of God in themselves; nothing more destructive to the soul than pampering and pleasing the flesh, and fulfilling the lusts of it; so likewise in others, by wilful offence given.

Think what thou destroyest, the work of God, whose work is honourable and glorious; think for what thou destroyest it, for meat, which was but for the belly, and the belly for it.

[4.] Consider the evil of giving offence, and what an abuse it is of our christian liberty. He grants, that all things indeed are pure; we may lawfully eat flesh, even those meats which were prohibited by the ceremonial law; but if we abuse this liberty, it will turn into sin to us; it is evil to him that causeth offence. Lawful things may be done unlawfully, Eats with offence; either carelessly, or designedly, giving offence to his brethren.

It is observable, that the apostle directs his reproof most against those who gave the offence; not as if they were not to be blamed, who causelessly and weakly took the offence from the ignorance of christian liberty, and the want of that charity which is not easily provoked, and which thinketh no evil; (he several times tacitly reflects upon them;) but he directs his speech to the strong, because they were better able to bear the reproof, and to begin the reformation.

For the further pressing of this rule, we may here observe two directions which have relation to it.

First, Let not then your good be evil spoken of; (v. 16.) take heed of doing any thing which may give occasion to others to speak evil, either of the christian religion in general, or of your christian liberty in particular. The gospel is your good; the liberties and franchises, the privileges and immunities granted by it, are your good; your knowledge and strength of grace to discern and use your liberty in things disputed, are your good; a good work, against which a worse hath not. Now let not this be evil spoken of. It is a sin, which cannot hinder loose and ungoverned tongues from speaking evil of us, and of the best things we have; but we must not (if we can help it) give them any occasion to do it. Let not the reproach arise from any default of ours; as 1 Tim. 4. 12. Let no man despise thee, that is, do not make thyself despisable. So here, Do not use your knowledge and strength in such a manner as to give occasion to slippery lips, occasion and looseness, and disobedience to God's law. We must deny ourselves in many cases for the preservation of our credit and reputation; forbearing to do that which we rightly know we may lawfully do, when our doing of it may be a prejudice to our good name: as, when it is suspicious, and hath the appearance of evil; or when it is become scandalous among good people; or hath any way a brand upon it. In such a case we must rather cross ourselves, than shame ourselves. Though it be but a little folly, it may be like a dead fly, very prejudicial to one that is in reputation for wisdom and honour, Eccl. 10. 1.

We may apply it more generally. We should manage all our good duties in such a manner that they may not be evil spoken of. That which for itself is good, and good and unexceptionable, may sometimes, by our management of it, become subject to a great deal of censure and reproach. Good praying, preaching, and discourse, may often, for want of prudence in ordering the time, the expression, and other circumstances to edification, be evil spoken of. It is indeed their sin, who do speak evil of that which is good, for the sake of any such circumstantial errors; but it is our folly, if we give any occasion to do so. As we tender the reputation of the good we profess and practise, let us so order it that it may not be evil spoken of.

Secondly, Hast thou faith? Have it to thyself before God, v. 22. It is not meant of justifying faith; (that must not he hid, but manifested by our works;) but of a knowledge and persuasion of our Christian liberty in things disputed;

"Hast thou clearness in such a particular? Art thou satisfied that thou mayest eat all meats, and observe all days, (except the Lord's day,) alike? Have it to thyself, enjoy the comfort of it in thy own bosom, and do not trouble others by the imprudent use of it, when it might give offence, and cause thy weak brother to stumble and fall."

In these indistinct things, though we must not suffer any persuasion, yet we must sometimes conceal it, when the avowing of it will do more hurt than good.

"Have it to thyself; a rule to thyself, not to be imposed upon others, or made a rule to them; or a rejoicing to thyself."

Clearness in doubtful matters contributes very much to our comfortable walking, as it frees us from these scruples, jealousies, and suspicions, those which we have not such clearness, are entangled in endlessly.

Compare Gal. 6. 4. Let every man proce of his own work, bring it to the touchstone of the word, and try it by that so exactly, as to be well satisfied in what he does; and then shall he have no rejoicing in himself alone, and not in another. Paul had faith in these things; I am persuaded that there is nothing unclean of itself; but he had it to himself, so as not to use his liberty to the offence of others.

How happy were it for the church, if those that have a reasonable table, would be satisfied to have it to themselves before God; and not impose those things upon others, and make them terms of communion; than which nothing is more opposite to christian liberty, nor more destructive both to the peace of churches and the peace of consciences. That healing method is not the less excellent for being common; in things necessary, let there be unity, in things unnecessary let there be liberty, and in both let there be charity, then all will be well quickly.

Have it to thyself before God. The end of such knowledge is, that, being satisfied in our liberty, we may have a conscience void of offence toward God, and let that content us. That is the true comfort which we have before God. Those are right indeed, that are so in God's sight.

5. There is one rule more laid down here; and it is this. Let us therefore follow after the things which make for peace, and things wherewith one may edify another, v. 19. Here is the sum of our duty towards our brethren.

(1.) We must study mutual peace. Many wish for peace, and talk loud for it, that do not follow the things that make for peace, but the contrary. Liberty in things indifferent, condescension to those that are weak and tender, zeal in the great things of God, wherein we are all agreed; these are things that make for peace. Meekness, humility, self-dead, and love, are the springs of peace; the things that make for our peace. We are not always so happy as to obtain peace; there are so many that delight in war: but the God of peace will accept us, if we follow after the things that make for peace, if we do our endeavour.

(2.) We must study mutual edification. The former makes way for this. We cannot edify one another, while we are quarrelling and contending. There are many ways by which we may edify one another, if we did but seriously mind it: by good counsel, reproof, instruction, example, building up not only ourselves, but one another, in the most holy faith. We are God's building, God's temple, and have no other badge and badge must study to promote the spiritual growth one of another. None so strong but they may be edified; none so weak, but may edify; and while we edify others, we benefit ourselves.

CHAP. XV.

The apostle in this chapter, continues the discourse of the former, concerning mutual forbearance in indifferent things; and so draws towards a conclusion of the epistle. Where such differences of apprehension, and consequently distances of affection, are there is christian love and peace. He must of precept upon precept, line upon line, to alloy the heat, and to beget a better temper. The apostle, being desirous to drive the nail home, as a nail in a sure place, follows his blow unwilling to leave the subject till he had some hopes of prevailing: to which end he orders the cause before them, and fills his mouth with the most pressing arguments.

We must observe, in this chapter, I. His precepts to them. II. His prayers for them. III. His apology for writing to them. IV. His account of himself and his own affairs. V. His declaration of his purpose to come to see them. VI. His desire of a share in their prayers.

1. We then that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak, and not to please ourselves. 2. Let every one of us please his neighbour for his good to edification. 3. For even Christ pleased not himself; but, as it is written, The reproaches of them that reproached thee fell on me. 4. For whatsoever things were written aforetime were written for our learning, that we through patience and comfort of the scriptures might hope.

The apostle here lays down two precepts, with reasons to enforce them, shewing the duty of the strong christian to consider and condescend to the weakest.

I. We must bear the infirmities of the weak, v. 1. We all have our infirmities; but the weak are more subject to them than others; the weak in knowledge or grace; the bruised reed, and the smoking flax. We must consider these; not trample upon them, but encourage them, and bear with their infirmities. If through weakness they judge and censure us, and speak evil of us, we must bear with them, pity them, and not have our affections alienated from them. Alas! it is their weakness, they cannot help it. Thus Christ bore with his weak disciples, and esteemed for them. But the apostle also bears their infirmities, by sympathizing with them, concerning ourselves for them, ministering strength to them, as there is occasion. That is bearing one another's burdens.

II. We must not please ourselves, but our neighbour, v. 1. 2. We must deny our own humour, in consideration of our brethren's weakness and infirmity. 1. Christians must not please themselves. We must not make it our business to gratify all the little appetites and desires of our own heart; it is good for us to cross ourselves sometimes; and then we shall the better bear others crossing of us. We shall be spoiled, (as Adoniah was,) if we be always humoured. The first lesson we have to learn, is, to deny ourselves, Matt. 16. 24. 2. Christians must please their brethren. The design of christianity is to soften and meeken their spirits, and teach us the art of obliging and true complaisance; not to be servants to the lusts of any, but to the necessities and infirmities of our brethren; to comply with all that we have to do with, as far as we can with a good conscience. Christians should study to be pleasing. Not please ourselves in the use of our christian liberty, which was allowed us, not for our own pleasure, but for the good of God, and the profit and edification of others. So we must please our neighbour. How amiable and comfortable a society would the church of Christ be, if christians would study to please one another, as now we see them common ly industrious to cross, and thwart, and contradict one another!

To prevent, neighbour, not in everything, it is not an unlimited rule; but for his good, especially for the good of his soul: not please him by serving his wicked wills, and humouring him in a sinful way, or consenting to his enticements, or suffering sin upon him; this is a base way of pleasing our neighbour to the ruin of his soul: if we thus please men, we are not the servants of Christ: but please him for his good; not for our own; as if his good and to make a place for himself, but for his spiritual good.

To edification, not only for his profit, but for the profit of others, to edify the body of Christ, by studying to oblige one another. The closer the stones lie, and the better they are squared to fit one another, the stronger is the building.

Now observe the reason, why Christians must please one another; for even Christ pleased not himself. The self-denial and Lord Jesus is the best argument against the selfishness of Christians. Observe,

(1.) That Christ pleased not himself. He did not consult his own worldly interest, ease, safety, or pleasure; he had not where to lay his head, lived upon alms, would not be made a king; detested no proposal with greater abhorrence than that, Master, share thyself; did not seek his own ease, (John 3. 14.) when the Saviour declared the abomination of sinners against himself, troubled himself, (John 11. 33.) did not consult his own honour; and, in a word, emptied himself, and made himself of no reputation: and all this for our sakes, to bring in a righteousness for us, and to set us an example. His whole life was a self-denying, self-displeasing life.

He bore the infirmities of the weak, Heb. 4. 15.

(2.) That herein he was made more than a conqueror. As it is written, The reproaches of them that reproached thee, fell on me. This is quoted out of Ps. 69. 9. the former part of which verse is applied to Christ, (John 2. 17.) The zeal of thine house hath eaten me up: and the latter part here; for David was a type of Christ, and his sufferings, of Christ's sufferings.

It is quoted, to shew that Christ was so far from pleasing himself, that he did in the highest degree deny himself. He laid all in undertaking, considered on the whole, were a task and grievance to him, for he was very willing to it, and very cheerful in it; but in his humiliation, the content and satisfaction of natural inclination were altogether crossed and denied. He preferred our benefit before his own ease and pleasure. This the apostle chooses to express in scripture-language; for how can the things of the Spirit of God be better spoken of than in the Spirit's own words? And in that scripture he alleges, The reproaches of them that reproached thee, fell on me.

[1.] The shame of those reproaches which Christ underwent. Whatever dishonour was done to God, was a trouble to the Lord Jesus. He was grieved for the hardness of people's hearts, beheld a sinful place with sorrow and tears. When the saints were persecuted, Christ so far displeased himself, as to take it, what was done to them as done against himself; Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me? Christ also did himself endure the greatest indignities; there was much of reproach in his sufferings.

[2.] The sin of those reproaches which Christ undertook to satisfy for; so many understand it. Every sin is a kind of reproach to God, especially presumptuous sins; now the guilt of these fell on him, as a Sin-offering for us. When the Lord laid upon him the iniquities of us all, and he bore our sins in his own body upon the tree, they fell upon him as upon our surety. Upon me be the curse.

This was the greatest piece of self-dispensation that could be: considering his infinite spotless purity and holiness; the infinite love of the Father to him, and his eternal concern for his Father's glory; nothing could be more contrary to him, nor more against him, than to be made Sin and a Curse for us, and to have the reproaches of God fall upon him; especially, considering for whom he thus displeased himself, for strangers, enemies, and traitors; the just for the unjust, 1 Pet. 3. 18.

This seems to come in as a reason, why we should be instruments of the weak. We must not please ourselves, for Christ pleased not himself; we must bear the infirmities of the weak, for Christ bore the reproaches of those that reproached God. He bore the guilt of sin, and the curse for it; we are only called to bear a little of the trouble of it. He bore the presumptuous sins of the wicked; we are called only to bear the infirmities of the weak.

Even Christ; 2 Cor. 4. 10. he who was infinitely happy in the enjoyment of himself, who needed not us or our services; even he who thought it no robbery to be equal with God, who had reason enough to please himself, and no reason to be concerned, less much to be crossed, for us; even he pleased not himself, even he bore our sins. And should not we be humble and self-denying, and ready to consider one another, who are members one of another?

(3.) That therefore we must go and do likewise; For whatsoever things were written aforetime, were written for our learning. [1.] That which is written of Christ, concerning his self-denial and sufferings, is written for our learning: he hath left us an example. If Christ denied himself, surely we should deny ourselves, from a principle of ingenuousness and of gratitude, and especially of conformity to his image. These expositions make those of the Old and New Testament, which are of private interpretation, to be looked upon as of private interpretation. What happened to the Old Testament saints, happened to them for example; and the scriptures of the Old Testament have many fulfiliings. The scriptures are left for a standing rule to us: they are written, that they might remain for our use and benefit.

First, For our learning. There are many things to be learned out of the scriptures: and that is the best learning, that is drawn from these foundations. Those are the most learned, that are most mighty in the scriptures. We must therefore labour, not only to understand the literal meaning of the scriptures, but to learn out of it that which will do us good; and have need of help therefore not only to roll away the stone, but to draw out the water; for in many places of the Old Testament, as well as of the New, there are more necessary than critical expositions.

Secondly, That we through patience and comfort of the scriptures might have hope. That hope which hath eternal life for its object, is here proposed as the end of scripture-learning. The scripture was written, that we might know what to hope for from God, and upon what grounds, and in what way.

This should recommend the scripture-learning to us, that it is a special friend to christian hope. Now the way of attaining this hope, is, through patience and comfort of the scripture. Patience and comfort suppose trouble and sorrow; such is the lot of the saints in this world; and were it not so, we should have no occasion for patience and comfort. But both these befriended that hope, which is the life of our souls. Patience works experience, and experience, hope, that maketh not ashamed, ch. 5. 3—5.

The more patience we exercise under troubles, the more hopefully we may look through our troubles; nothing more destructive to hope than impatience.

And the comfort of the scriptures, that comfort which springs from the word of God, (that is the surest and sweetest comfort,) is likewise a great stay to hope, as it is an earnest in hand of the good hoped for. The Spirit, as a Comforter, is the Earliest of our inheritance.

5. Now the God of patience and consolation grant you to be like-minded one towards another, according to Christ Jesus:

6. That ye may with one mind and one mouth glorify God, even the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.

The apostle, having delivered two exhortations, before he proceeds to more, intermixes here a prayer for the success of what he had said. Faithful ministers water their preaching with their prayers, because, whoever sows the seed, it is God that gives the increase. We can but speak to the ear, it is God that must reveal the heart, to give the heart.

The title he gives to God; the God of patience and consolation, who is both the Author and the Foundation of all the patience and consolation of the saints; from whom it springs, and on whom it is built. He gives the grace of patience, he confirms and keeps it up as the God of consolation; for the comforts of the Holy Ghost help to support believers, and to bear them up with courage and cheerfulness more than other. When he comes to beg the pouring out of the spirit of love and unity, he addresses himself to God as the God of patience and consolation. 1. As a God that bears with us, and comforts us; is not extreme to mark what we do amiss, but is ready to comfort them that are cast down; to teach us so to testify our love to our brethren, and by these means to preserve and maintain unity, by being patient one with another, and comforthers more than other. Or, 2. As a God to us his patience and comfort. He had spoken (p. 4.) of patience and comfort of the scriptures; but here he looks up to God as the God of patience and consolation: it comes through the scripture as the conduit-pipe, but from God as the fountain-head. The more patience and comfort we receive from God, the better disposed we are to love one another. Nothing breaks the peace more than an impatient and peevish, and fretful melancholy temper.

II. The mercy he begs of God; Grant you to be like-minded one towards another, according to Christ Jesus. 1. The foundation of Christian love and peace is laid in like-mindedness; a consent in judgment, as far as you have attained; or however, a concord and agreement in affection. To love opposites—to mind the same thing, all occasions of difference removed, and every thing in composition made like. 2. This like-mindedness must be according to Christ Jesus; according to the precept of Christ, the royal law of love, according to the pattern and example of Christ, which he had propounded to them for their imitation, v. 3. Or, "Let Christ Jesus be the Centre of unity. Agree in the truth, not in any error." It was a cursed concord and harmony of those who were of one mind, to give their pretensions and strong wills to the beast; (Rev. 17. 13.) that was not a like-mindedness according to Christ, but against Christ; like the Babel-builders, who were one in their rebellion, Gen. 11. 6. The method of our prayer must be, first for truth, and then for peace; for such is the method of the wisdom that is from above; it is first pure, then peaceable. That is to be like-minded, according to Christ Jesus: 3. Like-mindedness among christians, according to Christ Jesus, is the gift of God; and a precious gift it is, for which we must earnestly seek unto him. He is the Father of spirits, and comforts the hearts of men alike, (Ps. 33. 15.) opens the understanding, softens the heart, sweetens the affections, and gives the grace of love, and the Spirit, as a Spirit of love, to those that ask him. We are taught to pray, that the will of God may be done on earth, as it is done in heaven; now, there it is done unanimously, among the angels, who are one in their praises and services; and our desire must be, that the saints on earth may be so too.

III. The end of his desire; that God may be glorified, v. 6. This is his plea with God in prayer, and is likewise an argument with them to endeavour it. We should have the glory of God in our e.e. in every prayer; therefore our first petition, as the foundation of all the rest, must be, Hallowed be thy name.

Like-mindedness among christians, is in order to our glorifying of God;

1. With one mind and one mouth. It is desirable that christians should agree in every thing, that so they may agree in this, to praise God together. It tends very much to the glory of God who is one, and his Name, whom he is the one, and his grace is one, and his truth is one. It will not suffice, that there be one mouth, but there must be one mouth; for God looks at the heart; Mary, there will hardly be one mouth, where there is not one mind; and God will scarcely be glorified, where there is not a sweet conjunction of both. One mouth in confessing the truths of God, in praising the name of God; one mouth in common converse, not jarring, biting, and devouring one another; one mouth in the solemn assembly; one speaking, but all joining.

2. As the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. That is his New Testament style. God must be glorified as he has now revealed himself in the face of Jesus Christ; according to the rules of the gospel, and with an eye to Christ, in whom he is our Father. The unity of christians glorifies God as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ; because it is a kind of counter-part or representation of the oneness that is between the Father and the Son. We are warranted so to speak of it, and, with that in our eye, to desire it, and pray for it, from John 17. 21. That they all may be one, as thou, Father, art in me, and in thee: high expression of the honour and sweetness of the saints' unity. And it follows, That the world may believe that thou hast sent me; and so God may be glorified as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.

7. Wherefore receive ye one another, as Christ also received us to the glory of God. 8. Now I say that Jesus Christ was a minister of the circumcision for the truth of God, to confirm the promises made unto the fathers; 9. And that the Gentiles might glorify God for his mercy; as it is written, For this cause I will confess to thee among the Gentiles, and sing unto thy name. 10. And again he saith, Rejoice, ye Gentiles, with his people. 11. And again, Praise the Lord, all ye Gentiles; and let him, all ye people. 12. And again Esaias saith, There shall be a root of Jesse, and he that shall rise to reign over the Gentiles; in him shall the Gentiles trust.

The apostle here returns to his exhortation to christians. What he says here, (v. 7.) is to the same purport with the former; but the repetition shows how much the apostle's heart was upon it.

"Receive one another into your affection, into your communion, and into your common conversation, as there is occasion." He had exhorted the strong to receive the weak; (ch. 14. 1.) here, Receive one another; for sometimes the prejudices of the weak christian make him shy of the strong, as much as the pride of the strong christian makes him shy of one of which he ought to be.

Let there be a mutual embracing among christians. Those that have received Christ by faith, must receive all christians by brotherly love; though poor in the world, though persecuted and despised, though it may be matter of reproach and danger to you to receive them; though in the lesser weight matters of the law they are of different apprehensions, though they have different opinions to entertain our brethren? Christ has received us into the nearest and dearest relations to himself: has received us into his fold, into his family, into the adoption of sons, into a covenant of friendship, yea, into a marriage-covenant with himself; has received us (though we were strangers and enemies, and had played the profligal) into fellowship and communion with himself.

Those words the glory of God, may refer both to Christ's receiving us, which is our pattern; and to our receiving one another, which is our practice according to that pattern.

I. Christ hath received us to the glory of God. The end of our reception by Christ, is, that we might glorify God in this world, and be glorified with him in that to come. It was the glory of God, and our glory in the enjoyment of God, that Christ had in his eye, when he condescended to receive us.

We are called to an eternal glory by Christ Jesus, John 17. 24. See to what he received us, to a happiness transcending all comprehension; see for what he received us, for his Father's glory; he had that in his eye in all the instances of his favour to us.

II. We must receive one another to the glory of God. That must be our great end in all our actions, that God may be glorified; and nothing more conduces to that, than the mutual love and kindness of those that profess religion; compare v. 6. That ye may with one mind and one mouth glorify God.

That which was a bone of contention among them, was, a different apprehension about meats and drinks, which took rise in distinction, between Jews and Gentiles. Now, to prevent and make up this difference, he shall shew how Jesus Christ hath received us both Jews and Gentiles; in him they are both one, one new man, Eph. 2. 14-16. Now it is a rule, Quae convenient in aliquo tertio, inter se convenient—Things which agree with a third thing, agree with each other. Those that agree in Christ, who is the Alpha and the Omega, the First and the Last, and the great Centre of unity, may well agree to agree among themselves. This concordance of the Jewish and Gentile parts of the church and christianity, was a thing that filled and affected Paul so much, that he could not mention it without some enlargement and illustration.

1. He received the Jews, v. 8. Let not any think hardly or scornfully therefore of those that were originally Jews, and still, through weakness, retain some savour of their old Judaism: for

(1.) Jesus Christ was a Minister of the circumcision. That he was a Minister, sacerus—a Servant, speaks his great and exemplary condescension, and puts an honour upon the ministry: but that he was a Minister of the circumcision, was himself circumcised, and made under the law, and did in his own person preach the gospel to the Jews, who were of the circumcision—this makes the nation of the Jews more considerable than otherwise they appear to be. Christ conversed with the Jews, blessed them, looked upon himself as primarily sent to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, laid hold of the seed of Abraham. (Heb. 2. 16. margin,) and by them, as it were, caught at the whole body of mankind. Christ's personal ministry was appropriated to them, though the apostles had their commission enlarged.

(2.) He was to be the true Christ. Thus he preached to them, was, the truth; for he came into the world to bear witness to the truth, John 18. 37. And he is himself the Truth, John 14. 6. Or, for the truth of God, that is, to make good the promises given to the patriarchs, concerning the special mercy God had in store for their seed. It was not for the merit of the Jews, but for the truth of God, that they were thus distinguished; that God might approve himself true to this word which he had spoken.

To confirm the promises made unto the fathers. The best confirmation of promises is the performance of them. It was promised, that in the seed of Abraham all the nations of the earth should be blessed; that Shiloh should come from between the feet of Judah; that out of Israel should proceed he that should have the dominion; that out of Zion should go forth salvation. These, and many the like. There were many intermediate providences, which seemed to weaken those promises; providences which threatened the fatal decay of that people; but when Messiah the Prince appeared in the fulness of time, as a Minister of the circumcision, all these promises were confirmed, and the truth of them was made to appear; for in Christ all the promises of God, both those of the Old Testament and those of the New, are Yea, and in him Amen. Understanding by the promises made to the fathers, the whole covenant of grace, darkly administered under the Old Testament, and brought to a clearer light now under the gospel; it was Christ's great errand to confirm that covenant, Dan. 9. 27. He confirmed it by shedding the blood of the covenant.

2. He received the Gentiles likewise. This he shows, v. 9-12.

(1.) Observe Christ's favour to the Gentiles, in taking them in to praise God—the work of the church on earth, and the wages of that in heaven. One design of Christ, was, that the Gentiles likewise might be converted; that they might be one with the Jews in Christ's mystical body. A good reason why they should not think the works of any christian heathen have any worthiness which makes him a Gentile Christ hath received him. He invites the Gentiles, and welcomes them. Now observe how their conversion is here expressed; That the Gentiles might glorify God for his mercy. A paraphrase of conversion.

[1.] They shall have matter for praise, even the mercy of God. Considering the miserable and deplorable condition that the Gentile world was in, the receiving of them appears more as an act of mercy than the receiving of the Jews.

They that were Lo-ammi—not a people, were Lo-ruhamah—not obtaining mercy, Hos. 1. 6. 9. 2. 23. The greatest mercy of God to any people, is, the receiving of them into covenant with himself; and it is good to take notice of God's mercy in receiving us.

[2.] They shall have a heart for praise. They shall glorify God for his mercy. Unconverted sinners do nothing to glorify God; but converting grace works in the soul a disposition to speak and do all to the glory of God; God intended to reap a harvest of glory from the Gentiles, who had been so long turning his glory into shame.

(2.) The fulfilling of the scriptures in this. The favour of God to the Gentiles was not only mercy, but truth. Though there were not promises directly given to them, as to the fathers of the Jews; yet there were many prophecies concerning them, which related to the calling of them, and the immediately of them in the church: some of which he mentions, because it was a thing that the Jews were hardly persuaded to believe. Thus, by referring them to the Old Testament, he labours to qualify their dislike of the Gentiles, and so to reconcile the parties at variance.

[2.] It was foretold, that the Gentiles should have the gospel preached to them, "I will confess to thee among the Gentiles, (v. 9.) the name shall be known, and owned in the Gentile world; there shall gospel-grace and love be celebrated." This is quoted from Ps. 18. 49. I will give thanks unto thee, O Lord, among the heathen. A thankful explication and commemoration of the name of God, are an excellent means of drawing others to know and praise God. This is in the apostles and ministers, whom he sent to disciple all nations, did confess to God among the Gentiles. The exaltation of Christ, as well as the conversion of sinners, is set forth by the preaching of God. Christ's declaring God's name to his brethren, is called his praising of God in the midst of the congregation, Ps. 22. 22.

Taking these words as spoken by David, they were spoken when he was old and dying; and he was not likely to confess to God among the Gentiles, but when David's psalms are read and sung among the Gentiles, to the praise and glory of God, it may be said, that David is confessing to God among the Gentiles, and singing to his name. He that was the sweet psalmist of Israel, is now the sweet psalmist of the Gentiles. Converting grace makes people greatly in love with David's psalms. Taking them as spoken by Christ, the Son of David, it may be understood of those who are encouraged by faith in the hearts of all the praising saints.

If any confess to God among the Gentiles, and sing to his name, it is not they, but Christ and his grace in them. I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me; so I praise, yet not I, but Christ in me.

[3.] That the Gentiles should rejoice with his peculiar. v. 10. This is quoted from that song of Moses, Deut. 32. 43. Observe, Those who were incorporated among his people, are said to rejoice with his people. No greater joy can come to any people, than the coming of the gospel among them in power. Those Jews that retain a prejudice against the Gentiles, will by no means admit them to any of their joyful festivities; for (say they) a stranger intermediate not with the joy, Prov. 14. 10. But the partition-wall being taken down, the Gentiles are welcome to rejoice with his people. Being brought into the church, they share in its sufferings, are companions in patience and tribulation; to recompense which, they share in the joy.

[4.] That they should believe in Christ, (v. 12.) quoted from Isa. 11. 10. Where observe, First, The revelation of Christ, as the Gentiles' King. He is here called the Root of Jesse, that is, such a Branch from the family of David, as is the very life and strength of the family: compare Isa. 11. 1. Christ was David's Lord, and yet withal he was the Son of David, (Matt. 22. 43.) for he was the Root and Offspring of David, Rev. 22. 16. Christ, as God, was David's Root; Christ, as Man, was David's Offspring.

And he that shall rise to reign over the Gentiles. This explains the figurative expression of the prophet, he shall stand for an ensign of the people. When Christ rose from the dead, when he ascended on high, it was to reign over the Gentiles.

Secondly, The recourse of the Gentiles to him; In him shall the Gentiles trust. Faith is the soul's confidence in Christ, and dependence on him. As the prophet has it, To him shall the Gentiles seek. The method of faith, is, first to seek unto Christ, as to one proposed to us for a Saviour; and, finding him able and willing to save, then to trust in him. They that know him will trust in him. Or, this seeking to him is the effect of a trust in him; seeking him by prayer, and pursuant endeavours. We shall never seek to Christ till we trust in him. Trust is the mother; diligence in the use of means, is the nourishment or daughter.

Jews and Gentiles being thus united in Christ's love, why should they not be united in one another's love?

13. Now the God of hope fill you with all joy and peace in believing, that ye may abound in hope, through the power of the Holy Ghost.

Here is another prayer directed to God, as the God of hope; and it is, as the former, (v. 5, 6.) for spiritual blessings; those are the best blessings, and to be first and chiefly prayed for.

I. Observe how he addresses himself to God, as the God of hope. It is good in prayer to fasten upon those names, titles, and attributes of God, which are best suited to the thing we come upon, and will best serve to encourage our faith concerning it. Every word in the prayer should be a plea. Thus should the cause be skillfully ordered, and the mouth filled with arguments. God is the God of hope. He is the Foundation on which our hope is built, and he is the Builder that doth himself raise it: he is both the Object of our hope, and the Author of it. That hope is but fancy, and it is not fastened upon God, (as the Goodness hoped for, and the Truth hoped in,) and which is not of his working in us. We have both together, Ps. 119. 49. Thy word, (there is God the Object,) on which thou hast caused me to hope, there is God the Author of our hope, 1 Pet. 1. 3.

II. What he asks of God; not for himself, but for them.

That they might be filled with all joy and peace in believing. Joy and peace are two of those things in which the kingdom of God consists, ch. 14. 17. Joy in God, peace of conscience, both arising from a sense of our justification; see ch. 5. 1, 2. Joy and peace in our own bosoms would promote a cheerful unity and unanimity with our brethren. Observe,

(1.) How desirable this joy and peace are: they are filling. Carnal joy pays up the soul, but cannot fill it; therefore in laughter the heart is sad. True, heavenly, spiritual joy is filling to the soul; it has a satisfaction in it, answerable to the soul's vast and just desires. Thus does God satiate and replenish the weary soul. Nothing more than this joy, only more of it, even the perfection of it in glory, is the desire of the soul that hath it, Ps. 4. 6, 7.—36. 8.—55. 5.—49.

386. How it is attainable. [1.] By prayer. We must go to God for it; he will for this be inquired of. Prayer fetches in spiritual joy and peace. [2.] By believing; that is the means to be used. It is vain, and flashy, and transient joy, that is the product of fancy; true substantial joy is the fruit of faith. Believing, ye rejoice with joy unspeakable, 1 Pet. 1. 8. It is owing to the weakness of our faith, that we are so much wanting in joy and peace. Only believe; believe the goodness of Christ, the love of Christ, the promises of the covenant, and the joys and glories of heaven; let faith be the substance and evidence of these things, and the result must needs be joy and peace.

Observe, It is all joy and peace; all sorts of true joy and peace. When we come to God by prayer, we must enlarge our desires; we are not straitened in him, why should we be straitened in ourselves? Ask for more joy open thy mouth wide, and he will fill it.

2. That they might abound in hope through the power of the Holy Ghost. The joy and peace of believers arise chiefly from their hopes. What is laid out upon them, is but little, compared with what is laid up for them; therefore the more hope they have the more joy and peace they have. We do then abound in hope, when we hope for great things from God, and see our desires more nearly established and confirmed in these hopes. Christians should desire and labour after an abundance of hope, such hope as will not make ashamed. This is through the power of the Holy Ghost. The same almighty power that works grace, begets and strengthens this hope. Our own power will never reach it; and therefore where this hope is, and is abounding, the blessed Spirit must have all the glory.

14. And I myself also am persuaded of you, my brethren, that ye also are full of goodness, filled with all knowledge, able also to admonish one another. 15. Nevertheless, brethren, I have written the more boldly unto you in some sort, as putting you in mind, because of the grace that is given to me of God, 16. That I should be the minister of Jesus Christ to the Gentiles, ministering the gospel of God, that the offering up of the Gentiles might be acceptable, being sanctified by the Holy Ghost.

I. He commends these christians with the highest characters that could be. He began his epistle with their praises, (ch. 1. 8.) Your faith is spoken of throughout the world, thereby to make way for his discourse: and now he concludes with the like commendation, because sometimes he had reproved them sharply, to qualify them, and to part friends. This he does like an orator. It was not a piece of idle flattery and compliment, but a duc acknowledgment of their worth, and of the grace of God in them. We must be forward to observe and commend that in others, which is excellent and praise-worthy; it is part of the present recompense of virtue and usefulness, and will be of use to quicken others to a holy emulation. It was a great credit to the Romans to be commended by Paul, a man of so great judgment and integrity, so skilful to be exacting, and so honest to flatter.

Paul had no personal acquaintance with these christians, and yet he says, he was persuaded of their excellencies, though he knew them only by hearsay. As we must not, on the one hand, be so simple as to believe every word; so, on the other hand, we must not be so sceptical as to believe nothing; but especially we must be forward to believe good concerning such persons as have pleased God to put them in our way. If we believe them not, we displease God, who has put them there for our instruction. Heareth all things, and believeth all things, and (if the probabilities be any thing strong, as here they were) is persuaded. It is safer to err on that hand.

Now observe what it was that he commended them for.

1. That they were full of goodness; therefore the more likely to take in good part what he had written, and to account it a kindness; and not only so, but to comply with it, and to put it in practice; especially that which relates to their union, and to the healing of their differences. A good understanding of one another, and a good will to one another, would soon put an end to strife.

2. Filled with all knowledge. Goodness and knowledge together! A very rare and an excellent conjunction: the head and heart of the new man. All knowledge, all necessary knowledge, all the knowledge of those things which belong to their everlasting peace.

3. Able to admonish one another. To this there is a further gift requisite, even the gift of utterance. Those that have goodness and knowledge, should communicate what they have for the use and benefit of others. “You that excel so much in good gifts, may think you have need of many instructions.” It is a comfort to faithful ministers, to see their work superseded by the gifts and graces of their people. How gladly would ministers leave off their admonishing work, if people were able and willing to admonish one another! Would to God, that all the Lord’s people were prophets. But that which is every body’s work, is no body’s work; and therefore,

II. He clears himself from the suspicion of intermeddling needlessly with that which did not belong to him, v. 15. Observe how affectionately he speaks to them: My brethren, (v. 14.) and again, brethren, v. 15. He had himself, and taught others, the art of obliging. He calls them all his brethren, to teach them brotherly love one to another. Probably, he wrote the more courteously to them, because, being Roman citizens, living near the court, they were more gentle. He had become a better to all men, was willing, by the respectfulness of his style, to please them for their good. He acknowledges he had written boldly in some sort—σέβομαι σοι ως μένος, in a manner that looked like boldness and presumption, and for which some might perhaps charge him with taking too much upon him. But then consider,

1. He did it only as their remembrancer; as putting you in mind. Such humble thoughts had Paul of himself, though he excelled in knowledge, that he would not pretend to tell them that which they did not know before; but only to remind them of that in which they had formerly been by others instructed. So Peter, 2 Pet. 1. 12.3. 1. People commonly excuse themselves from the hearing of the word, that the minister can tell them nothing but what they knew before. If it be so, yet have they not need to know it better, and to be put in mind of it?

2. He did it as the apostle of the Gentiles. It was in pursuance of his office; Because of the grace (the apostleship, ch. 1. 5.) given to me of God, to be the minister of Jesus Christ to the Gentiles, v. 16. Paul reckoned it a great favour, and an honour that God had put upon him, in putting him into that office. Now because of this grace given to him, he thus laid out himself among the Gentiles, that he might not receive that grace of God in vain. Christ received, that he might give; so did Paul; so have we.
17. I have therefore wherein I may glory through Jesus Christ in those things which pertain to God.

18. For I will not dare to speak of any of those things which Christ hath not wrought by me, to make the Gentiles obedient, by word and deed.

19. Through mighty signs and wonders, by the power of the Spirit of God; so that from Jerusalem, even round about unto Illyricum, I have fully preached the gospel of Christ.

20. Yea, so have I striven to preach the gospel, not where Christ was named, lest I should build upon another man's foundation; 21. But as it is written, To whom he was not spoken of, they shall see: and they that have not heard shall understand.

The apostle here gives some account of himself and of his own affairs. Having mentioned his ministry and apostleship, he goes on further to magnify his office in the efficacy of it; and to mention, to the glory of God, the great success of his ministry, and the wonderful things that God had done by him; for encouragement to the christian church at Rome, that they were not alone in the profession of christianity; but though, compared with the multitude of their idolatrous neighbours, they were but a little flock, yet, up and down the country, there were many that were their companions in the kingdom and patience of Jesus Christ. It was likewise a great confirmation of the truth of the christian doctrine, that it had such strong and lasting effects; and was so far proceed, as such weak and unlikely means; such multitudes capitivated to the obedience of Christ by the foolishness of preaching. Therefore Paul gives them this account; which he makes the matter of his glorying; not vain glory, but holy, gracious glorying, which appears by the limitations; it is through Jesus Christ. Thus does he centre all his glorying in Christ; he teaches us to do so, 1 Cor. 1. 31. Not of us, or from us, but through us, as the power and efficacy of the preaching of Christ, and the wonderful things that he did by his grace to speak and work in them.
be suspected, that if Paul undertook so much work, surely he did it by the halves. "No," says he, "I have fully preached the gospel of Christ; have given them a full account of the truth and truths of the gospel, have not shunned to declare the whole counsel of God, (Acts 20. 27.) I have kept back nothing that was necessary for them to know." Filled the gospel, so the word is; συμπληρώθη τὸν αὐτοῦ, filled it as the net is filled with fishes in a large draught; or filled the gospel, that is, filled them with the gospel. Such a change does the gospel make, that, when it comes in power to any place, it fills the place. Other knowledge is airy, and leaves souls empty, but the knowledge of the gospel is filling.

2. He preached in places that had not heard the gospel before, v. 20, 21. He brake up fallow ground, laid the first stone in many places, and introduced Christianity there, where nothing had reigned for many ages but idolatry and witchcraft, and all sorts of diabolism. Paul brake the ice, and therefore must needs meet with the more difficulties and discouragements in his work. Those who preached in Judea, had, upon this account, a much easier task than Paul, who was the apostle of the Gentiles; for they entered into the labours of others, John 4. 38.

Paul, being a hardy man, was called out to the hardest work; there were many instructors, but Paul was the great father; many that watered, but Paul was the great planter. Well, he was a bold man that made the first attack upon the palace of the strong man armed in the Gentile world; that first assaulted Satan's interest there; and Paul was that man who ventured the first onset in many places, and suffered greatly for it. He mentions this as a proof of his apostleship; for the office of the apostles was especially to bring in those that were without, and to lay the foundations of a new church. See Rev. 21. 14. Not but that Paul preached in many places where others had been at work before him; but he principally and mainly laid himself out for the good of those that sat in darkness. He was in care not to build upon another man's foundation, lest he should thereby disprove his apostleship, and give occasion to those who sought occasion to reflect upon his younger brethren. He at length leaves a particular account of this, v. 32.

15. To whom he was not spoken of, they shall see. That which had not been told them, shall they see; so the prophet has it, much to the same purport. This made the success of Paul's preaching the more remarkable. The transition from darkness to light is more sensible than the after-growth and increase of that light. And commonly the greatest success of the gospel is at its first coming to a place; afterward, people become sermon-proof.

II. The great and wonderful success that he had in this work. It was effectual to make the Gentiles obedient. The design of the gospel is to bring people to be obedient; it is not only a truth to be believed, but a law to be obeyed. This Paul aimed at in all his travels; not his own wealth and honour, (if he had, he had much of both,) or the converse and salvation of souls: that his heart was upon, and for that he travailed in birth again.

Now how was this great work wrought? 1. Christ was the principal Agent. He does not say, "which I worked," but, "which Christ wrought by me," v. 18. Whatever good we do, it is not our own work, but Christ by us, that does it; the work is his, the credit is his own. His, All in all. In all our work, Phil. 2. 13. Isa. 26. 12. Paul takes all occasions to own this, that the whole praise might be transmitted to Christ.

Paul was a very active minister; By word and deed, that is, by his preaching, and by the miracles he wrought to confirm his doctrine; or his preaching and his living. Those ministers are likely to win souls, that preach both by word and deed; by their conversation shewing forth the power of the truths they preach. This is according to Christ's example, who began both to do and teach, Acts 1. 1.

Through mighty signs and wonders: in ἑξέχοντο σημεία—by the power, or in the strength, of signs and wonders. These made the preaching of the word so effectual, being the appointed means of conviction, and the divine seal affixed to the gospel-charter, Mark 16. 17, 18.

3. The power of the Spirit of God made this effectual, and crowned all with the desired success, v. 19. (1.) The power of the Spirit in Paul, as in all the other apostles, for the working of those miracles, Miracles were wrought by the power of the Holy Ghost, (Acts 1. 8.) therefore reproaching the miracles is called the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost. Or, (2.) The power of the Spirit in the hearts of those to whom the word was preached, and who saw the miracles, making these means effectual to some, and not to others. It is the Spirit's operation that makes the difference. Paul himself, great a preacher as he was, with all his mighty signs and wonders, could not make one soul obedient farther than the power of the Spirit of God accompanied his labours. It was the Spirit of the Lord of hosts that made those great mountains plain before this Zerubbabel. This is an encouragement to faithful ministers, who labour under the sense of great weakness and inferiority, that it is all one to the blessed Spirit to work by many, or by those that have no power. The same almighty Spirit that wrought with Paul, often perfects strength in weakness, and ordains praise out of the mouth of babes and sucklings. This success which he had in preaching, is that which he here rejoices in; for the converted nations were his joy, and crown of rejoicing: and he tells them of it, not only that they might rejoice with him, but that they might be the more ready to receive the truths which he had written to them, and to own him whom Christ had thus signally owned.

29. For which cause also I have been much hindered from coming to you. 23. But now having no more place in these parts, and having a great desire these many years to come unto you; 24. Whenceover I take my journey into Spain, I will come to you: for I trust to see you in my journey, and to be brought on my way thitherward by you, if first I be somewhat filled with your company. 25. But now I go unto Jerusalem to minister unto the saints. 26. For it hath pleased them of Macedonia and Achaia to make a certain contribution for the poor saints which are at Jerusalem. 27. It hath pleased them verily; and their debtors they are. For if the Gentiles have been made partakers of their spiritual things, their duty is also to minister unto them in carnal things. 28. When therefore I have performed this, and have sealed to them this fruit, I will come by you into Spain. 29. And I am sure that, when I come unto you, I shall come in the fulness of the blessing of the gospel of Christ.

St. Paul here declares his purpose to come and see the christians at Rome. Upon this head his matter is but common and ordinary, appointing a visit to his friends; but the manner of his expression is gracious and savoury, very instructive, and for our imitation. We should learn by it to speak of our common affairs in the language of Canaan. Even our common discourse should have an air of grace; by that it will appear what necessity so belongs to. Let us see now to what great end Paul's company was very much desired at Rome. He was a man that had as many friends and as many enemies as most men ever had: he passed through evil report and good report. No doubt, they had heard much of him at Rome, and longed to see him. Should the apostle of the Gentiles be a stranger at Rome, the metropolis of the Gentile world? Why, as to this, he excuses it, that he had not come to Rome by choice, he had no very good reason why he could not come now.

1. He excuses it, that he never came yet. Observe how careful Paul was to keep in with his friends, and to prevent and anticipate any exceptions against him; not as one that lorded it over God's heritage.

2. He assures them that he had a great desire to see them; not to see Rome, though it was now in its greatest pomp and splendour; nor to see the emperor himself, in whose presence he had been, and learned men that were then at Rome, though such conversation must needs be very desirable to so great a scholar as Paul was, but to come unto you, (v. 33.) a company of poor despeised saints in Rome, hated of the world, but loving God, and beloved of him. These were the men that Paul was ambitious of an acquaintance with at Rome; they were the excellent ones in whom he delighted. He desired to see them, because of the great character they had in all the churches for faith and holiness; they were men that excelled in virtue, and therefore Paul was so desirous to come to them.

This desire Paul had for many years, and yet could never compass it. The providence of God wisely over-rules the purposes and desires of men. God's dearest servants are not always gratified in every thing that they have a mind to. Yet all that delight in God, have the desire of their heart fulfilled, (Ps. 37. 4.) though all the desires in their heart be not humoured.

2. He tells them, that therefore he could not come to them, because he had so much work cut out for him elsewhere. For which cause, that is, because of his labours in other countries, thence it was that he was so much hindered. God had opened a wide door to him in other places, and so engaged him.

Observe, in this, (1.) The gracious providence of God conversant in a special manner about his ministers, casting their lot, not according to their convenience, but according to his own purpose. Paul was several times crossed in his intentions; sometimes hindered by Satan, (as 1 Thess. 2. 18.) sometimes forbidden by the Spirit, (Acts 16. 7.) and here diverted by other work. Man purposes, but God disposeth.

(2.) Many a purpose, and their friends purpose concerning them, but God overrules both, and orders the journeys, removes, and settlements, of his faithful ministers as he pleases. The stars are in the right hand of Christ, to shine where he sets them. The gospel does not come by chance to any place, but by the will and counsel of God. (2.) The gracious prudence of Paul, in settling his own path, for he did no thing when there was most need. Had Paul consulted his own case, wealth, and honour, the greatness of the work would never have hindered him from seeing Rome, but would rather have driven him thither, where he might have had more preferment, and taken less pains. But Paul sought the things of Christ more than his own things, and therefore would not leave his work of planting churches, no not for a time, to go see Rome. The Romans were whole, and needed not the physician so as other poor places that were sick and dying. While men and women were every day dropping into eternity, and their precious souls perishing for lack of vision, it was no time for Paul to trifle. There was now a gale of opportunity, the fields were white unto the harvest; such a season ship might never be renewed: the need of poor souls was pressing, and called loud, and therefore Paul must be busy. It concerns us all to do that first, which is most needful. True grace teaches us to prefer that which is necessary before that which is unnecessary, Luke 10. 41, 42. And christian prudence teaches us to prefer that which is more necessary before that which is less so. This, Paul mentions as a sufficient satisfying reason. We must make it our concern to set aside our short-sight work, which is pleasing to God, before unnecessary visits and compliments, which may be pleasing to us. In this, as in other things, we must deny ourselves. II. He promised to come and see them shortly, v. 23, 24, 29.

Having no more place in these parts, that is, in Greece, where he then was. The whole of that country being more or less leavened with the savour of his doctrine, he was sent to the provinces, to transact business, to visit, to superintend, and to take care of his churches; to bring them, as was threaten'd, to the fruit of peace. He set about it, and was detain'd, 1 Sam. 6. 6. They were in the hands of the enemy, and were to be recover'd, however against their will, by the sword of the LORD, Gen. 14. 17. The sword and the plow were to be exchange'd, 23, 24, 25. They had been brought under the yoke of the word of the gospel, and were to be brought under the yoke of the sword of the spiritual sword, v. 25. Is his v. 23, 24. But all that Paul had done, he had not done to himself. Observe, (1.) He must do more work. "Self-denial more work, to devise liberal things. Here was a workman that needed not be ashamed. Observe,"

1. How he forecasted his intended visit. His project was to see them in his way to Spain. It appears by this, that Paul intended a journey into Spain, to plant Christianity there. The difficulty and peril of the work, the distance of the place, the danger of the voyage, the other good works (though less needful, he thinks) which Paul might find to do in other places, did not quench the flame of his holy zeal for the propagating of the gospel, which did even eat him up, and make him forget himself. But it is not certain, whether ever he fulfilled this purpose, and went to Spain. Many of the best expositors think he did not, but was hindered in this as he was in others of his purposes. He did indeed come to Rome, but he was brought thither a prisoner, and not a prisoner to visit them. And whether he went after is uncertain: but several of his epistles which he wrote in prison, intimate his purpose to go eastward, and not toward Spain. However, Paul, for as much as it was in thine heart to bring the light of the gospel into Spain, thou didst well, in that it was in thine heart; as God said to David, 2 Chron. 6. 8. The grace of God often with favour accepts the sincere intentions, when the providence of God in man's purpose is different. And did not we see a good Master then? 2 Cor. 8. 12.

Now, in his way to Spain, he proposed to come to them. Observe his prudence. It is wisdom for every one of us to order our affairs so that we may do the most work in the least time.

Observe how doubtfully he speaks; I trust to see you; not, I am resolved I will. His fear was, I will not. He was so judicious in his purposes and made all our promises, in like manner, with a submission to the Divine Providence; not boasting ourselves of to-morrow, because we know not what a day may bring forth, Prov. 27. 1. James 4. 13-15.

2. What he expected in this intended visit.

(1.) What he expected from them. He expected they would bring him on his way toward Spain, it was not a stately attendance, such as princes have, but a loving attendance, such as friends give, that Paul expected. Spain was then a province of the empire, well known to the Romans, who had a great correspondence with it, and therefore they might be helpful to Paul in his voyage thither; and it was not barely the accompanying of him part of the way, but their furthering him in his expedition, that he counted upon: not only out of their respect to Paul, but out of respect to the souls of those poor Spaniards that Paul was going to preach to. It is justly expected from all Christians, that they should lay out themselves for the promoting and furthering of the gospel, — not only by maintaining the work of the conversion of souls; which they should contrive to make as easy as may be to his ministers, and as successful as may be to poor souls.

(2.) What he expected in them; to be somewhat filled with their company. That which Paul desired, was, their company and conversation. The good company of the saints is very desirable and delightful. Paul looks upon himself a man of great attainments in knowledge and grace, taller by head and shoulders than other christians in these things, and yet see how he pleased himself with the thoughts of good company; for as iron sharpens iron, so does a man the countenance of his friend. He intimates that he intended to make some stay with them, for he would be filled with their company; not just look at them, and away: and yet he thinks their company very good generally; he has it in mind that it is somewhat filled, he thought he should leave them with a desire of more of their company. Christian society, rightly managed and improved, is a heaven upon earth, a comfortable earnest of our gathering together unto Christ at the great day. Yet observe, it is but somewhat filled, ὡς ὑπὸ μέρη — in part. The satisfaction we have in communion with the saints in this world, is but partial; we are but somewhat filled, compared with our communion with Christ; that, and that only, will completely satisfy, that will fill the soul: it is partial, compared with the communion we hope to have with the saints in the other world. When we shall sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, with all the saints, and none but saints, and saints made perfect, we shall have enough of that society, and be more than somewhat filled with that company.

(3.) What he expected from God with them, v. 29. He expected to come in the fulness of the blessing of the gospel of Christ. Observe, Concerning what he expected from them he speaks doubtfully, I trust to be brought on my way, and to be filled with your company. Paul had learnt not to be too confident of the best. These very men slipped from him afterward, when he had occasion for service therein; (2 Tim. 16.) At my first answer, no man stood by me; none of the christians at Rome. The Lord teach us to cease from man. But concerning what he expected from God, he speaks confidently. It was uncertain whether he should come or no, but I am sure when I do come, I shall come in the fulness, &c. We cannot expect too little from man, nor too much from God. Now Paul expected the blessing of the gospel, to be a deal of good among them, and fill them with the blessings of the gospel. Compare ch. 1. 11. That I may impart unto you some spiritual gift. The blessing of the gospel of Christ is the best and more desirable blessing. When Paul would raise their expectation of something great and good in his coming, he directed them, to hope both the blessings of the gospel, spiritual blessings, knowledge, and grace, and comfort. There is then a happy meeting between people and ministers, when they are both under the fulness of the blessing. The blessing of the gospel is the treasure, which we have in earthen vessels. When ministers are fully prepared to give out, and people fully prepared to receive, this blessing, both are happy. Many have the gospel, who have not the blessing of the gospel, and so they have it in vain. The gospel will not profit, unless God bless it to us; and it is our duty to wait upon him for that blessing, and for the fulness of it.

III. He gives them a good reason why he could not come and see them now; because he had other business upon his hands, which required his attendance, upon which he must first make a journey to Jerusalem. He gives a particular account of it, to shew that the excuse was real. He was going to Jerusalem, as the messenger of the church's charity to the poor saints there. Observe what he says.

1. Concerning this charity itself. And he speaks of that upon this occasion probably, to excite the Roman christians to do the like, according to their ability. Examples are moving, and Paul was very ingenious at legging; not for himself, but for others. Observe.

(1.) For whom it was intended: for the poor saints which are at Jerusalem, v. 26. It is no strange thing for saints to be poor. Those whom God favours, the world often frowns upon; therefore riches are not the best things, nor poverty a curse.

It seems, the saints at Jerusalem were poorer than other saints; either, because the wealth of that people in general was now declining, as their utter poverty was hastening on; and, to be sure, if any must be kept poor, the saints must: or, because the famine that was over all the world in the days of Claudius Cesar, did in a special manner prevail in Judaea, a dry country; and God having called the poor of this world, the christians smaried most by it. This was the occasion of that contribution mentioned Acts 11. 28, &c. Dr. Owen saith, when the saints at Jerusalem suffered most by persecution; for of all the people the unbelieving Jews were most invertebrate in their rage and malice against the christians, wrath being come upon them to the uttermost, 1 Thess. 2. 16. The christian Hebrews are particularly noted as to having had their goods spoiled, (Heb. 10. 34.) in consideration of which this contribution was made for them. Though the saints at Jerusalem were at a great distance from them, yet they this extended their bounty and liberality to them; to teach us, as we have ability, and as there is occasion, to stretch out the hand of our charity to all that are of the household of faith, though in places distant from us. Though in personal instances of poverty, every church should take care to maintain their own poor, (for such poor we have always with us,) yet sometimes, when more public instances of poverty are presented as objects of our charity, though a great way off from us, we must extend our bounty, as the sun his beams; and with the virtuous woman, stretch out our hands to the poor, and reach forth our hand to the needy, Prov. 31. 20.

(2.) By whom it was collected: by them of Macedonia (the chief of whom were the Philippian) and Achaia, (the chief of whom were the Corinthians,) v. 2. There is a flourishing of these churches, though in their infancy, newly converted to christianity. And I wish the observation did not hold, that people are commonly more liberal at their first acquaintance with the gospel than they are afterward; that, as well as other instances of the first love and the love of the espousals, being apt to cool and decay after a while.

It seems, they of Macedonia and Achaia were rich and wealthy, while they at Jerusalem were poor and needy; Infinite Wisdom ordering it so, that some should have what others want, and so this mutual dependence of christians one upon another might be maintained.

It pleased them. This intimates how ready they were to it; they were not pressed or constrained to t, but they did it of their own accord; and how cheerful they were in it, they took a pleasure in doing good; and God loves a cheerful giver.

1. To make a certain contribution; samarbis viv—a communication; in token of the communion of saints, and their fellow-membership, as in the natural body one member communicates to the relief, and succour, and preservation of another, as there is occasion. Every thing that passes between christians should be a proof and instance of that common union which they have one with another in Jesus Christ.

There was, when the saints at Jerusalem were on the giving hand, and very liberal they were, when they laid their estates at the apostles feet for charitable uses, and took special care that the Grecian widows should not be neglected in the daily ministration, Acts 6. 1, 8c. And now that the providence of God had turned the scale, and made them necessitous, they found the Grecians kind to them; for the merciful shall obtain mercy. We should therefore give a portion to seven, and also to eight, because we know not what evil may be on the earth, which may make us glad to be beholden to others.

3. What reason there was for it; (v. 27.) And their debtors they are. Alms are called righteousness, Ps. 112. 9. Being but stewards of what we have, we owe it there where our great Master (by the calls of providence, the consciences of the persons and the words of the word) orders us to dispose of it; but here there was a special debt owing; the Gentiles were greatly beholden to the Jews, and were bound in gratitude to be very kind to them. From the stock of Israel came Christ himself, according to the flesh, who is the Light to lighten the Gentiles; out of the same stock came the prophets, and apostles, and first preachers of the gospel. The Jews, having had the lively oracles committed to them, were the christians library-keepers; out of Zion went forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem; their political church-state was dissolved, and they were cut off, that the Gentiles might be admitted in. Thus did the Gentiles partake of their spiritual things, and did receive the gospel of salvation as it were at second-hand from the Jews; and therefore their duty is, they are bound in gratitude, to minister unto them in such things: it is the least they can do; *μηρητώς—*to minister as unto God in holy things; so the word signifies. A conscientious regard to God in works of charity and almsgiving, makes them an acceptable service and sacrifice to God, and fruit abounding to a good account. Paul mentions this, probably, as the argument he had used with them to persuade them to it, and it is an argument of equal cogency to other gentle churches.

2. Concerning Pauls agency in this business. He could himself contribute nothing; silver and gold he had none, but lived upon the kindness of his friends; yet he ministered unto the saints, (v. 25.) by stirring up others, receiving what was gathered, and transmitting it to Jerusalem. Many good works of that kind stand at a stay for want of some one active person to lead in them, and to set the wheels a-going.

Paul's labour in this work is not to be interpreted as any neglect of his preaching-work; nor did Paul leave the word of God, to serve tables; for besides that Paul, had other business in this journey, to visit and confirm the churches, and took this by the bye; this was indeed a part of the trust committed to him; but it was a part of his trust committed to him to prove himself faithful; (Gal. 2. 10.) They would that we should remember the poor. Paul was one that laid out himself to do good every way, like his Master, to the bodies as well as the souls of people. Ministering to the saints is good work, and is not below the greatest apostles.

This, Paul had undertaken, and therefore he resolved to go through with it, before he fell upon other work; (v. 28.) When I have sealed to them this fruit. He calls the alms fruit, for it is one of the fruits of righteousness; it sprang from the root of grace in the givers, and redounded to the benefit and comfort of the receivers. And his sealing of it intimates his great care about it, that what was given might be kept entire, and not embezzled, but bestowed according to the design of the givers. Paul was very solicitous for him to proceed in these spiritual works in the management of this matter: an excellent pattern for ministers to write after, that the ministry may in nothing be blamed.

30. Now I beseech you, brethren, for the Lord Jesus Christ's sake, and for the love of the Spirit, that ye strive together with me in your prayers to God for me; 31. That I may be delivered from them that do not believe in Judea; and that my service which I have for Jerusalem may be accepted of the saints: 32. That I may come unto you with joy by the will of God, and may with you be refreshed. 33. Now the God of peace be with you all. Amen.

Here we have,

I. St. Paul's desire of a share in the prayers of the Romans for him, expressed very earnestly, v. 30—32. Though Paul was a great apostle, yet he begged the prayers of the meanest christians, not here only, but in several other of the epistles. He had prayed much for them, and this he desires as the argument of his faithfulness. Interchange of prayers is an excellent token of the interchanging of loves. Paul speaks like one that knew himself, and would hereby teach us how to value the effectual fervent prayer of the righteous. How careful should we be lest we do any thing to forfeit our interest in the love and prayers of God's praying people!

1. Observe why they must pray for him. He begs it with the greatest importance. He might shew very solid grounds to his request, because they had no personal acquaintance with him, and therefore he urged them very closely, and begs it with the most affectionate oblations, by all that is sacred and valuable; I beseech you,

(1.) For the Lord Jesus Christ's sake; He is my Master, I am going about his work, and his glory is interested in the success of it: if you have any regard to Jesus Christ, and to his cause and kingdom, pray for me. You love Christ, and own Christ; for his sake then do me this kindness.

(2.) For the love of the Spirit. As a proof and instance of that love which the Spirit works in the hearts of believers one to another, pray for me; as a fruit of that communion which we have one with another by the Spirit, though we never saw one another. If ever you experienced the Spirit's love to you, and would be found returning your love to the Spirit, be not wanting in this office of kindness.

2. How they must pray for him; that ye strive together.

(1.) That ye strive in prayer. Those that would prevail in prayer, must strive in prayer. We must put forth all that is within us, in that duty; pray with fixedness, faith, and fervency; wrestle with God, as Jacob did; pray in praying, as Elias did, (Jam. 5. 17.) and stir up ourselves to take hold on God; (Isa. 64. 7.) and this is not only when we are praying for ourselves, but when we are praying for our friends. True love to our brethren should make us as earnest for them as sense of our own need makes it for ourselves.

(2.) That ye strive together with me. When he begged their prayers for him, he did not intend thereby to excuse his praying for himself; no, "Strive together with me, who am wrestling with God daily, upon my own and my friends' account." He would have them to ply the same mn as Paul and these Romans were distant in place, and likely to do so; and yet they might join together in prayer; those who are put far asunder by the disposal of God's providence, may yet meet together at the throne of his grace. Those who beg the prayers of others, must not neglect to pray for themselves.

3. What they must beg of God for him. He mentions particulars; for in praying both for ourselves and for our friends, it is good to be particular. What will they that I ask you for? So in Christ, when he holds out the golden sceptre. Though he knows our state and wants perfectly, he will know them from us. He recommends himself to their prayers, with reference to three things.

(1.) The dangers which he was exposed to; That I may be delivered from them that do not believe in Judea. The unbelieving Jews were the most violent enemies Paul had, and most enraged against him. They were the ones he had reason to fear in this journey: and therefore they must pray that God would deliver him. We may, and must, pray against persecution. This prayer was answered in several remarkable deliverances of Paul, recorded Acts 21, 22, 23, 24.

(2.) His services; Pray, that my service which I have for Jerusalem, may be accepted of the saints. Why, was there any danger that it would not be accepted? Can money be otherwise than acceptable to the poor? Yes, there was some ground of suspicion in this case; for Paul was the apostle of the Gentiles, and as the unbelieving Jews looked spitefully at him, which was their wickedness, so those that believed, were shy of him upon that account, which was their weakness. He does not say, "Let them choose whether they will accept it or no; if they will not, it shall be better bestowed out." Pray that it may be accepted." As God must be sought unto for the restraining of the ill will of our enemies, so also for the preserving and increasing of the good will of our friends; for God hath the hearts both of the one and of the other in his hands.

(3.) His journey to them. To engage their prayers for him, he interests them in his concerns; (v. 32.) The Lord hath called me by his grace. His intended journey to Jerusalem proved unsuccessful, his intended journey to Rome would be uncomfortable. If he should not do well, and prosper, in one visit, he thought he should have small joy of the next: may come with joy, by the will of God. All our joy depends upon the will of God. The comfort of the creature is in every thing according to the disposal of God.
of his expressions, sanctifies these common compliments.

I. Here is the recommendation of a friend, by whom (as some think) this epistle was sent—"one Phoebe, ... 1, 2. It should seem, that she was a person of quality and estate, who had business which called her to Rome, where she was a stranger; and therefore Paul recommends her to the acquaintance of the christians there: an expression of his true friendship to her. Paul was as well skilled in the art of obliging as most men. True religion, rightly recommended, may incline many. Courtesy and christianity agree well together. It was not in compliment to her, but in sincerity, that,

1. He gives a very good character of her.

(1.) As a sister to Paul; Phoebe our sister: not in nature, but in grace; not in affinity or consanguinity, but in pure christianity: his own sister in the faith of Christ; loving Paul, and beloved of him, with a pure and chaste and spiritual love, as a sister; for there is neither male nor female, but all are one in Christ Jesus, Gal. 3. 28. Both Christ and his apostles had some of their best friends among the devout (and upon that account honourable) women.

(2.) As a servant to the church at Cenchrea: διακονος, a servant by office, a stated servant, not to preach the word, (that was forbidden to women,) but in acts of charity and hospitality. Some think she was one of the widows that ministered to the sick, and were taken into the church's number, 1 Tim. 5. 9. But those were old and poor, whereas Phoebe seems to have been a person of some account; and yet it was no disparagement to her to be a servant to the church. Probably, they used to meet at her house, and she undertook the care of entertaining the ministers, especially strangers. Every one in his place should strive to serve the church, for therein he serves Christ, and it will turn to a good account another day. Cenchrea was a small sea-port town adjoining to Corinth, about twelve furlongs distant. Some think there was a church there, distinct from that at Corinth; though, being so near, it is very probable that the church of Corinth is called the church of Cenchrea, because their place of meeting might be there, on account of the great opposition to them in the city, (Acts 18. 12,) as at Philippi, where they met before the city, Acts 16. 13. So the reformed church of Paris might be called the church at Charenton, where they formerly met, out of the city.

(3.) As a succourer of many, and particularly of Paul, v. 2. She relieved many that were in want and distress; a good copy for women to write after, that have ability. She was kind to those that needed kindness, intimated in her succouring of them; and her bounty was extensive, she was a succourer of many. Observe the gratitude of Paul in mentioning her particular kindness to him; and to myself also. Acknowledgment of favours is the least return we can make. It was much to her honour, that Paul left this upon record; for wherever this epistle is read, her kindness to Paul is told for a memorial of her.

2. He recommends her to their care and kindness, as one worthy to be taken notice of with peculiar respect.

(1.) " Receive her in the Lord. Entertain her, bid her welcome." This pass, under Paul's hand, could not but recommend her to any christian church. "Receive her in the Lord," that is, "for the Lord's sake." She was one of the servants and friend of Christ. As it becometh saints to receive who love Christ, and therefore love all that are his, for his sake: or, as becometh saints to be received, with love and honour and the tenderest affection. There may be occasion sometimes to improve our interest in our friends, not only for ourselves, but for others also; interest being a price in the hand for doing good.

(2.) Assist her in whatever business she has need of you. Whether she had business of trade, or law-business at the court, is not material; however, being a woman, a stranger, a christian, she had need of help: and Paul engaged them to be assistant to her. It becomes christians to be helpful one to another in their affairs, especially to be helpful to strangers; for we are members one of another, and we know not what need of help we may have ourselves. Oh, yes, Paul beoks help for one that had been so helpful to many; he that watereth, shall be watered also himself.

II. Here are commendations to some particular friends among those to whom he wrote, more than in any other of the epistles. Though the care of all the churches came upon Paul daily, enough to distract an ordinary head, yet he could retain the remembrance of so many; and his heart was so full of love and affection, as to send salutations to each of them, with particular characters of them, and expressions of love to them, and concern for them. Greet them, salute them; it is the same word, οἰκονόμος. "Let them know that I remember them, and love them, and wish them well." There is something observable in divers of these salutations.

1. Concerning Aquila and Priscilla, a famous couple, that Paul procured the protection of, Acts 18. 3. They were originally of Rome, but were banished there, by the edict of Claudius, Acts 18. 2. At Corinth, Paul became acquainted with them, wrought with them at the trade of tent-making; after some time, when the edge of that edict was rebated, they returned to Rome, and thither he now sends commendations to them. He calls them his helpers in Christ Jesus; by private instructions and converse furthering the success of Paul's public preaching; one instance whereof we have in their instructions of Apollos, Acts 18. 26. Those are helpers to faithful ministers, that lay out themselves in their families and among their neighbours, to do good to souls. Nay, they did not only do much, but they ventured much, for Paul; they have for my life laid down their own necks. They exposed themselves, to secure Paul; hazarded their own lives for the preservation of him. Many were laid aside; but no man might be spared than he. Paul was in a great deal of danger at Corinth, while he sojourned with them; but they sheltered him, though they thereby made themselves obnoxious to the enraged multitude, Acts 18. 12, 17. It was a good while ago that they had done Paul this kindness; and yet he speaks as sensibly of it as if it had been but yesterday. To whom (says he) not only I gave thanks, but also all the churches of the Gentiles; who were all beholden to these good people for helping to save the life of him that was the apostle of the Gentiles. Paul mentions this, to engage the christians at Rome to be more kind to Aquila and Priscilla.

He sends likewise greeting to the church in their house, v. 5. It seems then, a church in a house is no such absurd thing as some make it to be. Perhaps there was a congregation met to meet at their house at stated times: and then, no doubt, it was, like the house of Obed-Edom, blessed for the ark's sake. Others think that the church was no more than a religious, pious, well-governed family, that kept up the worship of God. Religion, in the power of it reigning in a family, will turn a house into a church. And doubtless it had a good influence upon this, that Priscilla the good wife of the family, was so very eminent and forward in religion; so eminent, that she is often named first. A virtuous woman, that looks well to the ways of her household, may do much toward the advancement of religion in a family. When Priscilla and Aquila were at Ephesus, though but sojourners there; yet there also they had a church in their house, 1 Cor. 16. 19. /A truly godly man will be careful to take pleasure with him, wherever he goes. When Abraham removed his tent, he renewed his altar, Gen. 13. 18.

2. Concerning Epeneus, v. 5. He calls him his well-beloved. (Where the law of love is in the heart, the law of kindness will be in the tongue. Endearing language should pass among christians, to express love, and to engage love. So he calls Amphias, beloved in the Lord, with true christian love for Christ’s sake; and Stachys, his beloved: a sign that Paul had been in the third heaven, he was so much made up of love.

Of Epeneus it is further said, that he was the first-fruits of Achaia unto Christ: not only one of the most eminent believers in that country, but one of the first that was converted to the faith of Christ; one that was offered up to God by Paul, as the first fruits of his ministry there; an earnest of a great harvest; for in Corinth, the chief city of Achaia, God had much people, Acts 18. 10. Special respect is to be paid to those that set out early, and come to work in the vineyard at the first hour, at the first call. The household of Stephanas is likewise said to be the first-fruits of Achaia, 1 Cor. 16. 15. Perhaps Epeneus was one of that household; or, however, one of the three: not the first alone, but one of the first sheece of christians, that the region of Achaia afforded.

3. Concerning Mary, and some others who were laborious in that which is good; industrious christians; Mary, who bestowed much labour on us. True love never sticks at labour, but rather takes a pleasure in it; where there is much love, there will be much labour. Some think this Mary had been at some time removed to Rome, and had personally ministered to him; others think Paul speaks of her labour as bestowed upon him, because it was bestowed upon his friends and fellow-labourers, and he took what was done to them as done to himself. He says of Tryphena and Tryphosa, two useful women in their places, that they labour in the Lord; (v. 12.) and of Rufus, that he was not ashamed to labour much in the Lord, more than others did. Among useful people, some are more useful than others; abounding more in the work of the Lord.

4. Concerning Andronicus and Junia, v. 7. Some take them for a man and a woman, and his original will well enough bear it; and considering the name of the latter, that is more probable than that they should be two men, as others think, and brethren. Observe,

(1.) They were Paul’s cousins, akin to him; so was Herodion, v. 11. Religion does not take away, but rectifies, sanctifies, and improves, our respect to our kindred; engaging us to lay out ourselves most for their good, and to rejoice in them the more, when we find them related to Christ by faith.

(2.) They were his fellow-prisoners. Partnership in suffering sometimes does much toward the union of souls and the knitting of affections. We do not find in the story of the Acts any imprisonment of Paul before the writing of this epistle, but that at Philippis, Acts 16. 23. But Paul was in prisons more frequent; (2 Cor. 11. 23.) in some of which, it seems, he met with his friends Andronicus and Junia, and he was one of those who, in other things, so in suffering for Christ, and bearing his yoke.

(3.) They were of note among the apostles; not so much perhaps, because they were persons of estate and quality in the world, as because they were eminent for knowledge, and gifts, and graces, which made them famous among the apostles, who were competent judges of those things, and were ended with a spirit of discerning not only the sincerity, but the eminency, of christian graces.

(4.) Who also were in Christ before me, that is, were converted to the christian faith. In time they had got the start of Paul, though he was converted the next year after Christ’s ascension. How really was Paul to acknowledge in others any kind of precedence?

5. Concerning Apelles, who is here said to be of approved in Christ, (v. 10.) a high upon sickness. He was one of known integrity and sincerity in his religion, one that had been tried; his friends and enemies had tried him, and he was as gold. He was of approved knowledge and judgment, approved courage and constancy; a man that one might trust and repose a confidence in.

6. Concerning Aristobulus and Narcissus, notice is taken of their household, v. 10, 11. Those of their household which are in the Lord, (as it is limited, v. 11.) that were christians. How studious was Paul to leave none out of his salutations, that he had any knowledge of or acquaintance with! Aristobulus and Narcissus themselves, some think, were absent, or lately dead; others think they were unbelievers, and such as did not themselves embrace christianity; so Pusey: and some think this Narcissus was the same with one of the same name, who is frequently mentioned in the life of Claudianus, a very rich man that had a great family, but was very wicked and mischievous. It seems then, there were some good servants, or other retainers, even in the family of a wicked man; a common case, 1 Tim. 6. 2. Compare v. 2. They are servants of the same, and faithful, while the rich master is passed by, and left to perish in unbelief. Even so, Father, because it seemed good unto thee.

7. Concerning Rufus, (v. 13.) chosen in the Lord. He was a choice christian, whose gifts and graces did evidence that he was eternally chosen in Christ Jesus. He was one of a thousand for integrity and holiness. And his mother and mine; his mother by nature, and mine by christian love and spiritual affection; as he calls Phoebe his sister, and teaches Timothy to treat the elder women as mothers, 1 Tim. 5. 2.](Vol. vi.-3 D) chaste kiss, in opposition to that which is wanton and lascivious; a sincere kiss, in opposition to that which is treacherous and dissembling, as Judas's, when he betrayed Christ with a kiss. He adds, in the close, a general salutation to them all, in the name of the churches of Christ; (v. 16.) "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you. Amen." The apostle having endeavoured by his endearing salutations to unite them together, it was not improper to subjoin a caution to take heed of those whose principles and practices were destructive to christian love. And we may observe,

1. The caution itself, which is given in the most obliging manner that could be; I beseech you, brethren. He does not will and command, as one that lorded it over God's heritage, but, for love's sake beseeches. How earnest, how endearing, are Paul's exhortations! He teaches them,

1. To see their danger; Mark them which cause divisions and offences. Our Master had himself foretold, that divisions and offences would come, but had entailed a woe on those by whom they come; (Matt. 18. 7.) against such we are here cautioned. Those who burneth the church with dividing and offending impositions, who upbraid and enforce those impositions, who introduce new doctrines and old errors, and offending notions, which are erroneous or justly suspected, who, out of pride, ambition, affection of novelty, or the like, causelessly separate from their brethren, and by perverse disputes, censures, and evil surmisings, alienate the affections of christians one from another; these cause divisions and offences, contrary to, or different from, (for that also is impiety,) it is (2 Cor. 11. 4.) the doctrine which we have learned. Whatever varies from the form of sound doctrine which we have in the scriptures, opens a door to divisions and offences. If truth be once deserted, unity and peace will not last long.

Now, mark those that thus cause divisions; zex
tις. Observe them, the method they take, the end they drive at; there is need of a piercing watchful eye to detect them. Therefore, to set them forth in such a manner, for commonly the pretences are plausible, when the projects are very pernicious. Do not look only at the divisions and offences, but run up those streams to the fountain, and mark those that cause them; and especially that in them which causes these divisions and offences; those juts on each side, whence come these wars and fightings. A danger discovered is half prevented.

2. To shun it; Avoid them. Shun all unnecessary communion and communication with them, lest you be leavened and infected by them. Do not strike in with any dividing interests, nor embrace any of those principles or practices which are destructive to christian love and charity, or to the truth which is according to godliness. Their word will eat as doth a canker. Some think he especially warns them to take heed of the Judaizing teachers, who, under the covert of the christian name, kept up the Mosaical ceremonies, and preached the necessity of them; who were industrious in all places to draw disciples after them, and whom Paul in most of his epistles cautions the churches to take heed of.

11. The reasons to enforce this caution.

Because the pernicious policy of these seducers, v. 18. The worse they are, the more need we have to watch against them. Now observe his description of them, in two things.

1. The master they serve: not our Lord Jesus Christ, though they call themselves christians, they do not serve Christ; do not aim at his glory, promote his interest, or do his will, whatever they pretend. How many are there, who call Christ Master and Lord, but make their own interest their end? But they serve their own belly, their carnal, sensual, secular interests; it is some base lust or other that they are pleasing; pride, ambition, covetousness, luxury, lasciviousness, these are the designs which they are really carrying on. Their God is their belly, Phil. 3. 19. What a base master do they serve, and how unworthy to come in competition with Christ! If they serve themselves, are they likely to do good in the world? That makes gain their godliness, and the gratifying of the sensual appetite the very scope and business of their lives, to which all other purposes and designs must truble and be made subservient.

2. The method they take to compass their design; By good words and fair speeches they deceive the hearts of the simple. Their words and speeches have a shew of holiness and zeal for God; (it is an ill thing to be godly from the teeth outward;) and a shew of kindness and love to those into whom they instil their corrupt doctrines, speaking them fair when they intend them the greatest mischief. Thus by good words and fair speeches the serpent beguil ed Eve. Observe, They corrupt their heads by deceiving their hearts; pervert their judgments by a sly insinuating of themselves into their affections. We have great need therefore to keep our hearts free from all delusion, especially when seducing spirits are abroad.

2. Because of the peril we are in, through our proneness and aptness to be inveigled and ensnared by them; For your obedience is come abroad unto all men; you are noted in all the churches for a willing, tractable, complying people. And, (1.) Therefore, because it was so, these seducing teachers would be the more apt to assault them. The Devil and his agents are the more particular at flourishing churches and flourishing souls. The ship that is known to be richly laden, is most exposed to privateers; the adversary and enemy covets such a prey, therefore look to yourselves, 2 John, v. 8. "The false teachers hear that you are an obedient people, and therefore they will be likely to come among you, to see if you will be obedient to the policy of seducers, to set upon those who are softened by convictions, and begin to inquire what they shall do, because such do most easily receive the impressions of their opinions. Sad experience witnesses, how many who have begun to ask the way to Zion, with their faces thitherward, have fatally split upon this rock; which speaks it much the duty of ministers, with a double care, to feed the lambs of the flock, to lay a good foundation, and gently to lead those that are with young.
(2.) Though it were so, yet they were in danger from these seducers. This Paul suggests with a great deal of modesty and tenderness; not as one suspicious of them, but as one solicitous for them; "Your obedience is come abroad unto all men; we grant that and rejoice in it; I am glad therefore on your behalf." Thus does he insinuate their commendation, the better to make way for the caution. A holy jealousy of our friends may very well consist with a holy joy in them. "You think yourselves a very happy people, and so do I too: but for all that you should conceive that you have attained unto that which is good, and simple concerning evil. You are a willing good-natured people, but you had best take heed of being imposed upon by those seducers." A pliable temper is good when it is under good conduct; but otherwise it may be very insnaring; and therefore he gives two general rules.

[1.] To be wise unto that which is good, to be shrewd and intelligent in the truths and ways of God. "Be wise to try the spirits, to prove all things, and then to hold fast that only which is good." There is need of a great deal of wisdom in our adherence to good truths, and good duties, and good people, lest in any of these we be imposed upon and deluded. Be ye therefore wise as serpents; (Matt. 10. 16.) wise to discern that which is really good from that which is counterfeit; wise to distinguish between iniquity and prosperity. While we are in the midst of so many deceivers, we have great need of that wisdom of the prudent, which is to understand his way, Prov. 14. 8.

[2.] To be simple concerning evil; so wise as not to be deceived, and yet so simple as not to be deceivers. It is a holy simplicity, not to be able to contrive, or palliate, or carry on, any evil design; simplex harmless, unmixed, inoffensive. In matter it ye be wise; (1 Cor. 3. 18.) but in spirit the wisdom of the serpent becomes Christians, but not the subtlety of the old serpent. We must withal be harmless as doves. That is a wisely simple man, that knows not how to do any thing against the truth.

Now Paul was the more solicitous for the Roman church, that that might keep its integrity, because it was so famous; it was a city upon a hill, and many eyes were upon the Christians there, so that an error prevailing there would have a bad example, and they would have an ill influence upon other churches. As indeed it has since proved in fact; the great apostacy of the latter days taking its rise from that capital city. The errors of leading churches, are leading errors. When the bishop of Rome fell as a great star from heaven, (Rev. 8. 10.) his tail drew a third part of the stars after him, Rev. 12. 4.

3. Because of the promises of God, that we should have victory at last; which is given to quicken and encourage, not to surpass, our watchful cares and vigorous endeavours. It is a very sweet promise, (v. 20.) The God of peace shall bruise Satan under your feet.

(1.) The titles he gives to God; the God of peace, the Author and Giver of all good. When we come to God for spiritual victories, we must not only eye him as the Lord of hosts, but use all the means that he has given us, and in his name pray, and fight. When we come to God as the God of peace, a God at peace with us, speaking peace to us, working peace in us, creating peace for us. Victory comes from God more as the God of peace than as the God of war; for in all our conflicts, peace is the thing we must contend for. God, as the God of peace, will restrain and vanquish all those that cause divisions and offences, and so break and disturb the peace of the church. We must depend on the God of peace, who, if we stand in him, he will do the work. He will destroy all the devices of Satan against souls, to defile, disturb, and destroy them; all his attempts to keep us from the purity of heaven, the peace of heaven, and the rest of grace. The apostle warns us not to be in a state of fear, lest we should fall. The God of peace will bruise under our feet.

(2.) The blessing he expects from God; a victory over Satan. If he mean primarily those false doctrines and seducing spirits spoken of before, of which Satan was the prime founder and author, yet, doubtless, it comprehends all the other designs and devices of Satan against souls, to defile, disturb, and destroy them; all his attempts to keep us from the purity of heaven, the peace of heaven, and the rest of grace. The apostle warns us not to be in a state of fear, lest we should fall. The God of peace will bruise under our feet. He had cautioned them before against simplicity; now they, being conscious of their own great weakness and folly, might think, "How shall we evade and escape these snares that are laid for us? Will not these adversaries of our souls be at length too hard for us?" "No," says he, "fear not; though you cannot overcome your own strength and wisdom, yet the God of peace will do it for you; and through him that loved us we shall be more than conquerors."

[1.] The victory shall be complete; He shall bruise Satan under your feet; plainly alluding to the first promise of the Messiah made in paradise, (Gen. 3. 15.) that the seed of the woman should break the serpent's head; which is in the fulfilling every day, while the saints are enabled to resist and overcome the temptations of Satan; and will be perfectly fulfilled, when, in spite of all the powers of darkness, all that belong to the election of grace shall be brought triumphantly to glory. When Joshua had conquered the kings of Canaan, he called the captains of Israel to set their feet upon the necks of those kings; (Josh. 10. 24.) so will Christ, our Joshua, enable his faithful servants and soldiers to set their feet upon Satan's neck, to triumph, and, and triumph over, their spiritual enemies. Christ hath overcome for us, disarmed the strong man armed, broken his power, and we have nothing to do but to pursue the victory and divide the spoil. Let this quicken us to our spiritual conflict, to fight the good fight of faith; we have to do with a conquered enemy, and the victory will be perfect shortly. [2.] The victory shall be speedy; He shall do it shortly. Yet a little while, and he that cometh shall come. He hath said it, Behold, I come quickly. When Satan seems to have prevailed, and we are ready to give up all for gone, then will the God of peace cut the work short in righteousness. It will encourage soldiers, when they know the war will be at an end quickly, in such a victory. Some refer it to the happy period of their contentions in true love and unity; others, to the happy issue of their persecutions in the conversion of the powers of the empire to Christianity, when the bloody enemies of the church were subdued and trampled on by Constantine, and the church under his government; it is rather to be applied to the victory which all the saints shall have over Satan, when they come to heaven, and shall be for ever out of his reach; together with the present victories which through grace they obtain in earnest of that. Holiness is therefore, faith and patience, yet a little while; when we are once got through the Red sea, we shall see our spiritual enemies dead on the shore, and triumphantly sing the song of Moses, and the song of the Lamb.

To this therefore he subjoins the benediction, The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you; the good will of Christ toward you, the good work of Christ in you, and the grace of God. This benediction is that preservative against the snares of heretics, and seducers, and false teachers. If the grace of Christ be with us, who can be against us so as to prevail? Be strong therefore in the grace which is in Christ Jesus. Paul, not only as a friend, but as a minister and an apostle, who had received grace for grace, thus with authority blesses them with this blessing, and repeats it, v. 24. 21. Timotheus my work-fellow, and Lucius, and Jason, and Sosipater, my kins men, salute you. 22. I Tertius, who wrote this epistle, salute you in the Lord. 23. Gaius, my host, and of the whole church, salute thee. Erastus, the chamberlain of the city, salute thee, and Quartus a brother. 24. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen.

As the apostle had before sent his own salutations to many of this church, and that of the churches round him to them all; he here adds an affectionate remembrance of them from some particular persons who were now with him, the better to promote acquaintance and good fellowship among distant saints; and that the subscribing of these worthy names, known to them, might the more recommend this epistle. He mentions,

1. Some that were his particular friends, and, probably, known to the Roman christians; Timotheus my work-fellow. Paul sometimes calls Timotheus his son, as an inferior; but here he styles him his work-fellow, as one equal with him; such a respect to the dignity of his person and office. Paul, as he was one of the primitive apostles, so was Timotheus, who had been brought up with him in the Stuart of Jerusalem, and had been sent by him there into the interior parts of Asia, Acts 16. 3. This name is given here to him, as a mark of his connection with the apostle, and as a spring of his apostleship; it does not belong to him, as he was one of the ancient prophets, of the Jewish church; but it is used here for the purpose of refreshing his memory of the care the apostle had taken of him, and of the partiality he had shown him, out of his confidence in him, and of his zeal and care in promoting the gospel.

2. One that was Paul's amanuensis; (v. 22.) I Tertius, who wrote this epistle. Paul made use of a scribe, not out of state, or idleness, but 'because he wrote a bad hand, which was not very legible, which he excuses, when he wrote to the Galatians with his own hand, Gal. 6. 11. παρακαταφρονεῖται ὅτι μηδὲν ἔπελθε σημαντικόν. Perhaps this Tertius was the same with Silas; for Silas (as some think) signifies the third in Hebrew, as Tertius in Latin. Tertius either wrote as Paul dictated, or transcribed it fair out of Paul's foul copy. The least piece of service done to the church, and the ministers of the church, shall not pass without a remembrance and a recom pense. It was an honour to Tertius, that he had a hand in the publication of this epistle, as elsewhere.

3. Some others that were of note among the christians; (v. 23.) Gaius my host. It is uncertain whether this was Gaius of Derbe, (Acts 20. 4.) or Gaius of Macedonia, (Acts 19. 29.) or rather Gaius of Corinth; (1 Cor. 1. 14.) and whether any of these was he to whom John wrote his third epistle. However, Paul commends him for his great hospitality; not only my host, but of the whole church; one that entertained and lodged, and waited on, and ministered to, his doors to their church-meetings, and eased the rest of the church by his readiness to treat all christian strangers that came to them.

Erastus, the chamberlain of the city, is another; he means the city of Corinth, whence this epistle was dated. It seems, he was a person of honour and account, one in public place, steward or treasurer. Not only his name, but the honour and respect it stands in our version, so some are. His estate, his honour, and employment, did not take him off from attending on Paul, and laying out himself for the good of the church, it should seem, in the work of the ministry; for he is joined with Timothy, (Acts 19. 22.) and is mentioned 2 Tim. 4. 20. It was no disparagement to the chamberlain of the city, to be a preacher of the gospel of Christ. Quartus is likewise mentioned, and called a brother; for as one is our Father, even Christ, so all we are brethren.

25. Now to him who is of power to establish you according to my gospel, and the preaching of Jesus Christ, (according to the revelation of the mystery, which was kept secret since the world began, But now is made manifest, and by the scriptures of the prophets, according to the commandment of the everlasting God, made known to all nations for the obedience of faith,) 27. To God only wise, be glory through Jesus Christ for ever, Amen.

Here the apostle solemnly closes his epistle with a magnificent ascription of glory to the blessed God, as one that terminated all in the praise and glory of God, and studied to return all to him, seeing all is of him, and from him. He does, as it were, breathe out his soul to these Romans in the praise of God, choosing to make that the end of his epistle, which otherwise the end of his life, Col. 2. 2. I. A description of the gospel of God, which comes in a parenthesis; having occasion to speak of it, as the means by which the power of God establishes souls, and the rule of that establishment; To establish you according to my gospel. Paul calls it his gospel, because he was the preacher of it, and because he did so much glory in it. Some think he means especially that declaration, explication, and application of the doctrine of the gospel, which he had now made in this epistle; but it rather takes in all the preaching and writing of the apostles, among whom Paul was a principal labourer. Through their word, (John 17. 20.) the word committed to them. Ministers are the ambassadors, and the gospel is their embassy. Paul had his head and heart so full of the gospel, that he could scarcely mention it without a digression to set forth the nature and excellency of it. 1. It is the preaching of Jesus Christ. Christ was the preacher of it himself; it began to be spoken by the Lord, Heb. 2. 3. So pleased was Christ with his undertaking for our salvation, that he would himself be the Publisher of it. Or, Christ is the Subject-matter of it; the sum and substance of the whole gospel was Jesus Christ, and him crucified. We preach not ourselves, says Paul, but Christ Jesus the Lord. That which establishes souls, is, the plain preaching of Jesus Christ.

2. It is the revelation of the mystery which was kept secret since the world began, and by the scriptures of the prophets made known. The subject-matter of the gospel is a mystery; our redemption and salvation by Jesus Christ, in the foundation, method, and fruits of it, are, without controversy, a great mystery, and this one, as Obsever 3. It speaks the honour of the gospel; it is no vulgar common thing, hammered out by any human wit, but it is the admirable product of the eternal wisdom and counsel of God, and has in it such an unconceivable height, such an unfathomable depth, as pass knowledge. It is a mystery which the angels desire to look into, and cannot find the bottom of. And yet, blessed be God, there is no mystery made manifest by God to man, that is sufficient to bring us to heaven, if we do not wilfully neglect so great salvation. Now,

(1.) This mystery was kept secret since the world began; χριστὸς σωτηροθεωρίας. It was wrapped up in silence from eternity; so some; à tempóriozetis externus; it is no new and upstart notion, no late invention, but took rise from the days of eternity and the purposes of God's everlasting love. Before the foundation of the world was laid, this mystery was hid in God, Eph. 3. 9. Or, since the world began, so we translate it; during all the times of the Old Testament, this mystery was comparatively kept secret in the types and shadows of the ceremonial law, and the dark predictions of the prophets, which pointed at it, but so that they were not steadfastly look to the end of those things, 2 Cor. 3. 13. Thus it was hid from ages and generations, even among the Jews; much more among the Gentiles that sat in darkness, and had no notices at all of it. Even the disciples of Christ themselves, before his resurrection and ascension, were very much in the dark about the mystery of redemption, and their notion of it was very much clouded and confused; such a secret was it for its significance. But, (2.) it is now made manifest. The veil is rent, the shadows of the evening are done away, and life and immortality are brought to light by the gospel, and the Sun of righteousness is risen upon the world. Paul does not pretend to have the monopoly of this discovery, as if he alone knew it; no, it is made manifest to many others.

But how is it made manifest by the scriptures of the prophets? Surely, because now the event had given the best exposition to the prophecies of the Old Testament. Being accomplished, they were explained. The preaching of the prophets, as far as it related to this mystery, was dark and unintelligible in a great measure, in the ages wherein they lived; but the scriptures of the prophets, that which they left in writing, is now not only made plain in itself, but by it this mystery is made known to all nations. The Old Testament does not only borrow light from, but return light to, the revelation of the New Testament. If the New Testament explains the Old, the Old Testament, by way of requital, very much illuminates the New. Thus the Old Testament prophecies prophesy again, now their prophecies are fulfilled, before many peoples, and nations, and tongues. I refer to Rev. 10. 11. which this explains. Now Christ appears to have been the treasure hid in the field of the Old Testament. To him bear all the prophets witness. See Luke 24. 27.

(3.) It is manifested according to the commandment of the everlasting God, the purpose, counsel, and decree, of God from eternity; and the commission and appointment given first to Christ, and then to the apostles, in the fulness of time. They received commandment from the Father, to do what they did in preaching the gospel. Lest any should object, it: Why was this mystery kept so long, and why made manifest now? He resolves it into the will of God, who is an absolute Sovereign, and gives not account of any of his matters. The commandment of the everlasting God was enough to bear out the apostles and ministers of the gospel in their preaching.

The everlasting God. This attribute of eternity is here given to God very emphatically. [1.] He is from everlasting; which intimates that, though he had kept this mystery secret since the world began, and had but lately revealed it, yet he had framed and contrived it from everlasting, before the worlds were. The oaths and covenants in the written word, are but the copy of the oath and covenant which were between the Father and the Son from eternity: those the extracts, these the original. And, [2.] He is the Father only, as the author of this revelation, and the eternal consequence to us. We must never look for any new revelation, but abide by this, for this is according to the commandment of the everlasting God. Christ in the gospel, is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever.

(4.) It is made known to all nations for the obedience of faith. The extent of this revelation he often takes notice of; that whereas hitherto in Judah only God was known, now Christ is Salvation to the ends of the earth, to all nations. And the design and intention of it is very observable; it is for the obedience of faith, that men might be justified, and obey it, receive it, and be ruled by it. The gospel is revealed, not to be talked of and disputed about, but to be submitted to. The obedience of faith is that obedience which is paid to the word of faith, (see that phrase, Acts 6. 7,) and which is produced by the grace of faith. See here what is the right faith— even that which works in obedience; and what is the right obedience—even that which springs from faith; and what is the design of the gospel—to bring us to both.

II. A doxology to that God whose gospel it is; ascribing glory to him for ever, (v. 27,) acknowledging that he is a glorious God, and adoring him accordingly, with the most awful affections; desiring and longing to be at this work with the holy angels, where we shall be doing it to eternity.

This is praising God, ascribing glory to him for ever. Observe, 1. The matter of this praise. In thanking God, we fasten upon his favours to us; in praising and adoring God, we fasten upon his perfections in himself. Two of his principal attributes are here taken notice of.

(1.) His power; (v. 25.) To him that is of power to stablish you. It is no less than a divine power that establishes the saints. Considering the disposition that is in them to fall, the industry of the spiritual enemies that seek to overthrow them, and the shaking times into which their lot is cast, no less than an almighty power will stablish them. That power of God, which is put forth for the establishment of the saints, is, and ought to be, the matter of our praise, as Jude v. 24. To him that is able to keep you from failing. In giving God the glory of this power, we may, and must, take to ourselves the comfort of it; that, whatever our doubts, and difficulties, and fears, may be, our God, whom we serve, is of power to stablish us. See 1 Pet. 1. 5. John 10. 29.

(2.) His wisdom; (v. 27.) To God only wise. Power to effect without wisdom to contrive, and wisdom to contrive without power to effect, are alike vain and fruitless; but both together, and both infinite, make a perfect being. He is only wise; not the Father only wise, exclusive of the Son, but Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, three persons, and one God, only wise, compared with the creatures. Man, the wisest of all the creatures in the lower world, is born like a wild ass's colt; nay, the angels themselves are charged with folly, in comparison with God. He only is perfectly and infallibly wise; he only is originally wise, in and of himself; for he is the Spring and Fountain of all the wisdom of the creatures; the Father of all the lights of wisdom that any creature can pretend to; (James 1. 17,) with him are strength and wisdom, the deceived and deceiver are his.

2. The Mediator of this praise; through Jesus Christ. To God only wise through Jesus Christ; so some. It is in and through Christ that God is mani fested to the world as the only wise God; for he is the Wisdom of God, and the Power of God. Or, as our version is, only wise in Jesus Christ. All the glory that passes from fallen man to God, so as to be accepted of him, must go through the hands of the Lord Jesus, in whom alone it is that our persons and performances are, or can be, pleasing to God. Of his righteousness therefore we must make mention, even of his only; who, as he is the Mediator of all our prayers, so he is, and I believe will be, to eternity, the Mediator of all our praises.
AN
WITH
OF THE
FIRST EPISTLE OF ST. PAUL TO THE CORINTHIANS.
Completed by Mr. Simon Brown.

CORINTH was a principal city of Greece, in that particular division of it which was called Achaia. It was situated on the isthmus (or neck of land) that joins the Peloponnesus to the rest of Greece, on the south ern side, and had two ports adjoining; one at the bottom of the Corinthian gulf, called Lexanum, not far from the city, from whence they traded to Italy and the west; the other, at the bottom of the Sinus Saronicus, called Cenchrea, at a more remote distance, from whence they traded to Asia. From this situation, it is no wonder that Corinth should be a place of great trade and wealth. And as affluence is apt to produce luxury of all kinds; neither is it to be wondered at, if a place so famous for wealth and arts, should be infamous for vice. It was in a particular manner noted for fornication, insomuch that a Corinthian woman was a proverbial phrase for a strumpet, and κακος στηρατευσαι, κεκοιμηθεν την θηλη—to play the Corinthian, is to play the whore, or indulge whorish inclination. Yet in this lewd city did Paul, by the blessing of God on his labours, plant and raise a christian church, chiefly among the Gentiles, as seems very probable from the history of this matter, Acts 18. 1—18. compared with some passages in this epistle, particularly ch. 12. 2 where the apostle tells them, Ye know that ye were Gentiles carried away to those dumb idols even as ye were led; though it is not improbable that many Jewish converts might be also among them; for we are told that Christus, the chief ruler of the synagogue, believed on the Lord, with all his house, Acts 18. 8. He continued in this city near two years, as is plain from Acts 18. 11. and 18. compared, and laboured with great success, being encouraged by a divine vision, assuring him God had much people in that city, Acts 18. 9. 10. Nor did he use to stay long in a place, where his ministry met not with acceptance and success.

Some time after he left them, he wrote this epistle to them, to water what he had planted, and rectify some gross disorders, which during his absence had been introduced, partly from the interest some false teacher or teachers had obtained amongst them, and partly from the leaven of their old maxims and manners, that had not been thoroughly purged out by the christian principles they had entertained. And it is but too visible how much their wealth had helped to corrupt their manners, from the several faults for which the apostle reprehends them. Pride, avarice, luxury, lust, (the natural offspring of a carnal and corrupt mind,) are all fed and prompted by outward affluence. And with all these, either the body of this people, or some particular persons among them, are here charged by the apostle. Their pride discovered itself in their sides and factions, and the notorious disorders they committed in the exercise of their spiritual gifts. And this vice was not wholly fed by their wealth, but by the insight they had into the Greek learning and philosophy. Some of the ancients tell us that the city abounded with rhetoricians and philosophers. And these were men naturally vain, full of self-conceit, and apt to despise the plain doctrine of the gospel, because it did not feed the curiosity of an inquisitive and disputing temper, nor please the ear with artful speeches, and a flow of fine words. Their avarice was manifest in their law-suits and litigations about νευρο—mine, and τυμε—thine, before heathen judges. Their luxury appeared in more instances than one, in their dress, in their debauching themselves even at the Lord's table, where the rich, who were most faulty on this account, were guilty also of a very proud and criminal contempt of their poor brethren. Their lust broke out in a most flagrant and infamous instance, such as had not been named among the Gentiles, not spoken of without detestation—that a man should have his father's wife, either as his wife, or so as to commit fornication with her. This indeed seems to have been the fault of a particular person; but the whole church were to blame that they had this crime in no greater abhorrence, that they could endure one of such very corrupt morals and of so flagitious a behaviour among them. But their participation in his sin was yet greater, if, as some of the ancients tell us, they were puffed up on behalf of the great learning and eloquence of this incestuous person. And it is plain from other passages of the epistle, that they were not so entirely free from their former lewd inclinations, as not to need very strict cautions and strong arguments against fornication: see ch. 6. 9—20.

The pride of their learning had also carried many of them so far, as to disbelieve or dispute against the doctrine of the resurrection. It is not improbable, that they treated this question problematically, as they did many questions in philosophy, and tried their skill by arguing it pro and con.
I. CORINTHIANS, I.

CHAP. I.

In this chapter, we have, I. The preface or introduction to the whole epistle, v. 1. 9. II. One principal occasion of writing it hinted, that is, their divisions, and the original of them, v. 10. 13. III. An account of Paul's ministry among them, which was principally preaching the gospel, v. 14. 17. IV. The manner wherein he preached the gospel, and the different success of it, with an account how admirably it was fitted to bring glory to God, and beat down the pride and vanity of men, v. 17, to the end.

1. PAUL, called to be an apostle of Jesus Christ, through the will of God, and Sosthenes our brother, 2. Unto the church of God which is at Corinth, to them that are sanctified in Christ Jesus, called to be saints, with all that in every place call upon the name of Jesus Christ our Lord, both their's and our's. 3. Grace be unto you, and peace, from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ. 4. I thank my God always on your behalf, for the grace of God which is given you by Jesus Christ; 5. That in every thing ye are enriched by him, in all utterance, and in all knowledge; 6. Even as the testimony of Christ was confirmed in you. 7. So that ye come behind in no gift, waiting for the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ: 8. Who shall also confirm you unto the end, that ye may be blameless in the day of our Lord Jesus Christ. 9. God is faithful, by whom ye were called unto the fellowship of his son Jesus Christ our Lord.

We have here the apostle's preface to his whole epistle; in which we may take notice.

1. Of the inspiration; in which, according to the custom of writing letters then, the name of the person by whom it was written, and the persons to whom it was written, are both inserted.

1. It is an epistle from Paul, the apostle of the Gentiles, to the church of Corinth, which himself had planted, though there were some among them, that now questioned his apostleship, (ch. 9. 1, 2.) and vitiated his ministry, 2 Cor. 10. 10. The most faithful and useful ministers are not exempt from contempt. He begins with challenging this character. Paul, called to be an apostle of Jesus Christ, through the will of God. He had not taken this honour to himself, but had a divine commission for it. It was proper at any time, but necessary at this time, to assert his character, and magnify his office; when false teachers made a merit of running him down, and their ignobly defaced followers were so apt to set themselves in competition with him. It was not pride in Paul, but faithfulness to his trust, in this juncture, to maintain his apostolical character and authority. And to make this more fully appear, he joins Sosthenes with him in writing, who was a minister of a lower rank. Paul, and Sosthenes his brother, not a fellow-apostle, but a fellow-minister: once a ruler of a Jewish synagogue, afterward converted to Christianity: a Corinthian by birth, as is most probable, and dear to this people; for which reason, Paul, to ingratiate himself with them, joins him with himself in his first salutations. There is no reason to suppose he was made a partaker of the apostle's inspiration; for which reason he speaks, through the rest of the epistle, in his own name, and in the singular number. Paul did not in any case lesser his apostolical authority, and yet he was represented on all occasions to do a kind and con-scending thing, for their good, to whom he ministered.

2. The persons to whom this epistle was directed, are, the church of God that was at Corinth, sanctified in Christ Jesus, and called to be saints. All Christians are thus far sanctified in Christ Jesus—that they are by baptism dedicated and devoted to him, they are under strict obligations to be holy, and that they are in every sense holy. But if they are not truly holy, it is their own fault and reproach.
Note, It is the design of Christianity to sanctify us in Christ. He gave himself for us, to redeem us from all iniquity, and purify us to himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works. In conjunction with the church at Corinth, he directs the epistle to all that in every place call on the name of Christ Jesus our Lord, both in Corinth and elsewhere.
Here he shews that the name of Christ is part of the prophetic and atheistical—that they dare not live without prayer:
and hereby they are distinguished from Jews and Pagans—that they call on the name of Christ. He is their common Head and Lord. Observe, In every place, in the Christian world, there are some that call on the name of Christ. God hath a remnant in all places; and we should have a common concern for, and hold communion with, all that call on Christ's name.

II. Of the apostolical benediction; Grace be to you, and peace, from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ. An apostle of the Prince of peace must be a messenger and minister of peace.
This blessing the gospel brings with it, and this blessing every preacher of the gospel should heartily wish and pray may be the lot of all among whom he preacheth grace and peace; the favour of God, and reconciliation to him. It is indeed the summary of all blessings. The Lord lift up his countenance upon thee, and give thee peace, was the form of benediction under the Old Testament; (Numb. 6. 26.)
but this advantage we have by the gospel,
1. That we are directed how to obtain that peace from God: it is in and by Christ. Sinners can have no peace with God, nor any good from him, but through Christ.

2. We are told what must qualify us for this peace:
namely, grace: first grace, and then peace. God first reconciles sinners to himself, before he bestows his peace upon them.

III. Of the apostle's thanksgiving to God on their behalf. Paul begins most of his epistles with thank-sing to God for his friends, and prayer for them.
Note, The best way of manifesting our affection to our friends, is, by praying and giving thanks for them. It is one branch of the communion of saints, to give thanks to God mutually for our gifts, graces, and comforts. He gives thanks,
1. For their conversion to the faith of Christ;
that grace was given them by Jesus Christ, v. 4.
2. For the great Procure and Disposer of the favours of God. Those who are united to him in faith, and made to partake of his Spirit and merits, are the objects of divine favour. God loves them, bears them hearty good-will, and bestows on them his fatherly smiles and blessings.
3. For the abundance of their spiritual gifts.
This the church of Corinth was famous for. They did not come behind any of the churches in any gift. He specifies utterance and knowledge, v. 5.
Where God has given these two gifts, he has given great capacity for usefulness. Many have the flower of utterance, that have not the root of knowledge; and their converse is barren. Many have the treasure of knowledge, and want utterance to employ it for the good of others; and then it is in a manner wrapped up in a napkin. But where God gives both, a man is qualified for eminent usefulness.
Note, when there was endowed with all utterance, and all knowledge, it was fit that a large tribute of praise should be rendered to God; especially when these gifts were a testimony to the truth of the Christian doctrine, a confirmation of the testimony of Christ among them, v. 6. They were signs and wonders, and gifts of the Holy Ghost, by which God did bear witness to the apostles, both to their mission and doctrine; (Heb. 2. 4.) so that the message of the apostles appeared to be from God, and not from men. In the church, the more full attestation was given to that doctrine which was delivered by the apostles; the more confirming evidence they had of their divine mission. And it is no wonder, that when they had such foundation for their faith, they should live in expectation of the coming of their Lord Jesus Christ,
v. 7. It is the character of Christians, that they wait for Christ's second coming; all our religion is a rehearsal of that event, and it is the business of our lives to prepare for it, if we are Christians indeed. And the more confirmed we are in the Christian faith, the more firm is our belief of our Lord's second coming, and the more earnest our expectation of it.

IV. Of the encouraging hopes the apostle had of them for the time to come, founded on the power and love of Christ, and the faithfulness of God, v. 8, 9.
He who had begun a good work in them, and carried it on thus far, would not leave it unfinished. Those that wait for the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, will be kept by him, and confirmed to the end; and those that are so, will be blameless in the day of Christ: not upon the foot of strict justice, but gracious absolution; not in rigor of law, but from rich and free grace. How desirable is it to be confirmed and kept of Christ for such a purpose! How glorious are the hopes of such a privilege, whether for ourselves or others! To be kept by the power of Christ from the power of our own corruptions and Satan's temptations, that we may appear without blame in the great day! O glorious expectation, especially when the faithfulness of God comes in to support our hopes! He who hath called us into the fellowship of his Son, is faithful, and will do it, (1 Peter, 5. 10.) He who hath brought us into a near and dear relation to Christ, into sweet and intimate communion with Christ, is faithful; he may be trusted with our dearest concerns. Those that come at his call, shall never be disappointed in their hopes in him. If we approve ourselves faithful to God, we shall never find him unfaithful to us. He will not suffer his faithfulness to fail, Ps. 89. 33.
I. CORINTHIANS, I.

10. Now I beseech you, brethren, by the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye all speak the same thing, and that there be no divisions among you; but that ye be perfectly joined together in the same mind, and in the same judgment. 11. For it hath been declared unto me of you, my brethren, by them who are of the house of Chloe, that there are contentions among you. 12. Now this I say, that every one of you saith, I am of Paul; and I of Apollos; and I of Cephas; and I of Christ. 13. Is Christ divided? Was Paul crucified for you? Or were ye baptized in the name of Paul?

I. He exhorts them to unity and brotherly love, and reproves them for their divisions. He had received an account from some that wished them well, of some unhappy differences among them. It was neither ill-will to the church, nor to their ministers, that prompted them to give this account; but a kind and prudent concern to have these heats qualified by Paul's interposition. He writes to them in a very engaging way; "I beseech you, brethren, by the name of our Lord Jesus Christ; be perfectly joined together in the same mind, as far as you can. In the great things of religion be of a mind: but when there is not a unity of sentiment, let there be an union of affections. The consideration of being agreed in greater things, should extinguish all feuds and divisions about lesser ones."

II. He hints at the original of these contentions. Pride lay at the bottom, and this made them factions. Only of pride cometh contention, Prov. 13. 10. They quarrelled about their ministers. Paul and Apollos were both faithful ministers of Jesus Christ, and helpers of their faith and joy: but those who were disposed to be contentious, broke into parties, and parted themself at the head of these several factions: some cried up Paul, perhaps as the most sublime and spiritual teacher; others cried up Apollos, perhaps as the most eloquent speaker; some Cephas, or Peter, perhaps for the authority of his age, or because he was the apostle of the circumference; and some were for neither, but Christ only. So liable are the best things in the world to be corrupted, and the gospel and its institutions, which are not given to men and wrenched from one another, to be made the engines of variance, discord, and contention. This is no reproach to our religion, but a very melancholy evidence of the corruption and depravity of human nature. Note, How far will pride carry Christians in opposition to one another! Even so far as to set Christ and his own apostles at variance, and make them rivals and competitors.

III. He expostulates with them upon their discord and quarrels; "Is Christ divided? No, there is but one Christ, and therefore Christians should be of one heart. Was Paul crucified for you? Was he your sacrifice and atonement? Did I ever pretend to be your saviour, or any more than his minister? Or, were ye baptized in the name of Paul? Were ye devoted to my service, or engaged to be my disciples, by that sacred right? Did I challenge that right in you, or dependence from you, as are the proper claims of your God and Redeemer?"

No; ministers, however instrumental they are of good to us, are not to be put in Christ's stead. They are not to usurp Christ's authority, nor encourage anything in the people, that looks like transferring his authority to them. He is our Saviour and Sacrifice, he is our Lord and Guide. And happy were it for the churches, if there were no name of distinction among them, as Christ is not divided.

14. I thank God that I baptized none of you, but Crispus and Gaius; 15. Lest any should say that I had baptized in mine own name. 16. And I baptized also the household of Stephanas: besides, I know not whether I baptized any other.

Here the apostle gives an account of his ministry among them. He thanks God, he had baptized but a few among them; Crispus, who had been a ruler of a synagogue at Corinth, (Acts 18. 8.) Gaius, and the household of Stephanas; besides, he says he did not remember he had baptized any. But how was this a proper matter for thankfulness? Was it not a large part of the apostolic commission to baptize all nations? And could Paul give thanks to God for his own neglect of duty? He is not to be understood in such a sense, as if he was thankful for not having baptized at all, but for not having done it in present circumstances, lest it should have had this very bad construction put upon it—that he had baptized in his own name, made disciples for himself, or set himself up as the head of a sect. He left it to other ministers to baptize, while he set himself to more useful work; and filled up his time with preaching the gospel. This he thought was more his business, because the more important business of the two. He had assistants that could baptize, when none could discharge the other part of his office as well as himself. In this sense he says, Christ sent him not to baptize, but to preach the gospel; not so much to baptize as to preach. Note, Ministers should esteem their chief employment to be the more especially to that service in which Christ will be most honoured, and the salvation of souls promoted, and for which themselves are best fitted; though no part of their duty is to be neglected. The principal business Paul did among them, was, to preach; to preach the gospel, (v. 17.) the cross, (v. 18.) Christ crucified, v. 23. Ministers are the soldiers of Christ, and are to erect and display the banner of the cross. He did not preach his own fancy, but the gospel; the glad tidings of peace, and reconciliation to God, through the Mediation of a crucified Redeemer. This is the sun and substance of the gospel. Christ crucified is the foundation of all our hopes, and the fountain of all our joys. By his death we live. That is what Paul preached, what all ministers should preach, and what all the saints live upon.

17. For Christ sent me not to baptize, but to preach the gospel: not with wisdom of words, lest the cross of Christ should be made of none effect. 18. For the preaching of the cross is to them that perish foolishness; but unto we who are saved it is the power of God. 19. For it is written, I will destroy the wisdom of the wise, and will bring to nothing the understanding of the prudent. 20. Where is the wise? Where is the scribe? Where is the dis-puter of this word? Hath not God made foolish the wisdom of this world? 21. For after that, in the wisdom of God, the world by wisdom knew not God, it pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe. 22. For the Jews require a sign, and the Greeks seek after wisdom: 23. But we preach Christ crucified, unto the Jews a stumbling-block, and unto the Greeks foolishness; 24. But unto them who are called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ the power of God, and the wisdom of God.

Christ crucified is a stumbling-block to the Jews. They could not get over it. They had a conceit that their expected Messiah was to be a great temporal prince, and therefore would never own one who made so mean an appearance in life, and died so accursed a death, for their Deliverer and King. They despised him, and looked upon him as execrable, because he was hanged on a tree, and because he did not gratify them with signs to their mind, though his divine power shone out in innumerable miracles. The Jews require a sign, v. 22. See Matt. 12. 38.

2. He was to the Greeks foolishness. They laughed at the story of a crucified Saviour, and despised the apostles' way of telling it. They sought for wisdom. They were men of wit and reading, men that had cultivated arts and sciences, and had, for some ages, been in a manner the very mint of knowledge and learning. There was nothing in the plain doctrine of the cross to suit their taste, or humour their vanity, or gratify a curious and wrangling temper: they entertained it therefore with scorn and contempt. What, hope to be saved by one that could not save himself! And trust in one who was condemned and crucified for a malefactor, a Man of mean birth and poor condition in life, and cut off by so many impious and execrable deaths? They were despised, of no worth, and the pride of human reason and learning could not relish. The Greeks thought it little better than stupidity to receive such a doctrine, and pay this high regard to such a person; and thus were they justly left to perish in their pride and obstinacy. Note, It is just with God to leave those to themselves, who pour such proud contempt on divine wisdom and grace.

3. To them which are called and saved, he is the Wisdom of God, and the Power of God. Those who are called and sanctified, who receive the gospel, and are enlightened by the Spirit of God, discern more glorious discoveries of God's wisdom and power in the doctrine of Christ crucified than in all his other works. Note, Those who are saved, are reconciled to the doctrine of the cross, and led into deep contemplation of his acquaintance with the mysteries of Christ crucified.

III. We have here the triumphs of the cross over human wisdom; according to the ancient prophecy, (Isa. 29. 14.) I will destroy the wisdom of the wise, and bring to nothing the understanding of the prudent. Where is the wise? Where is the scribe? Where is the disputator of this world? Hath not God made foolish the wisdom of this world? v. 19, 20. All the valued learning of this world was confounded, baffled, and eclipsed, by the Christian revelation, and the glorious triumphs of the cross. The Heathen politicians and philosophers, the Jewish rabbies and doctors, the curious searchers into the secrets of nature, were all posed and put to a nonplus. This scheme lay out of the reach of the deepest statesmen and philosophers, and the greatest braves of learning. They were so far from the Greeks. When God would save the world, he took a way by himself; and good reason, for the world by wisdom knew not God, v. 21. All the boasted science of the heathen world did not, could not, effectually bring home the world to God. In spite of all their wisdom, ignorance still prevailed, iniquity still abounded. Men were puff'd up by their imaginary knowledge, and rather more alienated from God.
of worldly wise men. Our living through one who died, our being blessed by one who was made a curse, our being justified by one who was himself condemned, was all folly and inconsistency to men blinded with self-conceit, and welded to their own prejudices, and the boasted discoveries of their reason and philosophy.

2. The manner of preaching the gospel was foolishness to them. None of the famous men for wisdom or eloquence were employed to plant the church, or propagate the gospel. A few fishermen were called out, and sent upon this errand. These were commissioned to discipate the nations; the vessels chosen to convey the treasure of saving knowledge to the world; there was nothing in them, that at first view looked grand or august enough to come from God; and the proud pretenders to learning and wisdom despised them as mean, and the disciples of those who despised it. And yet the foolishness of God is wiser than men, v. 25. Those methods of divine conduct that vain men are apt to censure as unwise and weak, have more true, solid, and successful wisdom in them, than all the learning and wisdom that are among men; "Ye see your calling, brethren, how that not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble, are called, v. 26. The wise of the world, the learned and powerful, those of learning or authority, or honourable extraction, are called." There is a great deal of meanness and weakness in the outward appearance of our religion. For,

1. Few of distinguished character in any of these respects were chosen for the work of the ministry. God did not choose philosophers, nor orators, nor statesmen, nor men of wealth and power and interest in the world, to publish the gospel of grace and peace. Not the wise men after the flesh; though men would be apt to think that a reputation for wisdom and learning might have contributed much to the success of the gospel. Not the mighty and noble, however men might be apt to imagine that secular pomp and power would make way for its reception in the world. But God seeth not as man seeth: He hath chosen the foolish things of the world, the weak things of the world, the base things of the world, and the things which are despised, things which are counted nought, to confound the wisdom of the wise, and to confound the power of the powers of this world; and, to subdue all things unto himself, and to be exalted in the church, and over all things. His thoughts are not as our thoughts, nor his ways as our ways. He is a better judge than we, what instruments and measures will best serve the purposes of his glory.

2. Few of distinguished rank and character were called to be Christians. As the preachers the temple of God, the temple of God was chosen of mean rank and circumstances, to confound and prevail against all the power and authority of earthly kings: and base things, and things which are despised, things which men have in the lowest estate, or in the utmost contempt, to pour contempt and disgrace on all they value and have in veneration; and things which are not, to bring to nought, to abolish, things that are.
1. I AND I, brethren, when I came to you, came not with excellency of speech or of wisdom, declaring unto you the testimony of God. 2. For I determined not to know any thing among you, save Jesus Christ, and him crucified. 3. And I was with you in weakness, and in fear, and in much trembling: 4. And my speech and my preaching were not with enticing words of man's wisdom, but in demonstration of the Spirit and of power: 5. That your faith should not stand in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God.

In this passage the apostle pursues his design, and reminds the Corinthians how he acted when he first preached the gospel among them.

I. As to the matter or subject, he tells us, (v. 2.) He determined to know nothing among them but Jesus Christ, and him crucified; to make a show of no other knowledge than this; to teach nothing but this. He was not only the teacher of that knowledge, but Jesus Christ, and him crucified. Note, Christ, in his person and offices, is the Sun and Substance of the gospel, and ought to be the great Subject of a gospel minister's preaching. His business is, to display the banner of the cross, and invite people under it. Any one that heard Paul preach, found him to harp so continually on this string, that he would say he knew nothing but Christ, and him crucified. Whatever other knowledge he had, this was the only knowledge he discovered, and shewed himself concerned to propagate among his hearers.

II. The manner wherein he preached Christ, is here also observable.

1. Negatively. He came not among them with excellency of speech or wisdom, v. 1. His speech and preaching were not with enticing words of man's wisdom. v. 4. He did not affect to appear a fine orator, or a deep philosopher; nor did he insinuate himself into their minds, by a flourish of words, or a pompous show of deep reason, and extraordinary science and skill. He did not set himself to captivate the ear by fine turns and eloquent expressions; nor please and entertain the fancy with lofty flights or sublime notions. Neither his speech, nor the wisdom he taught, savoured of human skill; he learnt both in another school. Divine wisdom needed not to be set off with such human ornaments.

2. Positively. He came among them, declaring the testimony of God, v. 1. He published a divine revelation, and gave in sufficient vouchers for the authority of it, both by its consonancy to ancient predictions, and by present miraculous operations; and there he left the matter. Ornaments of speech and philosophical argument could add no weight to what came recommended by such authority. He was also among them in weakness, and fear, and in much trembling; and yet his speech and preaching were demonstration of the Spirit, and of power, v. 3, 4. His enemies in the church of Corinth spake very contemptuously of him; His bodily presence, say they, is weak, and his speech contemptible, 2 Cor. 12:10. Possibly, he had a little body, and a low voice; but though he had not so good an elocution as some, it is plain that he was no mean speaker. The men of Lystra looked on him to be the heathen god Mercury, come down to them in the form of a man, because he was the chief speaker, Acts 14.

12. Nor did he want courage or resolution to go through his work; he was in nothing terr'd ed by his adversaries. Yet he was no boaster. He did not proudly vaunt himself, like his opposers. He acted in his office with much modesty, concern, and care. He carried it with great humility among them; not as one grown vain with the honour and authority conferred on him, but as one concerned to approve himself faithful; and fearful of himself, lest he should mismanage in his trust. Observe, No, know the fear and trembling of faithful ministers, who are jealous over souls with a godly jealousy; and a deep sense of their own weakness is the occasion of this fear and trembling. They know how insufficient they are, and are therefore fearful for themselves. But though Paul managed with this modesty and concern, yet he spake with authority, in the demonstration of the Spirit, and of power. He breathed the truths of Christ in their native dress, with plainness of speech. He laid down the doctrine as the Spirit delivered it; and left the Spirit, by his external operation in signs and miracles, and his internal influences on the hearts of men, to demonstrate the truth of it, and procure its reception.

13. Here is the end mentioned for which he preached Christ crucified in this manner, That their faith should not stand in the wisdom of man, but the power of God; (v. 3.) that they might not be drawn by human motives, or overcome by mere human arguments, lest it should be said that either rhetoric or logic had made them Christians. But when nothing but Christ crucified was plainly preached, the success must be entirely attributed to a divine power accompanying the word. Their faith must be founded, not on human wisdom, but divine evidence and operation. The gospel was so preached, that God might appear and be glorified in all.

6. Howbeit we speak wisdom among them that are perfect; yet not the wisdom of this world, nor of the princes of this world, that come to nought: 7. But we speak the wisdom of God in a mystery, even the hidden wisdom, which God ordained before the world unto our glory: 8. Which none of the princes of this world knew: for had they known it, they would not have crucified the Lord of glory. 9. But as it is written, Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him. 10. But God hath revealed them unto us by his Spirit: for the Spirit searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God. 11. For what man knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of man which is in him? Even so the things of God knoweth no man, but the Spirit of God. 12. Now we have received, not the spirit of the world, but the spirit which is of God; that so we might know the things that are freely given to us of God. 13. Which things also we speak, not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth, comparing spiritual things with spiritual. 14. But the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God: for they are foolishness unto him; neither can he know them.
cause they are spiritually discerned. 15. But he that is spiritual judgeth all things, yet he himself is judged of no man. 16. For who hath known the mind of the Lord, that he may instruct him? But we have the mind of Christ.

In this part of the chapter, the apostle shows them that though he had not come to them with the excellency of human wisdom, with any of the boasted knowledge or learning of the Jews or Greeks, yet he had communicated to them a treasure of the true and highest wisdom; We speak wisdom among them who are perfect, (v. 6.) among them who are well instructed in Christianity, and come to maturity in the things of God. They that receive the doctrine as divine, and, having been illuminated by the Holy Spirit, have looked well into it, and observed the wisdom of God. They have in it not only the plain history of Christ, and him crucified, but discern the deep and admirable designs of the divine wisdom therein. Though what we preach be foolishness to the world, it is wisdom to them. They are made wise by it, and can discern wisdom in it. Note, Those who are wise themselves, are the only proper judges of what is wisdom; not indeed the wisdom of this world, nor of the princes of this world (v. 6, 7.) not worldly wisdom, but divine; not such as the men of this world could have discovered, nor such as worldly men, under the conduct of pride, and passion, and appetite, and worldly interest, and destitute of the Spirit of God, can receive. Note, How different is the judgment of God from that of the world! He seeth not as man seeth. The wisdom he teaches is of a quite different kind from what passes under that notion in the world. It is not the wisdom of politicians, nor philosophers, nor rabbies, (see v. 6.) not such as they teach, nor such as they relish; but the wisdom of God in a mystery, the hidden wisdom of God; what he had a long time kept to himself, and concealed from the world, and the depth of which, now it is revealed, none but himself can fathom. It is the mystery which hath been hid from ages and generations, though now made manifest to us. (Col. 1. 26.) hid in the Father, from the heathen world, and made mysterious to the Jews, by being wrapped up in dark types and distant prophecies, but revealed and made known to us by the Spirit of God. Observe the privilege of those who enjoy the gospel-revelation: to them types are unveiled, mysteries made plain, prophecies interpreted, and the secret counsels of God published and laid open. The wisdom of God in a mystery is now made manifest to the saints. Now concerning this wisdom, observe,

I. The rise and original of it: it was ordained of God, before the world, to our glory, v. 7. It was ordained of God; he had determined long ago to reveal and make it known, from many ages past, from the beginning, nay, from eternity; and that to our glory, the glory of us, either us apostles, or us Christians. It was a great honour put upon the apostles, to be intrusted with the revelation of this wisdom. It was a great and honourable privilege for Christians to have this glorious wisdom discovered to them. And the wisdom of God discovered in the gospel, the divine wisdom taught by the gospel, prepares for our everlasting glory and happiness in the world to come. The counsels of God concerning our redemption are dated from eternity, and designed for the glory and happiness of the saints. And what deep wisdom was in these counsels! Note, The wisdom of God is both employed and displayed for the honour of his saints; employed from eternity, and displayed in time, to make them glorious both here and hereafter, in time and to eternity. What honour does he put on his saints!

II. The ignorance of the great men of the world about it: that none of the princes of this world knew; (v. 8.) the principal men in authority and power, or in wisdom and learning. The Roman governors, and the guides and rulers of the Jewish church and nation, seem to be the persons here chiefly meant. These were the princes of this world, or this age, who, had they known this true and heavenly wisdom, would not have crucified the Lord of glory. This Pilate and the Jewish rulers literally did, when our Redeemer was crucified, upon the sentence of the one, and the clamorous demands of the other. Observe, Jesus Christ is the Lord of glory; a title much too great for any creature to bear: and therefore was he hated, because he was not known. Had his crucifiers known him, known who and what he was, they would have withheld their impious hands, and not have taken and slain him. This he pleaded with his Father for their pardon; Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do, Luke 23. 34. Note, There are things which people would not be known, if they knew the wisdom of God in the great work of redemption. They act as they do, because they are blind or heedless. They know not the truth, or will not attend to it.

III. It is such wisdom as could not have been discovered without a revelation; according to what the prophet Isaiah says, (ch. 64. 4.) Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor hath proceeded into the heart of man the things which God hath prepared for them that love him; for him that waiteth for him, that waiteth for his mercy, as the LXX. It was a testimony of love to God in the Jewish believers, to live in expectation of the accomplishment of evangelical promises. Waiting upon God is an evidence of love to him. Go, thither our God, we have waited for him, Isa. 25. 9. Observe, There are things which God hath prepared for them that love him, and wait for him. There are such things prepared by God for our future life for them. Things which sense cannot discover, no present information can convey to our ears, nor can yet enter our hearts. Life and immortality are brought to light through the gospel, 2 Tim. 1. 10. But the apostle speaks here of the subject-matter of the divine revelation under the gospel. These are such as eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, as we have observed. The great truths of the gospel can never be brought out of the sphere of human discovery. Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard them, nor have they entered into the heart of man. Were they objects of sense, could they be discovered by an eye of reason, and communicated by the ear, to the mind as matters of common human knowledge may, there had been no need of a revelation. But lying out of the sphere of nature, we cannot discover them but by the light of revelation. And therefore we must take them as they lie in the scriptures, and as God has been pleased to reveal them.

IV. We here see by whom this wisdom is discovered to us; God hath revealed them to us by his Spirit, v. 10. The scripture is given by inspiration of God. Holy men spoke of old as they were moved by the Holy Ghost, 2 Pet. 1. 21. And the apostles spoke by inspiration of the Holy Ghost, as he taught them, and gave them utterance. Here is a proof of the divine authority of the holy scriptures. Paul wrote what he taught; and what he taught was revealed of God by his Spirit, that Spirit that searches all things, yea, the deep things of God, and knows the things of God, as the spirit of man that is hid known to the things of a man, v. 11. A double argument is drawn from these words, in proof of the divinity of the Holy Ghost. 1. Omnipotence is attributed to him; He searches all things, even the deep things of God. He has exact knowledge of all things, and enters into the very depths of God, penetrates into his most secret counsels. Now, who can have such a thorough knowledge of God, but God? And as the Gospel seems to imply that the Holy Spirit is as much in God, as a man's mind is in himself. Now the mind of the man is plainly essential to him. He cannot be without his mind. Nor can God be without his Spirit. He is as much and as intimately one with God, as the man's mind is with the man. The man knows his own mind, because his mind is one with himself. The Spirit of God knows the things that God is, because he is one with God. And as nothing can come at the knowledge of what is in another man's mind, till he communicates and reveals it; so neither can we know the secret counsels and purposes of God, till they are made known to us by his Holy Spirit. We cannot know them at all, till he has proposed them objectively (as it is called) in the external revelation; we cannot know or believe them to salvation, till he enlightens the faculty, opens the eye of the mind, and gives us such a knowledge and faith of them. And it was by this Spirit that the apostles had received the wisdom of God in a mystery, which they spake. "Now we have received not the Spirit of the world, but the Spirit which is of God, that we might know the things freely given to us of God;" (v. 12.) not the spirit which is in the wise men of the world, (v. 6.) nor in the rulers of the world, (v. 8.) but the Spirit which is of God, properly so called, as a man may deliver in the name of God, by inspiration from him; and it is by his gracious illumination and influence that we know the things freely given to us of God, unto salvation," that is, "the great privileges of the gospel, which are the free gift of God, distributions of mere and rich grace." Though these things are given us, and the revelation of this gift be made to us, we cannot know them to any saving purpose, till we have the Spirit. The apostles had the revelation of these things from the Spirit of God, and the saving impression of them from the same Spirit.

V. We see here in what manner this wisdom was taught or communicated; which things we speak, not in the words which man's wisdom teaches, but which the Holy Ghost teaches, v. 13. They had received the wisdom they taught, not from the wise men of the world, not from their own inquiry or invention, but through the Spirit of God. The Holy Ghost teaches us the things of God. We could not deliver a human dress on it, but plainly declared the doctrine of Christ, in terms also taught them by the Holy Spirit. He not only gave the knowledge of these things, but gave them utterance. Observe, The truths of God need no garnishing by human skill or eloquence, but look best in the words which the Holy Ghost teaches. The Spirit of God knows much better how to speak of the things of God than the best critics, orators, or orators. Compare spiritual things with spiritual, one part of revelation with another; the revelation of the gospel with that of the Jews; the discoveries of the New Testament with the types and prophecies of the Old. The comparing of matters of revelation with matters of science, things supernatural with things natural and common, is going by a wrong measure. Spiritual things, we say, are more certain; but this is not so, as another; but if the principles of human art and science are to be made a test of revelation, we shall certainly judge amiss concerning it, and the things contained in it. Or, adapting spiritual things to spiritual; speaking of spiritual matters, matters of revelation, and the spiritual life, in language that is proper and plain. The language of the Spirit of God is the most proper to convey his meaning.

VI. We have an account how this wisdom is received.

1. The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness to him, neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned, v. 14. The natural man, the animal man. Either, (1.) The man under the power of corruption, and therefore never attains to the things of God. He is like the animal, such as Jude calls sensual, not having the Spirit, v. 19. Men unsanctified receive not the things of God. The understanding, through the corruption of nature by the fall, and through the confirmation of this disorder by customary sin, is utterly unapt to receive the rays of divine light; it is prejudice against them. The truths of God are foolishness to such a mind. The man looks on them as trifling and impertinent things, not worthy his mind. The light shineth in darkness, and the darkness comprehendeth it not, John 1. 5. Not that the natural faculty of discerning is lost, but evil inclinations and wicked principles render the man unwilling to enter into the mind of God, in the spiritual matters of his kingdom, and yield to their force and power. It is the quickening beams of the Spirit of truth and holiness, that must help the mind to discern their excellency, and so through a conviction of the truths, to receive and embrace them. Thus the natural man, the man destitute of the Spirit of God, cannot know them, because they are spiritually discerned. Or, (2.) The natural man, that is, the wise man of the world, (ch. 1. 19, 20.) the wise man after the flesh, or according to the flesh; (v. 26.) one who hath the wisdom of the world, man's wisdom; (ch. 2. 4—6.) one of the ancients, that would turn all truth by his own wisdom. He finds nothing by faith, nor owns any need of supernatural assistance. This was very much the character of the pretenders to philosophy, and the Grecian learning and wisdom, in that day. Such a man receives not the things of the Spirit of God. Revelation is not with him a principle of science; he looks upon it as delirium and dotage, the extravagant thought of some deluded dreamer. It is no way to witness, ranging the famous masters of the world; and for that reason he can have no knowledge of things revealed, because they are only spiritually discerned, or made known by the revelation of the Spirit, which is a principle of science or knowledge which he will not admit.

2. But he that is spiritual judgeth all things, yet he himself is judged, or discerned, of no man, v. 15. Either, (1.) He who is sanctified and made spiritually-minded, (Rom. 8. 6.) judgeth all things, or discerneth all things; he is capable of judging about matters of human wisdom, and has also a relish and savour of divine truths; he sees divine wisdom, and experiences divine power, in gospel revelations and mysteries, which the carnal and unsanctified mind looks upon as weakness and folly; as things destitute of all power, and not worthy any regard. It is the sanctified mind that judges of the spiritual matters of holiness; but by the refinement of its faculties, they do not lose their power of discerning and judging about common and natural things. The spiritual man may judge of all things, natural and supernatural, human and divine, the deductions of reason, and the discoveries of revelation. But he himself is judged or discerned of no man. M. V. God's saints are his highest estimate of others. He is hid with Christ in God, Col. 3. 3. The carnal man knows no more of a spiritual man than he does of other spiritual things. He is a stranger to the principles, and pleasures, and actings, of the divine life. The spiritual man does not lie open to his observation. Or, (2.) He that is spiritual, has had divine revelations made to him, receives them as such, and founds his faith and religion upon them; he can judge both of common things and things divine; he can discern what is, and what is not, the doctrine of the gospel.
and of salvation; and whether a man preaches the truths of God or not. He does not lose the power of reasoning, nor renounce the principles of it, by founding his faith and religion on revelation. He himself is judged of no man; can be judged, so as to be confuted, by no man; nor can any man who is not spiritual, not under a divine afflation himself, (see ch. 14. 37.) or not founding his faith on a divine revelation, discern or judge whether what he speaks be true or divine, or not. In short, he who founds all his knowledge upon principles of science, and the more light of reason, can never be a judge of the truth or falsehood of what is received by revelation. For he hath known the mind of the Lord, that he may instruct him, (v. 16.) the spiritual man? Who can enter so far into the mind of God, as to instruct him who has the Spirit of God, and is under his inspiration? He only is the person to whom God immediately communicates the knowledge of his will. And who can inform or instruct him in the mind of God, who is so immediately under the conduct of his own Spirit? Vehemently have they known anything of the mind of God by a natural power. But, adds the apostle, we have the mind of Christ; and the mind of Christ is the mind of God. He is God, and the principal Messenger and Prophet of God. And the apostles were impowered by his Spirit to make known his mind to us. And in the holy scriptures, the mind of Christ, and the mind of God in Christ, are fully revealed to us. Observe, It is the great privilege of Christians, that they have the mind of Christ revealed to them by his Spirit.

CHAP. III.

In this chapter, the apostle, I. Blames the Corinthians for their carnality and divisions, v. 1. 4. 11. He instructs them how what was amiss among them might be rectified, by remembering, 1. That their ministers were no more than ministers, v. 5. 2. That they were unanimous, and carried on the same design, v. 6. 10. 3. That they built on one and the same foundation, v. 11. 15. 3. He exhorts them to give due honour to their bodies, by keeping them pure; (v. 16, 17.) and to humility, and self-diffidence, v. 18. 20. From which he deduces it, that among very faithful ministers, because of the equal interest they had in all, v. 22, to the end.

1. AND I, brethren, could not speak unto you as unto spiritual, but as unto carnal, even as unto babes in Christ. 2. I have fed you with milk, and not with meat: for hitherto ye were not able to bear it, neither yet now are ye able. 3. For ye are yet carnal: for whereas there is among you envying, and strife, and divisions, are ye not carnal, and walk as men? 4. For while one saith, I am of Paul; and another, I am of Apollos; are ye not carnal? Here, 1. St. Paul blames the Corinthians for their weakness and non-proficiency. They who are sanctified, are so only in part; there is still room for growth and increase, both in grace and knowledge, 2 Pet. 3. 18. Those who through divine grace are renewed to a spiritual life, may yet in many things be defective. The apostle tells them he could not speak to them, as unto spiritual men, but as unto carnal men, as to babes in Christ, v. 1. They were so far from forming their maxims and measures upon the foot of divine revelation, and the truths of the gospel, that it was but too evident they were much under the command of carnal and corrupt affections. They were still very babes in Christ. They had received some of the first principles of Christianity, but were grown up to no maturity of understanding in them, or of faith and holiness. And yet it is plain, from several passages in this epistle, that the Corinthians were not very proud of their wisdom and knowledge. Note, It is but too common for persons of very moderate knowledge and understanding to have a great measure of self-conceit. The apostle assigns their little proficiency in the knowledge of Christianity, as a reason why he had communicated no more of the deep things of it to them. They could not bear such food, they needed to be fed with milk, not with meat, v. 2. Note, It is the duty of a faithful minister of Christ, to consult the capacities of his hearers, and teach them as they can bear. And yet it is natural for babes to grow up to men; and babes in Christ should endeavour to grow in stature, and become men in Christ. It is expected that their advances in knowledge should be in proportion to their means and opportunities, and their time of professing religion; that they may be able to bear discourses of the mysteries of our religion, and not always rest in plain things. It was a reproach to the Corinthians, that they had so long sat under the ministry of St. Paul, and had made no more improvement in Christian knowledge. Note, Christians are utterly to blame, who do not endeavour to grow in grace and knowledge.

II. He blames them for their carnality, and gives their contention and discord about their ministers, as an evidence of it; For ye are yet carnal; for whereas there is among you envying, and strife, and divisions, are ye not carnal, and walk as men? v. 3. They had mutual emulations, and quarrels, and factions among them, upon the account of their ministers; while one said, I am of Paul; and another, I am of Apollos, v. 4. These were proofs of their being carnal; that fleshily interests and affections too much swayed them. Note, Contentions and quarrels about religion are sad evidences of remaining carnality. True religion makes men more approachable, and not contentious. Factions spring up among human principles, not upon principles of true religion; they are guided by their own pride and passions, and not by the rules of Christianity; Do ye not walk as men? Note, It is to be lamented, that many who should walk as Christians, that is, above the common rate of men, do indeed walk as men, live and act too much like other men.

5. Who then is Paul, and who is Apollos, but ministers by whom ye believed, even as the Lord gave to every man? 6. I have planted, Apollos watered; but God gave the increase. 7. So then neither is he that planteth any thing, neither he that watereth; but God that giveth the increase. 8. Now he that planteth and he that watereth are one: and every man shall receive his own reward according to his own labour. 9. For we are labourers together with God: ye are God's husbandry, ye are God's building. 10. According to the grace which is given unto me, as a wise master-builder, I have laid the foundation, and another buildeth thereon. But let every man take heed how he buildeth thereupon.

Here the apostle instructs them how to cure this humbug, and rectify what was amiss among them upon this head.

I. By reminding them, that the ministers about whom they contended, were but ministers; Who then is Paul, or who is Apollos, but ministers by whom ye believed? Even as the Lord gave to every
1. Even of insufficiency, E.A^either and elements Apostles were not the authors of our faith and religion, though they were authorized and qualified to reveal and propagate it. They acted in this office as God gave to every man. Observe, All the gifts and powers that even apostles discovered, and exercised in the work of the ministry, were from God. They were intended to manifest their mission and doctrine to be divine. It was perfectly wrong, upon their account, to transfer that regard to the apostles, which was solely to be paid to the divine authority by which they acted, and to God, from whom they had their authority. Paul had planted, and Apollos had watered, v. 6. Both were useful, for one purpose, the other for a different. Note, God makes use of variety of instruments, and fits them to their several uses and intentions. Paul was fitted for planting work, and Apollos for watering work; but God gave the increase. Note, The success of the ministry must be derived from the divine blessing. Neither he that planteth is anything, nor he that watereth, but God who giveth the increase, v. 7. Every minister of religion is but a poor helper, of nothing more than a handmaid; he can do nothing with efficacy and success, unless God give the increase. Note, The best qualified and most faithful ministers have a just sense of their own insufficiency, and are very desirous that God should have all the glory of their success. Paul and Apollos are nothing at all in their own account, but God is all in all.

II. By representing to them the unanimity of Christ's ministers; He that planteth and he that watereth are one; v. 8. employed by one Master, intrusted with the same revelation, banded in one work, and engaged in one design; in harmony with one another, however they may be set in opposition to each other by factious party-makers. They have their different gifts from one and the same Spirit, for the very same purposes; and they heartily carry on the same design. Planters and waterers are but fellow-labourers in the same building. Note, All the faithful ministers of Christ are one in the great business and intention of their ministry. They may have difference of sentiment in lesser things; they may have their debates and contests; but they heartily concur in the great design of honouring God and saving souls, by promoting true Christianity in the world. All such may expect a great recompense of their fidelity, and in proportion to it; Every man shall receive, according to his own labour. Their business is one, but some may mind it more than others: their end and design are one, but some may pursue it more closely than others: their Master also is one, and yet this good and gracious Master may make a difference in the rewards he gives, according to the different service they do; Every one's own work shall have a reward. They that work hardest shall fare best. They that are most faithful shall have the greatest reward; and glorious work it is, in which all faithful ministers are employed. They are labourers with God, coworkers, fellow-labourers, (v. 9.) not indeed in the same order and degree, but in subordination to him, as instruments in his hand. They are engaged in his business. They are not to work together with God, in promoting the purposes of his glory, and the salvation of precious souls; and he who knows their work, will take care they do not labour in vain. Men may neglect and vilify one minister, while they cry out another, and have no reason for either: they may condemn when they should commend, and applaud what they should neglect and avoid; but the judgment of God is according to truth. He never rewards but upon just reason, and he ever rewards in proportion to the diligence and faithfulness of his servants. Note, Faithful ministers, when they are ill used by men, should encourage themselves in G. and it is to God, the chief Agent and Director of the great work of the gospel, to whom they that labour with him should endeavour to approve themselves. They are always employed in some way or other, whether joy and building; and therefore, to be sure, he will carefully look over them; Ye are God's husbandry, ye are God's building; and therefore are neither of Paul nor of Apollos; neither belong to one nor other, but to God: they only plant and water you, but it is the divine blessing on his own husbandry, that alone can make it yield fruit. You are not our husbandry, but God's. We work under him, and with him, and for him. It is all for God, that may not be entered into. You are God's husbandry and building." He had employed the former metaphor before, and now he goes on to the other of a building; According to the grace of God which is given unto me, as a wise master-builder; I have laid the foundation, and another buildeth thereon. Paul here calls himself a wise master-builder; a character he very readily in some things, theologically, to be a master-builder in the edifice of God; he added to his character, to be a wise one. Persons may be in an office for which they are not qualified, or not so thoroughly qualified as this expression implies Paul was. But though he gives himself such a character, it is not to gratify his own pride, but to magnify divine grace. He was a wise master-builder, but the grace of God made him such. Note, It is no crime in a Christian, but, though to his own condemnation, to take notice of the good that is in him, to the praise of divine grace. Spiritual pride is abominable, it is making us of the greatest favours of God, to feed our own vanity, and make idols of ourselves. But to take notice of the favours of God, to promote our gratitude to him, and to speak of them to his honour, (be they of what sort they will,) is but a proper expression of the duty and regard we owe him. Note, However great or good, others may be, they had none of them, many fathers. He would derogate from none that had done service among them, nor would he be robbed of his own honour and respect. Note, Faithful ministers may and ought to have a concern for their own reputation. Their usefulness depends much upon it. But let every man take heed how he buildeth thereon. This is a proper caution; there may be very indifferent building on a good foundation. It is easy to err here. True and great care should be used not only to lay a sure and right foundation, but to erect a regular building upon it. Nothing must be laid upon it, but what the foundation will bear, and what is of a piece with it. Gold and dirt must not be mingled together. Note, Ministers of Christ should take great care that they do not build their own fancies or false reasonings on the foundation of divine revelation. What they preach should be the plain doctrine of their Master, or what is perfectly agreeable with it.

11. For other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ. 12. Now if any man build upon this foundation gold, silver, precious stones, wood, hay, stubble; 13. Every man's work shall be made manifest: For the day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire; and the fire shall try every man's work, of what sort it is. 14. If any man's work abide, which he hath built thereupon, he shall receive a reward. 15. If any man's work shall be burnt, he shall suffer loss: but he himself shall be saved; yet so as by fire.

Here the apostle informs us what foundation he had laid at the bottom of all his labours among them—

First, the foundation, which is laid, and the foundation of the church is the Lord Jesus Christ, the chief Corner-stone, Eph. 2. 20. Upon this foundation all the faithful ministers of Christ build. Upon this Rock all Christians found their hopes. They that build their hopes of heaven on any other foundation, build upon the sand. Other foundation can no man lay, beside what is laid—even Jesus Christ.

Note, The doctrine of our Saviour and his mediation, is the principal doctrine of Christianity. It lies at the bottom of the foundation; and is the bottom of the lowest. Leave out this, and you lay waste all our comforts, and leave no foundation for our hopes as sinners. It is in Christ only that God is reconciling a sinful world to himself; 2 Cor. 5. 19. But of those that hold the foundation, and embrace the general doctrine of Christ's being the Mediator between God and man, there are two sorts.

1. Some build upon this foundation gold, silver, and precious stones; and this is their work, and they have built; and it will be burning, and abide; and it will be in the fire of the judgment. It is a work of piety; but it is not a work which is laid up in heaven, for it is a material work. They that have built up others, and have laid up treasures in heaven, will not suffer loss. It will be in the fire of the judgment; but it will not be consumed by the fire of the judgment. It will abide, and will be in the fire of the judgment.

2. Others build wood, hay, stubble, on this foundation; that is, though they adhere to the foundation, they depart from the mind of Christ in many particulars; substitute their own fancies and inventions in the room of his doctrines and institutions, and build upon the good foundation what will not abide the test, when the day of trial comes, and the fire must needs burn their material. As wood, hay, and stubble, will not bear the trial by fire, but must be consumed in it. There is a time coming, when a discovery will be made of what men have built on this foundation; Every man's work shall be made manifest; shall be laid open to view, to his own, and that of others. Some may, in the simplicity of their hearts, build wood and stubble on the good foundation, and know not, all the while, what they have built, and burn, and are burned. The Lord's own conduct shall appear to them in its proper light. Every man's work shall be made manifest to himself, and made manifest to others, both those that have been misled by him, and those that have escaped his errors. Now we may be mistaken in our selves and others; but there is a day coming, that will cure all our mistakes, and shew us ourselves, and shew us our actions in the true light, without covering or disguise; For the day shall declare it, that is, every man's work, because it shall be revealed by fire; and the fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is, v. 13. The day shall declare and make it manifest, the last day, the great day of trial; see ch. 4. 5. Though some understand it of the time when the Jewish nation was destroyed, and their constitution thereby abolished; when the superstructure judaizing teachers would have rested on the Christian foundation was manifested to be no better than hay and stubble, that would not bear the trial. The expression carries in it a plain allusion to the refiner's art, in which the fire separates and distinguishes the dross from the gold and silver; as it also will silver and gold and precious stones, that will endure the fire, from wood and hay and stubble, that will be consumed in it. Note, There is a day coming with which every man's work will be tried with fire, from one man to another, and one man's work from another's, as the fire distinguishes gold from dross, or metal that will bear the fire, from other materials that will be consumed in it. In that day,

1. Some men's works will abide the trial; will be found standard. It will appear, that they not only held the foundation, but that they built regularly and well, and not by any false materials, and in due form and order. The foundations, the superstructure were all of apiece. The foundation-truths, and those that have a manifest connexion with them, were taught together. It may not be so easy to discern this connexion now, nor know what works will abide the trial; but that day will make a full discovery. And such a builder shall not, cannot fail of a reward. He will have praise, and hope, and the crown of life, and recompense after it. Note, Fidelity in the ministers of Christ will meet with full and ample reward in a future life. They who spread true and pure religion in all the branches of it, and whose work will abide in the great day, shall receive a reward. And, Lord, how great! how much exceeding their deserts!

2. There are others, whose works shall be burnt, (v. 15.) whose corrupt opinions and doctrines, or inventions will be discovered, disowned, and rejected. In that day shall be first manifested to be corrupt, and then disapproved of God and rejected. Note, The great day will lick off all disguises, and make things appear as they are; He whose work shall be burnt, will suffer loss. If he has built upon the right foundation wood and hay and stubble, he will suffer loss. His weakness and corruption will be discovered, and he will not be received to the kingdom of heaven. The ministers and generals have been an honest and an upright Christian. This part of his work will be lost, turning no way to his advantage, though himself may be saved. Observe, Those who hold the foundation of Christianity, though they build hay, wood, and stubble, upon it, may be saved. This may help to enlare our charity. We should not reprobate men for their wickedness, for nothing will damn men but wickedness. He shall be saved, yet so as by fire, saved out of the fire. Himself shall be snatched out of that flame which will consume his work. It intimates that it will be difficult for those that corrupt and deprave Christianity, to be saved. God will have no mercy on their works, though he may pluck them as brands out of the burning. On this passage of scripture the Papists found their doctrine of Purgatory, which is certainly any and stubble: a doctrine never originally fetched from scripture, but invented in barbarous ages, to feed the avarice and ambition of the clergy, at their cost, who would rather part with their money than their lusts, for the salvation of their souls. It can have no countenance from this text, (1.) Because this is plainly mean of a figurative fire, not of a real one: for what real fire can consume religious rites or doctrines? (2.) Because this fire is to try men's works, of what sort they are; but purgatory-fire is not for trial, nor to bring men's actions to the test, but to punish for them. They are supposed to be venial sins, not satisfied for in this life, for which satisfaction must be made by suffering the fire of purgatory. (3.) Be-
16. Know ye not that ye are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you? 17. If any man defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy; for the temple of God is holy, which temple ye are.

Here the apostle resumes his argument and exhortation, founding it on his former allusion, Ye are God's building, v. 9. and here, Know ye not that ye are the temple of God, and the Spirit of God dwelleth in you? If any man defile, corrupt and destroy the temple of God, him shall God destroy. (This is the proper sense of the original, and both clauses; for the temple of God is holy, which temple ye are.) It looks from other parts of the epistle, where the apostle argues to the very same purport, (see ch. 6. 13—20.) as if the false teachers among the Corinthians were not only loose lovers, but taught licentious doctrines, and what was particularly fitted to the taste of this lewd city, on the head of fornication. Such must do nothing. to the temple of God, dwelleth. that would be consumed, while the person who laid them on the foundation escaped the burning; (for it tended to corrupt, to pollute, and destroy the church, which was a building erected for God, and consecrated to him; and therefore should be kept pure and holy. Those who spread principles of this sort, would provoke God to destroy them.)

Note, Those who spread loose principles, that have a direct tendency to pollute the church of God, and render it unholy and unclean, are likely to bring destruction on themselves. It may be understood also as an argument against their discord and factious strifes; division being the way to destruction. But what I have been mentioning seems to be the proper meaning of the passage; Know ye not that ye are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you? It may be understood of the church of Corinth collectively, or of every single believer among them; Christian churches are temples of God. He dwells among them by his Holy Spirit. They are built together for a habitation of God through the Spirit, Eph. 2. 22. Every Christian is a living temple of the living God. God dwelt in the Jewish temple, took possession of it, and resided in it, by that glorious cloud that was the token of his presence with that people. So Christ by his Spirit dwells in all true believers. The temple was devoted and consecrated to God, and set apart from every common to a holy use, to the immediate service of God. So all Christians are separate from common uses, and set apart for God and his service. They are sacred to him — A very good argument this against all fleshly lusts, and all doctrines that give countenance to them. If we are true temples of God, we must do nothing that shall alienate ourselves from him, or corrupt and pollute ourselves, and thereby unfit ourselves for his use; and we must hearken to no doctrine, nor doctor, that would seduce us to any such practices. Note, Christians are holy by profession, and should be pure and clean, both in heart and conversation. We should heartily abhor, and carefully avoid, what will defile God's temple, and prostitute what ought to be sacred to him.

18. Let no man deceive himself. If any man among you seemeth to be wise in this world, let him become a fool, that he may be wise 19. For the wisdom of this world is foolishness with God. For it is written, He taketh the wise in their own craftiness. 20. And again, The Lord knoweth the thoughts of the wise, that they are vain.

Here he prescribes humility, and a modest opinion of themselves, for the remedy of the irregularities in the church of Corinth, the divisions and contests among them; “Let no man deceive himself, v. 18. Do not be led away from the truth and simplicity of the gospel, by pretensions of learnedness and eloquence, by a shew of deep learning, or a flourish of words, by rabbies, orators, or philosophers.” Note, We are in great danger of deceiving ourselves, when we have too high an opinion of human wisdom and arts; plain and pure Christianity will be likely to be despised by those who can suit their doctrines to the corrupt taste of their hearers, and set them off with fine language, or support them with a shew of deep and strong reasoning. But he who seems to be wise, must become a fool, that he may be wise. He must be sensible of his own ignorance, and lament it; he must distrust his own understanding, and not lean on it. To have a high opinion of our own wisdom, is but to flatter ourselves; and self-flattery is the very next step to self-deceit. The way to true wisdom, is, to sink our opinion of our own to a due level, and bez willing to be taught of God. He must become a fool, who would be true and thoroughly wise. The person who resigns his own understanding, that he may follow the instruction of God, is in the way to true and everlasting wisdom. The meek will he guide in judgment, the meek will he teach his way, Ps. 25. 9. He that has a low opinion of his own knowledge and powers, will submit to better information; such a person may be informed and improved by revelation, but he who would seek to adorn his own wisdom, and understanding, will undertake to correct even divine wisdom itself, and prefer his own shallow reasonings to the revelations of infallible and wise. Note, We must abase ourselves before God, if we would be truly wise or good; For the wisdom of this world is foolishness with God, v. 19. The wisdom which worldly men esteem, (polity, philosophy, oratory,) is foolishness with God. He chargeth his angels with folly, (Job 4. 18.) and much more the wisest among the children of men. His understanding is infinite, Ps. 147. 5. There can be no more comparison between his wisdom and ours, than between his power and being and our’s. There is no common measure by which to compare finite and infinite. And much more is the wisdom of man foolishness with God, when set in competition with his. How justly does he despise, how easily can he baffle and confound it! He taketh the wise in their own craftiness; (Job 5. 13.) he catches them in their own nets, and entangles them in their own snares: he turns their most studied, plausible, and promising schemes against themselves; and ruins them by their own contrivance. Nay, He knows the thoughts of the wise, that they are vain, (v. 20.) they are vanity, Ps. 94. 11. Note, God has a perfect knowledge of the thoughts of men, the deepest thoughts of the wisest men, their most secret counsels and purposes, nothing is hidden from him, but all things are naked and bare before him, Heb. 4. 13. And he knows them to be vanity. The thoughts of the wisest men in the world have a great mixture of vanity, of weakness and folly, in them; and before God their wisest and best thoughts and suggestions are vanity, compared with me; I mean, with his thoughts of things. And should not all this teach us modesty, diffidence in ourselves and a deference to the wisdom of God; make us thankful for his revelations, and willing to be taught of God, and not be led away, by glorious pretences to human wisdom and skill, from the simplicity of Christ, or a regard to his heavenly doctrine. Note, If he who would be wise indeed, must learn of God, and set his own wisdom up in competition with God's.

21. Therefore let no man glory in men. For all things are your's. 22. Whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas, or the world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come; all are your's; 23. And ye are Christ's; and Christ is God's.

Here the apostle founds an exhortation against over-valuing their teachers, on what he had just said, and on the consideration that they had an equal interest in all their ministers; Therefore let no man glory, &c. men, or pay that deference to them, that is due only to God; set them at the head of parties, have them in immoderate esteem and admiration, and servilely and implicitly follow their conduct, or submit to their dictates; and especially in contradiction to God, and the truths taught by his Holy Spirit. Mankind are very apt to make the mercies of Godross their intentions. The ministry is a very useful and essential office, and is of great importance; there is a great blessing to any people; yet the folly and weakness of people may do much mischief by what is in itself a blessing. They may fall into factions, side with particular ministers, and set them at their head, glory in their leaders, and be carried by them they know not whither. The only way to avoid this mischief, is, to have a modest opinion of ourselves, a due sense of the common weakness of human understanding, and an entire submission and dependence on the wisdom of God speaking in his word. Ministers are not to be set up in competition with one another. All faithful ministers are serving one Lord, and pursuing one purpose. They were appointed of Christ, for the common benefit of the church; Paul, and Apollos, and Cephas, are all your's. One is not to be set up against another, but all are to be valued and used for your own spiritual benefit. The more cent of God's possessions, the spiritual riches of a true believer; All is your's; ministers of all ranks, ordinary and extraordinary. Nay, the world itself is your's.

Not that saints are proprietors of the world, but it stands for their sake, they have as much of it as Infinite Wisdom sees to be fit for them, and they have all they have, with the divine blessing. Life is yours, that you may have season and opportunity to prepare for the life of heaven; and death is your's, that you may go to the possession of it. It is the kind messenger that will fetch you to your Father's house. Things present are your's, for your support on the road; things to come are your's, to enrich and regale you for ever at your journey's end. Note, If we belong to Christ, and are true to him, all good belongs to us, and is sure to us. All is rich, time and eternity, earth and heaven, life and death. We shall want no good thing, Ps. 84. 11. But it must be remembered, at the same time, that we are Christ's, the subjects of his kingdom, his property. He is Lord over us, and we must own his dominion, and cheerfully submit to his command, and yield ourselves to his pleasure, if we would have all things minister to our advantage. All things are ours, open no other foot than our being Christ's. Out of him we are without just title or claim to any thing that is good. Note, They that would be safe for time, and happy to eternity, must be Christ's. And Christ is God's. He is the Christ of God; anointed of God, and commissioned by him, to bear the office of a Mediator, and to act therein for the purposes of his glory. Note, All things are the believer's, that he might have honour in his great undertaking, and God in all might have the glory. God in Christ reconciling a sinful world to himself, and shedding abroad the riches of his grace on a reconciled world, is the sum and substance of the gospel.

CHAP. IV.

In this chapter, the apostle, I. Directs them how to account of him and his fellow-ministers, and therein, tacitly at least, reprobates their own lofty carriage toward him, v. 1. 6. II. He cautions them against pride and self-esteem; and hints at the many temptations they had to conceive too highly of themselves, and despise him, and other apostles, because of the great diversity in their circumstances and condition, v. 7. 13. III. He challenges their regard to him as their father in Christ, v. 14. 15. IV. He tells them of his having sent Timothy to them, and of his own purpose to come to them shortly, however some among them had pleased themselves, and grown vain, upon the quite contrary expectation, v. 17, to the end.

1. Let a man so account of us, as of the ministers of Christ, and stewards of the mysteries of God. 2. Moreover it is required in stewards, that a man be found faithful. 3. But with me it is a very small thing that I should be judged of you, or of man's judgment: yea, I judge not mine own self. 4. For I know nothing by myself; yet am I not hereby justified: but he that judgeth me is the Lord. 5. Therefore judge nothing before the time, until the Lord come, who both will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and will manifest the counsels of the hearts: and then shall every man have praise of God. 6. And these things, brethren, I have in a figure transferred to myself, and to Apollos for your sakes; that ye might learn in us not to think of men above that which is written, that no one of you be puffed up for one against another. Here, I. The apostle challenges the respect due to him on account of his character and office, in which many among them had at least very much failed; Let a man so account of us, as of the ministers of Christ, and stewards of the mysteries of God: (v. 1.) though possibly others might have valued him too highly, by setting him up as the head of a party, and professing to be his disciples. Note, In our opinion of ministers, as well as all other things, we should be careful to avoid extremes. Apostles themselves were not to be over-valued, for they were servants, not masters; stewards, not lords. They were servants of Christ, and no more, though they were servants of the highest rank, that had the care of his household, that were to provide food for the rest, and appoint and direct their work. Note, It is a very great abuse of their power, and highly criminal in common ministers, to lord it over their fellow-servants, and challenge authority over their faith or practice. For even apostles were but servants of Christ, employed in his work, and sent on his errand, and dispensers of the mysteries of God, or those truths which had been hidden from the world in ages and generations past. They had no authority to propagate their own fancies, but to spread Christian faith. 2. Apostles were not to be undervalued: for though they were ministers, they were ministers of Christ. The character and dignity of their Master put an honour on them. Though they are but stewards, they are not stewards of the common things of the world, but of God's mysteries. They had a great trust, and for that reason had an honourable office. They were stewards of God's household, high-stewards in his kingdom of grace. They did not set up for masters, but they deserved respect and esteem in this honourable service.

II. When they did their duty in it, and approved themselves as faithful; It is required in stewards, that a man be found faithful, (v. 2.) trust-worthy. The stewards in Christ's family must appoint what he hath appointed: they must not set their fellow-servants to work for themselves: they must not require any thing from them without their Master's warrant: they must not feed them with the chaff of their own inventions, instead of the wholesome food of Christian doctrine and truth: they must teach what he hath commanded, and not the doctrines and commandments of men: they must be true to the interest of their Lord, and consult his honour. Note, The ministers of Christ should make it their hearty and continual endeavour to approve themselves trust-worthy; and when they have the testimony of a good conscience and the approbation of their Master, they must slight the opinions and censures of their fellow-servants; But with me, saith the apostle, I do not think it any small thing that I should write you, or of man's judgment, v. 3. Indeed, reputation and esteem among men are a good step towards usefulness in the ministry; and Paul's whole argument upon this head, shews he had a just concern for his own reputation. But he that would make it his chief endeavour to please men, would hardly approve himself a faithful servant of Christ, Gal. 1. 10. He that would be faithful to Christ, must despise the censures of men for his sake. He must look upon it as a very little thing, (if his Lord approves him,) what judgment men form of him. They may think very meanly or very hardly of him, while he is doing his duty; but it is not by their judgment that he must stand or fall. And happy is it for faithful ministers, that they have a more just and candid Judge than their fellow-servants; one who knows and pities their imperfections, though he has less of his own. It is better to fall into the hands of God than into the hands of men, 2 Sam. 24. 14. The best of men are too apt to judge rashly and hardly and unjustly; but his judgment is always according to truth. It is a comfort that men are not to be our final judges. Nay, we are not thus to judge ourselves; Yea, I judge not myself. For though I know nothing by myself, I cannot charge myself with unfaithfulness, yet am I not thereby justified, this will not clear me of the charge; but he that judgeth me, is, the Lord. It is his judgment that must determine me. By his sentence I must abide. Such I am as he shall find and judge me to be. Note, It is not judging well of ourselves, justifying ourselves, that will prove us safe and happy. Nothing will do this, but the acceptance and approbation of an external Judge. Not he that commendeth himself, is approved, but he whom the Lord commendeth, 2 Cor. 10. 18.

III. The apostle takes occasion from hence to caution the Corinthians against censoriousness—forward and severe judging others; Therefore judge nothing before the time, until the Lord come, v. 5. It is judging out of season, and judging at an adventure. He does not condemn judging by persons in authority, within the very scope of their office, nor of private judging concerning facts that are notorious; but of judging person's future state, or the secret springs and principles of their actions, or about facts doubtful in themselves. To judge in these cases, and give decisive sentence, is to assume the seat of God, and challenge his prerogative. Note, How bold a sinner is the forward and severe censorious man, how ill-minded and arrogant is his censures! But there is one who will judge the consumer, and those he censures, without prejudice, passion, or partiality. And there is a time coming, when men cannot fail of judging right concerning themselves and others, by following his judgment. This should make them now cautious of judging others, and careful in judging themselves. There is a time coming, when the Lord will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and make manifest the secrets of the hearts; deeds of darkness that are now done in secret, and all the secret inclinations, purposes, and intentions, of the hidden man of the heart. Note, There is a day coming, that will lighten the darkness, and lay open the face of the deep; will fetch men's secret sins into open day, and discover the secrets of their hearts; The day shall declare it. The Judge will bring these things to light. The Lord Jesus Christ will bring all secrets to light, and all things to light, of all hearts. Note, The Lord Jesus Christ must have the knowledge of the counsels of the heart, else he could not make them manifest. This is a divine prerogative; (Jer. 17. 10.) and yet it is what our Saviour challenges to himself in a very peculiar manner, (Rev. 2. 23.) All the churches shall know that I am HE who searcheth the reins and hearts of the children of men, will set you free according to your works. Note, We should be careful how we censure others, when we have to do with a Judge from whom we cannot conceal ourselves. Others do not lie open to our notice, but we lie all open to his: and when he comes to judge, every man shall have praise of God. Every man, that is, every one qualified for it, every one who has done well. Though none of God's servants can deserve anything from him, though there be much that is blamable even in their best services, yet shall their fidelity be commended and crowned by him; and should they be condemned, reproached, or vilified, by their fellow-servants, he will roll away all such unjust censures and reproaches, and show them in their own amiable light. Note, Christians may well be patient under unjust censures, when they know such a day as this is coming; especially when they have the seal of his Spirit upon them, and are ratified over their integrity. But how fearful should they be of loading any with reproaches now, whom their common Judge shall hereafter commend!

IV. The apostle here lets us into the reason why he had used his own name and that of Apollo, in this discourse of his. He had done it in a figure, and he had done it for their sakes. He chose rather to mention his own name, and the name of his faithful fellow-servant, than to gloss over the common heads of factions among them, that hereby he might avoid what would provoke, and so procure his advice the greater regard. Note, Ministers should use prudence in their advices and admonitions, but especially in their reproofs, lest they lose their end. The advice the apostle would by this means inculcate, was, that they might learn not to think of men according to the flesh, but according to the will of God; another, (v. 6.) above what he had been writing. Apostles were not to be esteemed other than pillars or waterers in God's household, than master-builders in his building, than stewards of his mysteries, and servants of Christ. And common ministers cannot bear these characters in the same sense that apostles did. Note, We must be very careful not to transfer the honour and authority of the Master to his servant. We must call no man Master on earth; one is our Master, even Christ, Matt. 23. 8, 10. We must not think of them above what is written. Note, The word of God is the best rule by which to judge concerning men. And again, judging rightly concerning men, and not judging more of him by them than is fit, is one way to prevent quarrels and contentions in the churches. Pride commonly lies at the bottom of these quarrels. Self-conceit contributes very much to our immediate esteem of our teachers, as well as ourselves. Our commendation of our own taste and judgment commonly goes along with our unreasonable applause and always with a fictitious adherence to one teacher, in opposition to others that may be equally faithful and well qualified. But to think modestly of ourselves, and not above what is written of our teachers, is the most effectual means to prevent quarrels and contentions, sidings and parties, in the church. We shall not be puffed up for one against another, if we remember that they are all instruments employed by God in his husbandry and building, and endowed by him with their various talents and qualifications.

7. For who maketh thee to differ from another? And what hast thou that thou didst not receive? Now if thou didst receive it, why dost thou glory, as if thou hadst not received it? 8. Now ye are full, now ye are rich, ye have reigned as kings without us: and I would to God ye did reign, that we also might reign with you. 9. For I think that God hath set forth us apostles last, as it were appointed to death: for we are made a spectacle unto the world, and to angels, and to men. 10. We are fools for Christ's sake, but ye are wise in Christ; we are weak, but ye are strong; ye are honourable, but we are despised. 11. Even unto this present hour we both hunger, and thirst, and are naked, and are buffeted, and have no certain dwelling-place; 12. And labour, working with our own hands: being reviled, we bless: being persecuted, we suffer: 13. Being defamed, we entreat: we are made as the filth of the world, and are the out-scurring of all things unto this day.

Here the apostle improves the foregoing hint to a caution against pride and self-conceit, and sets forth the temptations the Corinthians had to despise him, from the difference of their circumstances.

1. He cautions them against pride and self-conceit, by this consideration, that all the distinction made among them was owing to God; Who maketh thee to differ? v. 7. And what hast thou that thou didst not receive? Held the apostle turns his discourse to the ministers, who set themselves at the head of these factions, and did but too much encourage and abet the people in these feuds. What had they to glory in, when all their peculiar gifts were from God? They had received them, and could not glory in them as their own, without wronging God. At the time when they reflected on them to feed their vanity, they should have considered them as so many debts and obligations to divide bounty and grace. It may be taken as a general maxim: We have no reason to be proud of our attainments, enjoyments, or performances; all that we have, or are, or do, that is good, is owing to the free and rich grace of God. Boasting is for ever excluded. There is nothing we have that we can properly call our own, all is received from God. It is foolish in us therefore, and injurious to him, to boast of it; they who receive all, should be proud of nothing, Ps. 115. 1. Beggars and dependents may glory in their supports; but to glory in themselves, is to be proud at once of meanness, impotence, and want. Note, Due attention to our obligations to divine grace would cure us of arrogance and self-conceit.

2. He presses the duty of humility upon them by a very smart irony, or at least reproves them for their pride and self-conceit; "Ye are full, ye are rich, ye have reigned as kings without us. Ye have not only a sufficiency, but an allusion, of spiritual gifts; nay, ye can make them the matter of your glory without us, in mine absence, and without having any need of me." There is a very elegant gradation from sufficiency to wealth, and from wealth to reigned; and through to reigned, in your own conceit; and I would to God ye did reign, that we also might reign with you. I wish ye had as much of the true glory of a Christian church upon you, as you arrogate to yourselves. I should come in then for a share of the honour; I should reign with you; I should not be overlooked by you as now I am, but valued and regarded as a minister of Christ, and a very useful instrument among you." Note, All men should consider themselves best, who think best of themselves, who have the highest opinion of themselves. The Corinthians might have reigned, and the apostle with them, if they had not been blown up with an imaginary royalty. Note, Pride is a great prejudice to our improvement. He is stepped from growing wiser or better, who thinks himself at the height, not only full, but perfect.

III. He comes to set forth his own circumstances, and those of the other apostles, and compares them with theirs.

1. To set forth the case of the apostles; For I think it hath pleased God to set forth us the apostles last, as it were appointed to death. For we are made a spectacle to the world, and to angels, and to men. Paul and his fellow-apostles were exposed to great hardships. Never were any men in this world so Christians were blamed by the abundance of their wisdom and spiritual gifts; which was a humour that prevailed among them, while the apostle was away from them, and made them forget what an interest he had in all. See how apt pride is to over-rate benefits, and overlook the benefactor, to swell upon its possessions, and forget from whom they come; for it is apt to behold them in a magnifying-glass. "Ye have reigned, and been so much praised, as is, in your own conceit; and I would to God ye did reign, that we also might reign with you. I wish ye had as much of the true glory of a Christian church upon you, as you arrogate to yourselves. I should come in then for a share of the honour; I should reign with you; I should not be overlooked by you as now I am, but valued and regarded as a minister of Christ, and a very useful instrument among you." Note, In the same manner, all men should consider themselves best, who think best of themselves, who have the highest opinion of themselves. The Corinthians might have reigned, and the apostle with them, if they had not been blown up with an imaginary royalty. Note, Pride is a great prejudice to our improvement. He is stepped from growing wiser or better, who thinks himself at the height, not only full, but perfect.

2. To set forth as their last circumstance, that God had set them down the apostles last, as it were appointed to death, v. 9. An allusion is made to some of the bloody spectacles in the Roman amphitheatres; where men were exposed to fight wild beasts, or to cut one another to pieces, to make diversion for the populace; where the victor did not escape with his life, though he should destroy his adversary, but was only reserved for another combat, and must be devoured or cut in pieces at last. So that such wretched criminals (for they were ordinarily condemned persons that were thus exposed) might very properly be called "imperfect persons, devoted or appointed to death. They are said to be set forth last, because the meridian gladiators, those who combatted one another in the after-part of the day, were most exposed, being obliged to fight naked. So that (as Scripture saith) they were partakers of butchery; and those exposed to beasts in the morning, were treated mercifully, in comparison of these. The general meaning is, that the apostles were exposed to continual danger of death, and that of the worst kinds, in the faithful discharge of their office.
God had set them forth, brought them into view, as the Roman emperors brought their combatants into the arena, the place of shew, though not for the same purposes. They did it, to please the populace, and humour their own vanity, and sometimes a much worse principle. The apostles were shown, to manifest the power of divine grace, to lead to the true end of their mission and aim, and to propagate religion in the world. These were ends worthy of God; noble views, fit to animate them to the combat. But they had like difficulties to encounter, and were in a manner as much exposed as these miserable Roman criminals. Note, The office of an apostle was, as an honourable, so a hard and hazardous one; For we are made a spectacle to the world, and to angels, and to men, v. 10. A spectacle to the world, as having more of glory, and might cut to the public view of the world. Angels and men are witnesses to our persecutions, sufferings, patience, and magnanimity. They all see that we suffer for our fidelity to Christ, and how we suffer; how great and imminent are our dangers, and how bravely we encounter them; how sharp our sufferings, and how patiently we endure them, by the power of divine grace and our Christian principles. It was easy to succumb to this hazard and hardship, and is hazardous, but glorious. God will have honour from us, religion will be credited by us. The world cannot but see and wonder at our undaunted resolution, our invincible patience and constancy. And how contentedly could they be exposed, both to sufferings and scorn, for the honour of their Master! Note, The faithful ministers and disciples of Christ should contentedly undergo any thing for his sake and honour.

2. He compares his own case with that of the Corinthians; We are fools for Christ's sake, but ye are wise in Christ; we are weak, but ye are strong; ye are honourable, but we are despised, v. 10. We are fools for Christ's sake; such in common account, and we are well content to be so accounted. We can pass for fools in the world, and be despised as such; so that the wisdom of God and the honour of the gospel be by this means secured and displayed.

Note, Faithful ministers can bear being despised, so that the wisdom of God and the power of his grace be thereby displayed. But ye are wise in Christ. Ye have the fame of being wise and learned Christians, and ye do not a little value yourselves upon it. We are under disgrace for delivering the plain truths of the gospel, and in as plain a manner: ye are in reputation for your eloquence and human wisdom, which is a great honour to you; but if we were not for wise men in Christ, we are weak, but ye are strong. We are suffering for Christ's sake, so being weak plainly signifies, 2 Cor. 12. 10. "when ye are in easy and flourishing circumstances."

Note, All Christians are not alike exposed. Some suffer greater hardships than others, who are yet engaged in the same warfare. The standard-bearers in an army are most struck at. They are expected to bear the critical and dangerous conflicts by the first and greatest sufferers. Or else, We pass upon the world for persons of but mean endowments, very striplings in Christianity; but ye look upon yourselves, and are looked upon by others, as men, as those of a much more advanced growth and confirmed strength. Note, They are not always the greatest proficients in Christianity, who think thus of themselves, or pass for such upon others. It is but too easy and common for self-slug to commit such a mistake. The Corinthians may think themselves, and be esteemed by others, as wiser and stronger men in Christ than the apostles themselves. But O! how gross is the mistake! IV. He enters into some particularities of their sufferings; Even to this present hour; that is, after all the service we have been having among you and other churches, we both hunger and thirst, and are naked, and are buffeted, and have no certain dwelling-place; and labour, working with our own hands, v. 11, 12. Nay, they were made as the fifth of the world, and off-scouring of all things, v. 13. They were forced to labour with their own hands, to get subsistence, and had so much, and so much greater, want and distress, that they would not have been contented, if they were not brought to this condition, to get a comfortable livelihood, but were exposed to hunger, thirst, and nakedness; many times where, and drink, and clothes. They were driven about the world, without having any fixed abode, any stated habitation. Poor circumstances, indeed, for the prime ministers of our Saviour's kingdom, to have no house nor home, and to be destitute of food and raiment! But yet no poorer than his, who had no house to lodge in, and was not permitted to enter the house of his friends, and was not allowed to sit at the board. O glorious charity and devotion, that would carry them through all these hardships! How ar SOOly did they love God, how vehemently did they thirst for the salvation of souls! Their's was voluntary, it was pleasing poverty. They thought they had a rich amends for all the outward good things they wanted, if they might but serve Christ, and save souls. Nay, though they were made the fifth of the world, the off-scouring of all things, destitute of the fruits of the world, they were treated as men not fit to live, παρακαταστατα. It is reasonably thought by the critics, that an allusion is here made to a common custom of many Heathen nations, to offer men in sacrifice, in a time of pestilence, or other like grievous calamity. These were ordinarily the vilest of men, persons of the lowest rank and worst character. Thus, in the first ages, Christians were counted the source of all public calamities, and were sacrificed to the people's rage, if not to appease their angry deities. And apostles could not meet with better usage. They suffered in their persons and characters as the very worst and vilest men; as the most proper to make such a sacrifice: or else as the very dirt of the world, that was to be swept away: nay, as the off-scouring of all things, the dust, the filings of all things. They were the common sewer into which all the reproaches of the world were to be poured. To be the off-scouring of any thing, is bad; but what is it to be the off-scouring of all things? How much did the apostles resemble their Master, and fill up that which was behind of his afflictions, for his body's sake, which is the church? Col. 1. 24. They suffered for him, and they suffered after his example. Thus poor and despised was he in his life and ministry. And have no where to lay his head. If this, then Christ must prepare for the same poverty and contempt. Note, They may be very dear to God, and honourable in his esteem, whom men may think unworthy to live, and use and scorn as the very dirt and refuse of the world. God seeth not as man seeth, 1 Sam. 16. 7.

V. We have here the apostles' behaviour under all; and the return they made for this maltreatment. Being reviled, we bless; being persecuted, we suffer it; being defamed, we entreat. They returned blessings for reproaches, and entreaties and kind exhortations for the rudest slanders and defamation; and were patient under the sharpest persecutions. Note, The disciples of Christ, and especially his ministers, should hold fast their integrity, and keep a good conscience, whatever opposition or hardships they meet with from the world. Whatever they suffer from men, they must not be false, and full of the good works and precepts of their Lord. They must be content, with him and for him, to be despised and abused.

14. I write not these things to shame you, but as my beloved sons I warn you. 15. For though ye have ten thousand instructors in Christ, yet have ye not many fathers; for in Christ Jesus I have begotten you through the gospel. 16. Wherefore I beseech you, be ye followers of me.

Here Paul challenges their regard to him as their father. He tells them, 1. That what he had written was not for their reproach, but admonition; not with the gall of an enemy, but the bowels of a father; (v. 1.) 2. That he should warn you, but as my beloved children I warn you. Note, In reproof for sin, we should have a tender regard to the reputation, as well as the reformation, of the sinner. We should aim to distinguish between them and their sins, and take care not to discover any spite against them ourselves, nor expose them to contempt and reproach in the world. Reproves that expose, commonly do but exasperate; when those that kindly and affectionately rebuke, are reproved, and we turn against them. When the affections of a father mingle with the admonitions of a minister, it is to be hoped that they may at once melt and mend: but to lash like an enemy or executioner, will provoke, and render obstinate. To expose to open shame, is but the way to render shameless. 2. He shews them upon what foundation he claimed paternal relation to them, and calls them his sons. They might be as far from the pedagogues or instructors, but he was their father; for in Christ Jesus he had begotten them by the gospel; v. 15. They were made Christians by his ministry. He had laid the foundation of a church among them. Others could only build upon it. Whatever other teachers they had, he was their spiritual father. He first brought them off from Pagan idolatry to the faith of the gospel and the worship of the true and living God. He was the instrument of their new birth, and therefore claimed the relation of a father to them, and felt the bowels of a father toward them. Note, There commonly is, and always ought to be, an endearcd affection between faithful ministers and those they beget in Christ Jesus through the gospel. They should love like parents and children. 3. We have here the special advice he urges on them; Wherefore I beseech you, be ye followers of me, v. 16. This he elsewhere explains and limits, (ch. 11. 1.) "Be ye followers of me, as I also am of Christ. Follow me as far as I follow Christ. Come up as close as ye can to my example in those instances wherein I endeavour to copy after his pattern. Be my disciples, as far as I manifest myself to be a faithful minister and disciple of Christ, and no farther. I would not have you be my disciples, but his. But I hope I have apprehended myself a faithful steward of the mysteries of Christ, and a faithful servant to his master. Whence the affections of a father mingle with the admonitions of a minister, it is to be hoped that they may at once melt and mend: but to lash like an enemy or executioner, will provoke, and render obstinate. To expose to open shame, is but the way to render shameless.

17. For this cause have I sent unto you Timotheus, who is my beloved son, and faithful in the Lord, who shall bring you into remembrance of my ways which are in Christ, as I teach every where in every church. 18. Now some are puffed up, as though I would not come to you. 19. But I will come to you shortly, if the Lord will; and will know, not the speech of them who are puffed up, but the power. 20. For the kingdom of God is not in word, but in power. 21. What will ye? Shall I come unto you with a rod, or in love, and in the spirit of meekness?
men, by plausible reasonings or florid discourses, but by the external power of the Holy Spirit, in miraculous operations at first, and the powerful influence of divine truth on the minds and manners of men. Note, It is a good way in the general church to avoid the effects of it upon men’s hearts to be truly divine. That is most likely to come from God, which in its own nature is most fit, and in event is found, to produce most likeness to God; to spread piety and virtue, to change men’s hearts, and mend their manners.

IV. He puts it to their choice, how he should come among them, whether with a rod, or in love, and the spirit of meekness; (v. 21.) That is, according as they were, they would find him. If they continued perverse among themselves and with him, it would be necessary to come with a rod; that is, to exert his apostolical power in chastising them, by making some examples, and inflicting some diseases and corporal punishments, or by other censures for their faults. Note, Stubborn offenders must be used with severity. In families, in Christian communities, paternal pity and tenderness, Christian love and compassion, will sometimes force the use of the rod. But this is far from being desirable, if it may be prevented. And therefore the apostle adds, that it was in their own option whether he should come with a rod, or in a quite different disposition and manner: or in love and the spirit of meekness. As much as if he had said, “Take warning, cease your unchristian feuds, rectify the abuses among you, and return to your duty, and ye shall find me as gentle and benign as ye can wish. It will be a force upon my inclination to proceed with severity. I had rather come and display the tenderness of a father among you, than assert his authority. Do but your duty, and ye have no reason to avoid my presence.” Note, It is a happy temper in a minister, to have the spirit of love and meekness predominant, and yet to maintain his just authority.

CHAP. V.

In this chapter, the apostle, I. Blames them for their indulgence in the case of the incestuous person, and orders him to be excommunicated, and delivered to Satan, v. 1–6. II. He assigns them the Christian sanction, for resisting the old leaven, v. 7, 8. And, III. Directs them to shun even the common conversation of Christians who were guilty of any notorious and flagitious wickedness, v. 9, to the end.

1. It is reported commonly, that there is fornication among you, and such fornication as is not so much as named among the Gentiles, that one should have sinned against his father’s wife. 2. And ye are puffed up, and have not another mourned, that he hath done this deed may be taken away from you. 3. For I verily, as absent in body, but present in spirit, have judged already, as though I were present, concerning him that hath so done this deed; 4. For in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, when ye are gathered together, and my spirit, with the power of our Lord Jesus Christ, 5. To deliver such an one unto Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus. 6. Your glorying is not good. Know ye not that a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump? Here the apostle states the case; and,

I. Let them know what was the common or general report concerning them, that one of their community was guilty of fornication, v. 1. It was told in all places, to their dishonour, and the reproach of Christians. And it was the more reproachful, because it was he that should be the best judge of whether the effects of it upon men’s hearts be truly divine. That is most likely to come from God, which in its own nature is most fit, and in event is found, to produce most likeness to God; to spread piety and virtue, to change men’s hearts, and mend their manners.

IV. He puts it to their choice, how he should come among them, whether with a rod, or in love, and the spirit of meekness; (v. 21.) That is, according as they were, they would find him. CHAP. V.

In this chapter, the apostle, I. Blames them for their indulgence in the case of the incestuous person, and orders him to be excommunicated, and delivered to Satan, v. 1–6. II. He assigns them the Christian sanction, for resisting the old leaven, v. 7, 8. And, III. Directs them to shun even the common conversation of Christians who were guilty of any notorious and flagitious wickedness, v. 9, to the end.

1. It is reported commonly, that there is fornication among you, and such fornication as is not so much as named among the Gentiles, that one should have sinned against his father’s wife. 2. And ye are puffed up, and have not another mourned, that he hath done this deed may be taken away from you. 3. For I verily, as absent in body, but present in spirit, have judged already, as though I were present, concerning him that hath so done this deed; 4. For in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, when ye are gathered together, and my spirit, with the power of our Lord Jesus Christ, 5. To deliver such an one unto Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus. 6. Your glorying is not good. Know ye not that a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump? Here the apostle states the case; and,
IV. He hints the danger of contagion from this example; Your glorying is not good. Know ye not that a little leaven leaventh the whole lump? The bad example of a man in rank and reputation is very mischievous; spreads the contagion far and wide. It did so, probably, in this very church and case: see 2 Cor. 12. 21. They could not be ignorant of this. The experience of the whole world was for it; one scabbed sheep infects a whole flock. A little leaven will quickly spread the ferment through a great lump. Note, Concern for their purity and preservation should engage Christian churches to remove gross and scandalous sinners.

IV. Purge out therefore the old leaven, that ye may be a new lump, as ye are unleavened. For even Christ our Passover is sacrificed for us: Therefore let us keep the feast, not with old leaven, neither with the leaven of malice and wickedness; but with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth.

Here the apostle exhorts them to purity, by purging out the old leaven. In which observe,

1. The advice itself; addressed either, (1.) To the church in general, and (2.) To the members of that church, and the old leaven, that they might be a new lump, refers to the flutting away from themselves that wicked person, v. 13. Note, Christian churches should be pure and holy, and not bear such corrupt and scandalous members. They are to be unleavened, and should endure no such heterogeneous mixture to sour and corrupt them. Or, (2.) To each particular member of the church. And so it implies, that they should purge themselves from all iniquity of heart and life, especially from this kind of wickedness, to which the Corinthians were addicted to a proverb. See the argument at the beginning. This old leaven was in a particular manner to be purged out, that they might become a new lump. Note, Christians should be careful to keep themselves clean, as well as purge polluted members out of their society. And they should especially avoid the sight of which they themselves are more or less addicted, and the lurking vices of the places and people where they live. They were also to purge themselves from malice and wickedness; all ill-will and mischievous subtlety. This is leaven that sour the mind to a great degree. It is not improbable that this was intended as a check to some who gloried in the scandalous behaviour of the offender, both out of pride and pique. Note, Christians should be particularly careful to keep free from malice and mischief. Love is the very essence and life of the Christian religion. It is the fairest image of God, for God is Love; (1 John 4. 16.) and it is no wonder if it be the greatest beauty and ornament of a Christian. But malice is murder in its principles; He that hates his brother, is a murderer; (1 John 3. 15.) he bears the image, and proclaims the being, of him who was a murderer from the beginning, John 8. 44. How hateful should every thing be to a Christian, that looks like malice and mischief.

2. The reason with which this advice is enforced. For Christ our Passover is sacrificed for us, v. 7. This is the great doctrine of the gospel. The Jews, after they had killed the passover, kept the feast of unleavened bread. So must we; not for seven days only, but all our days. We should die with our Saviour to sin; be planted into the likeness of his death, by mortifying sin; and into the likeness of his resurrection, by rising again to newness of life, and that internal and external. We must have new hearts, and lead new lives. Note, The whole life of a Christian must be a feast of unleavened bread. His common conversation and his religious performances must be holy. He must purge out the old leaven, and keep the feast with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth. He must be without guilt in his conduct toward God and man. And the more there is of sincerity in our own profession, the less shall we censures that of others. Note, on the whole, The sacrifice of our Redeemer is the strongest argument against hypocrisy and sincerity. He has a sincere regard did he shew to our welfare, in dying for us! And how terrible a proof was his death, of the detestable nature of sin, and God's displeasure against it! Heinous evil, that could not be expiated but with the blood of the Son of God! And shall a Christian love the murderer of his Lord? God forbid.

9. I wrote unto you in an epistle not to company with fornicators. 10. Yet not altogether with the fornicators of this world, or with the covetous, or extortioners, or with idolaters; for then must ye needs go out of the world. 11. But now I have written unto you not to keep company, if any man that is called a brother be a fornicator, or covetous, or an idolater, or a raider, or a drunkard, or an extortioner; with such an one, no not to eat. 12. For what have I to do to judge them also that are without? Do not ye judge them that are within? 13. But them that are without God judgeth. Therefore put away from among yourselves that wicked person.

Here the apostle advises them to shun the company and converse of scandalous professors. In which consider,

1. The advice itself; I wrote to you in a letter, not to company with fornicators, v. 9. Some think this was an epistle written to them before, which is lost. Yet we have lost nothing by it, the Christian revelation being entire in those books of scripture which are come down to us, which are all the more intended by God for the general use of Christians, or he could and would in his providence have preserved more of the writings of inspired men. Some think it is to be understood of this very epistle, that he had written this advice before he had full information of their whole case, but thought it needful now to be more particular. And therefore on this occasion he tells them, that if any man called a brother, any one professing Christianity, and brought a member of a Christian church, were a fornicator, or covetous, or an idolater, or a raider, that they should not keep company with him, not so much as eat with such a one. They were to avoid all familiarity with him; they were to have no commerce with him: but, that they might shame him, and bring him to repentance, must disclaim and shun him. Note, Christians are to avoid the familiar conversation of fellow-Christians that are notoriously wicked, and under just censure for their flagitious practices. Such disgrace the Christian name. They may call themselves brethren in Christ, but they are not Christian brethren. They are only fit companions for their brethren in iniquity; and to such company they should be left, till they mend their ways and do better.

2. He limits this advice. He does not forbid Christians the like commerce with scandalously wicked heathens. He does not forbid them eating or conversing with the fornicators of this world, &c. They know no better. They profess no better. The gods they serve, and the worship they render to many of them, countenance such wickedness. "You must needs go out of the world, if you will have no conversation with such men. Your Gentile neighbours are generally vicious and profane; and it is impossible, as long as you are in the world, and have any worldly business to do, but you must fall into their company. This cannot be wholly avoided." Note, Christians may and ought to testify more respect to loose worldlings than to loose Christians. This seems a paradox. Why should we shun the company of a profane or loose Christian rather than that of a profane or loose heathen?

3. The reason of this limitation is here assigned. It is impossible the one should be avoided. Christians must have gone out of the world, to avoid the company of loose heathens. But this was impossible, as long as they had business in the world. While they are mind ing their duty, and doing their proper business, God can and will preserve them from contagion. Besides, they carry an antidote against the infection of their bad example, and are naturally upon the guard. They are apt to have a horror at their wicked practices. But the dread of sin wears off by familiar converse with wicked Christians. Our own safety and preservation are a reason of this difference. But besides, heathens were such as Christians had nothing to do, to judge and censure, and avoid, upon a censure past; for they are without, (v. 12.) and must be left to God's judgment, v. 13. But as to members of the church, they are within, are professedly bound by the laws and rules of Christianity, and not only liable to the judgment of God, but to the censures of those who are set over them, and the fellow-members of the same body, when they transgress these rules. Every Christian is bound to judge them unfit for communion and familiar converse. They are to be punished, by having this mark of disgrace put upon them, that they may be ashamed, and, if possible, reclaimed thereby: and the more, because the sins of such much more dishonour God than the sins of the openly wicked and profane can do. The church therefore is obliged to clear herself from all confederacy with them, or connivance at them, and to bear testimony against their wicked practices. Note, Though the church has nothing to do with those without, it must endeavour to keep clear of the guilt and reproach of those within.

4. He applies the argument to the case before him; "Therefore put away from among yourselves that wicked person, v. 13. Cast him out of your fellowship, and avoid his conversation."

CHAP. VI.

In this chapter, the apostle, 1. Reproves them for going to law with one another about small matters, and bringing the cause before heathen judges, v. 1. 8. II. He takes occasion hence to warn them against many gross sins, to which they are prone, and to enforce good advice, v. 9. 11. And, having cautioned them against the abuse of their liberty, he vehemently dehorts them from fornication, by various arguments, v. 12, to the end.

1. DARE any of you, having a matter against another, go to law before the unjust, and not before the saints? 2. Do ye not know that the saints shall judge the world? And if the world shall be judged by you, are ye unworthy to judge the smallest matters? 3. Know ye not that we shall judge angels? How much more things that pertain to this life! 4. If then ye have judgments of things pertaining to this life, set them to judge, who are least esteemed in the church. 5. I speak to your shame. Is it so, that there is not a wise man among you, no, not one that shall be able to judge between his brethren? 6. But brother goeth to law with brother, and that before the unbelievers. 7. Now therefore there is utterly a fault among you, because ye go to law with one another. Why do ye not rather take wrong? Why do ye not rather suffer yourselves to be defrauded? 8. Nay, ye do wrong, and defraud, and that your brethren.

Here the apostle reproves them for going to law with one another before heathen judges for little matters; and therein blames all vexatious law-suits. In the chapter before he had directed them to punish heinous sins among themselves by church-censures. Here he directs them to determine controversies with one another by church-counsel and advice. Concerning which observe,

I. The fault he blames them for; it was going to law. Not but that the law is good, if a man uses it lawfully. But, 1. Brother offended, as Solomon says, is harder to be won than a strong city; their contentions are like the bars of a castle, Prov. 18. 19. Note, Christians should not contend with one another, for they are brethren. This, duly attended to, would prevent law-suits, and put an end to quarrels and litigations. 2. They brought the matter before the heathen magistrates; they went to law before the unjust, not before the saints; (v. 1.) brought the controversy before unbelievers, (v. 6.) and did not compose it among themselves, Christians and saints, at least in profession. This tended much to the reproach of Christianity. It published at once their folly and unpeaceableness; whereas they pretended to be the children of wisdom, and the followers of the Lamb, the meek and lowly Jesus, the Prince of Peace. And therefore, says the apostle, "Dare any of you, having a controversy with another, go to law, implicate him, bring the matter to a hearing before the unjust?"

Note, Christians should not dare to do any thing that tends to the reproach of their Christian name and profession. 3. Here is at least an intimation that the Christian should be the last of all, the least of all, who would litigate. There is no matter of less value. For the apostle blames them, that they did not take wrong rather than go to law, (v. 7.) which must be understood of matters not very important. In matters of great damage to ourselves or families, we may use lawful means to right ourselves. We are not bound to sit down, and suffer the injury tamely, without stirring for our own relief; but in matters of small consequence, it is better to go to law. Christians should not be in a forgiving temper. And it is more for their ease and honour to suffer small injuries and inconveniences, than seem to be contentious.

II. He lays before them the aggravations of their fault; Do not ye know that the saints shall judge the world, (v. 2.) shall judge angels? v. 3. And are they unworthy to judge the smallest matters; the things of this life? The world doth judge, as though the Christians should forget the real dignity of the saints, for them to carry little matters, about the things of life, before heathen magistrates. When they were to judge the world, nay, to judge angels, it is unaccountable that they could not determine little controversies among one another. By judging the world and angels, some think, is to be understood, their being assessors to Christ in the great judgment-day; it being said of our Saviour's disciples, that they should at that day sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel, Matt. 19. 28. And elsewhere we read of our Lord's coming with ten thousand of his saints to execute judgment on all, Isa. 11. 9. He will come to judgment with his saints, and the peoples of the earth; and they shall be judged, as in v. 31—41.) but they may first be acquitted, and then advanced to the bench, to approve and applaud the righteous judgment of Christ both on men and angels. In no other sense can they be judges. They are not partners in the Lord's commission, but they have the honour to sit by, and see his proceeding against the wicked world, and approve it. Others understand this judging, as that to which the saints are appointed, when the empire should become Christian. But it does not appear that the Corinthians had knowledge of the empire's becoming Christian; and if they had, in what sense could Christian emperors be said to judge angels? Others understand it of their condemning the world by their faith and practice, and casting out evil angels by miraculous power, which was not confined to the first ages, or to the apostles. The first sense seems to be most natural; and at the same time, it gives the utmost force to the argument. "Shall Christians have the honour to sit with the sovereign Judge at the last day, whilst he passes judgment on sinful men and evil angels, and are they not worthy to judge of the trifles about which you contend before heathen magistrates? Cannot they make up your mutual differences? Why must you bring them before heathen judges? When you are to judge them, is it fit to appeal to their judicature? Must you, about the affairs of this life, set them to judge, who are of no esteem in the church?"

So some read, and perhaps most properly, (v. 4.) heathen magistrates, ἐπίσκοποι, the things that are not, ch. 1. 28. "Must they be called in to judge in your controversies, of whom you ought to entertain so low an opinion? Is not this shameful?" v. 5. Some who read it as our translation, gives it this unusual sense; If you have such controversies depending, set them to judge, who are of least esteem among yourselves. The meanness of your own members are able surely to determine these disputes. Refer the matters in variance to any, rather than go to law about them before heathen judges. They are trifles not worth contending about, and may easily be decided, if you have first conquered your own spirits, and brought them into a true Christian temper. Bear and forbear, and the more meek and lowly Jesus, the Prince of Peace, and you shall be able to judge.

III. He puts them on a method to remedy this fault. And this twofold. 1. By referring it to some to make it up; Is it so, that there is no wise man among you, no one that can judge between his brethren? v. 5. You who want wisdom, ask it of above, which upon your wisdom and knowledge, who are so puffed up upon your extraordinary gifts and endowments; is there none among you fit for this office, none that has wisdom enough to judge in these differences? Must brethren quarrel, and the heathen magistrate judge, in a church so famous as your's for knowledge and wisdom! It is a reproach to us, not that we run so high, and none of your wise men interpose, or give an opinion. Christians should never engage in law-suits, till all other remedies are tried in vain. Prudent Christians should prevent, if possible, their disputes, and not courts of judicature decide them, especially in matters of no great importance. 2. By suffering wrong, rather than taking this method to right themselves; It is utterly a fault among you, to go to law in this matter; it is a fault of one side always, to go to law, except in a case where the title is indeed dubious, and there is a friendly agreement of both parties to refer it to the judgment of those learned in the law, to decide it. And this is referring it, rather than contending about it, which is the thing the apostle here seems chiefly to condemn; Should you not rather take wrong, rather suffer yourselves to be defrauded? Note, A Christian should rather put up with a little injury than tease himself, and provoke others, by a litigious contest. The pride of his own mind, and the calm of his neighbourhood, are more worth than victory in such a contest, or reclaiming his own right; especially when the quarrel must be decided by those who are enemies to religion. But the apostle tells them, they were so far from bearing injuries, that they actually did wrong, and defrauded, and that their brethren. Note, It is utterly a fault, to wrong and defraud any; but it is an egregious fault, to defraud our Christian brethren. The ties of mutual love ought to be stronger between them than between others. And love worketh no ill to his neighbour, Rom. 13. 10. Those who love the brotherhood, can never, under the influence of this principle, hurt or injure them.

9. Know ye not that the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God? Be not deceived: neither fornicators, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, nor effeminate, nor abusers of themselves with mankind, 10. Nor thieves, nor covetous, nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor extortioners, shall inherit the kingdom of God. 11. And such were some of you: but ye are washed, but ye are sanctified, but ye are justified in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God.

Here he takes occasion to warn them against many heinous evils, to which they had been formerly addicted. 1. He puts it to them as a plain truth, of which they could not be ignorant, that such sinners should not inherit the kingdom of God. The meanest among them must know thus much, that the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God, (v. 9.) shall not be owned as true members of his church on earth, nor admitted as glorious members of the church in heaven. All unrighteousness is sin; and all reigning sin, nay every actual sin, committed deliberately, but in a manner that is the habit of the kingdom of heaven. He specifies several sorts of sins against the first and second commandments, as idolaters; against the seventh, as adulterers, fornicators, effeminates, and sodomites; against the eighth, as thieves and extortioners, that by force or fraud wrong their neighbours; against the ninth, as revilers; and against the tenth, as covetous and drunkards, as those who are in a fair way to break all the rest. Those who know these, and know that they are guilty of them, must know that heaven could never be intended for these. The scum of the earth are no ways fit to fill the heavenly mansions. They who do the Devil’s work, can never receive God’s wages, at least no other than death, the just wages of sin, Rom. 6. 23.

2. Yet he warns them against deceiving themselves: Be not deceived. Those who cannot but know the fore-mentioned truths, are but too apt not to attend to it. Men are very much inclined to flatter themselves, that God is such a one as themselves; and that they may live in sin, and yet die in Christ; may lead the life of the Devil’s children, and yet go to heaven with the children of God. But this is all a gross cheat. Note, It is very much the concern of mankind, that they do not cheat themselves in the matters of their souls. We cannot hope to sow to the flesh, and yet reap everlasting life.

3. He puts them in mind what a change the gospel and grace of God had made in them; Such were some of you; (v. 11.) such notorious sinners as he had been reckoning up. The Greek word is πριν. Such things were some of you, very monsters rather than men. Note, Some that are eminently good after their conversion, have been as remarkably wicked before. Quantum mutatus ab illo! How glorious a change does grace make! It changes the vilest of men into saints and the children of God. Such were some of you, but you are not what you were. Ye are washed, ye are sanctified, ye are justified in the name of Christ, and by the Spirit of our God. Note, The wickedness of men before conversion is no bar to their regeneration, and reconciliation to God. The blood of Christ, and the washing of regeneration, can purge away all guilt and defilement. Here is a rhetorical change of the natural order; Ye are sanctified, ye are justified. Sanctification is mentioned before justification: and yet the name of Christ, by which we are justified, is placed before the Spirit of God, by whom we are sanctified. Our justification is owing to the merit of Christ; our sanctification, to the operation of the Spirit: but both go together. Now, None are cleansed from the guilt of sin, and reconciled to God through Christ, but those who are also sanctified by his Spirit. All who are made righteous in the sight of God, are made holy by the grace of God.

12. All things are lawful unto me, but all things are not expedient: all things are lawful for me, but I will not be brought under the power of any. 13. Meats for the belly, and the belly for meats: but God shall destroy both it and them. Now the body is not for fornication, but for the Lord; and the Lord for the body. 14. And God hath both raised up the Lord, and will also raise us up by his own power. 15. Know ye not, that your bodies are the members of Christ? Shall I then take the members of Christ, and make them the members of an harlot? God forbid. 16. What, know ye not that he who is joined to a harlot, is one body? For two, saith he, shall be one flesh. 17. But he that is joined unto the Lord is one spirit. 18. Flee fornication. Every sin that a man doth is without the body: but he that committeth fornication sinneth against his own body. 19. What, know ye not that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost which is in you, which ye have of God, and ye are not your own? 20. For ye are bought with a price: therefore glorify God in your body, and in your spirit, which are God’s.

The twelfth and former part of the thirteenth verse seem to relate to that early dispute among Christians, about the distinction of meats, and yet to be preatory to the caution that follows against fornication. The connexion seems plain enough, if we attend to the famous determination of the apostles, Acts 13, where the prohibition of certain foods was joined with that of fornication. Now some among the Corinthians seem to have imagined that they were as much at liberty in the point of fornication as of meats, especially because it was not a sin con denned by the laws of their country. They were ready to say, even in the case of fornication, All things are lawful for me. This pernicious conceit St. Paul here sets himself to oppose: he tells them that many things, lawful in themselves, were not explicitly or necessarily commanded or forbidden by circumstances: and Christians should not barely consider what was in itself lawful to be done, but what was fit for them to do, considering their profesion, character, relations, and hopes: they should be very careful, that by carrying this maxim too far, they were not brought into bondage, either to a crafty deceiver or a carnal inclination. All things are lawful for me, says he, but I will not be brought into the some mention this text as an argument against -selling to a harlot, v. 15. And the Lord is for body, to have property in it, and destruction over it, having assumed a body, and been made to partake of our nature, that lie might be Head of his church, and Head over all things, Heb. 2. 5, 18.
Note, We must take care, that we do not use what belongs to Christ, as if it were our own, and much less to his dishonour. Some understand this last passage, The Lord is for the body, thus, He is for its resurrection, according to what follows, v. 14. Which is a Second argument against this sin, the honour intended to be put on our bodies; God hath both raised us our Lord, and will raise us by his power;
v. 14.) by the power of him who shall change our vile body, and make it like to his glorious body, by that power whereby he is able to subdue all things to himself, Phil. 3. 21. It is an honour done to the body, to receive this body, though it be a harlot; though our bodies now be dishonourable, yet they will be an honour to our bodies, that they will be raised. Let us not abuse those bodies by sin, and make them vile, which, if they be kept pure, shall, notwithstanding their present vileness, be made like to Christ's glorious body. Note, The hopes of a resurrection to glory should restrain Christians from dishonouring their bodies by fleshly lusts.
A Third argument is the honour already put on them; Know ye not that your bodies are the members of Christ? v. 15. If the soul be united to Christ by faith, the whole man is become a member of his mystical body. The body is in union with Christ as well as the soul. How honourable is this to the Christian!
His very flesh is a part of the mystical body of Christ.
Note, It is good to know in what honourable relations
we stand, that we may endeavour to become them.
But now, says the apostle, shall I take the members of Christ, and make them members of a harlot?
God forbid. Or take away the members of Christ?
Were not this a gross abuse, and the most notorious injury? Is it not dishonouring Christ, and disho-nourishing ourselves to the very last degree? What?
make Christ's members the members of a harlot, prostitute them to so vile a use! The thought is to be abhorred. God forbid. Know ye not, that he who is joined to a harlot, is one body with her? For God says, he shall be one flesh. But he who is joined to the Lord, is one spirit, v. 16, 17. Nothing can stand in greater opposition to the honourable relations and alliances of a Christian man, than this sin. He is joined to the Lord in union with Christ, and made partaker by faith of his Spirit. One spirit lives and breathes and moves in the head and members. Christ and his faithful disciples are one, John 17. 21, 22.
And the thought that is raised to a harlot, is one body shall be one flesh, by carnal conjunction, which was ordained of God only to be in a married state.
Now shall one in so close a union with Christ as to be one spirit with him, yet be so united to a harlot as to be one flesh with her? Is not this a vile attempt to make a union between Christ and harlots? And can a greater indignity be offered to him or ourselves?
Is there any harm done to our profession or relation?
Note, The sin of fornication is a great injury in a Christian to his Head and Lord, and a great reproach and blot on his profession. It is no wonder therefore that the apostle should say, "Flee fornication, (v. 18.) avoid it, keep out of the reach of temptations to it, of provoking objects. Direct the eyes and mind to other things and thoughts."
Other vices may be conquered in flight, this only by flight: so speak many of the fathers.

A Fourth argument is, that it is a sin against our own bodies; Every sin that a man doeth is without the body; and therefore fourthly, he should improve it against his own body; (v. 18.) every sin, that is, every other sin, every external act of sin besides, is without the body. It is not so much an abuse of the body as of somewhat else, as wine by the drunkard, food by the glutton, &c. Nor does it give the power of the body to another person. Nor does it so much tend to the reproach of the body, and to render it vile. This sin is in a peculiar manner styled uncleanness, pollution; because no sin hath so much external imputation in it, especially in a Christian. He sins against his own body; he defiles it, he degrades it, making it one with the body of that vile creature with whom he sins. He casts vile reproach on what his Redeemer has dignified to the last degree, by taking it into union with himself. Note, We should not make our present vile bodies more vile by sinning against them.

The Fifth argument against this sin, is, that the bodies of Christians are the temples of the Holy Ghost which is in them, and which they have of God, v. 19. He that is joined to Christ, is one Spirit. He is yielded up to him, is consecrated thereby, and set apart for his use, and is here upon possessed, and occupied, and inhabited, by his Holy Spirit. This is the proper notion of a temple—a place where God dwells, and sacred to his use, by his own claim and his creature's surrender. Such temples real Christians are, who are of the Holy Ghost. Must he not therefore be God? But the inference is plain, that hence we are not our own. We are yielded up to God, and possessed by and for God; nay, and this in virtue of a purchase made of us; Ye are bought with a price. In short, our bodies were made for God, they were purchased for him. If we are Christians indeed, they are yielded to him, and he inhabits and occupies them by his Spirit, so that our body and soul, and the power of self, are united and placed under his dominion. And shall we desecrate his temple, defile it, prostitute it, and offer it up to the use and service of a harlot? Horrid sacrilege! This is robbing God in the worst sense. Note, The temple of the Holy Ghost must be kept holy. Our bodies must be kept as his whose they are, and fit for his use and residence.

Lastly, The apostle argues from the obligation we are under to glorify God both in our body and spirit; because, by v. 20. He made both, he bought both, and therefore both belong to him, and should be used and employed for him; and therefore should not be defiled, alienated from him, and prostituted by us. No, they must be kept as vessels fitted for our Master's use. We must look upon our whole selves as holy to the Lord, and must use our bodies as property which belongs to him, and is sacred to his service, and to him only. We must use our properties with the greatest care and concern of their Lord and Master. Note, We are not proprietors of ourselves, nor have power over ourselves, and therefore should not use ourselves according to our own pleasure, but according to his will, and for his glory, whose we are, and whom we should serve, Acts 27. 23.

CHAP. VII.

In this chapter, the apostle answers some cases proposed to him by the Corinthians about marriage. i. 1. Shows them that marriage was appointed as a remedy against fornication, and therefore that persons had better marry than burn, v. 1. 9. ii. He gives direction to those who are married, to continue free from, though they might have an unbelieving relative, unless the unbeliever would part, in which case a Christian would not be in bondage, v. 10. 16. iii. He shews them that becoming Christians does not change their external state; and therefore all things are one to continue, in the general, in that state in which he was called, v. 17. 24. iv. He advises them, by reason of the present distress, to keep themselves unmarried; hints the shortness of this life, and how they should improve it, so as to grow dead and indifferent to the comforts of the world; and shews them how worldly cares hinder their devotion, and distract them in the service of God, v. 25. 35. v. He directs them in the disposal of their virgin, v. 36. 38. vi. And closes the chapter with advice to widows, how to dispose of themselves in that state, v. 39, 40.

1. Now concerning the things whereof ye wrote unto me: It is good for a man not to touch a woman. 2. Nevertheless, to avoid fornication, let every man have his own wife, and let every woman have her own husband. 3. Let the husband render unto the wife due benevolence: and likewise also the wife unto the husband. 4. The wife hath not power of her own body, but the husband: and likewise also the husband hath not power of his own body, but the wife. 5. Defraud ye not one another, except it be with consent for a time, that ye may give yourselves to fasting and prayer; and come together again, that Satan tempt you not for your incontinency. 6. But I speak this by permission, and not of commandment. 7. For I would that all men were even as I myself: but every man hath his proper gift of God, one after this manner, and another after that. 8. I say therefore to the unmarried and widows, It is good for them if they abide even as I. 9. But if they cannot contain, let them marry: for it is better to marry than to burn.

The apostle comes now, as a faithful and skilful casuist, to answer some cases of conscience which the Corinthians had proposed to him. Those were things whereof they wrote to him, v. 1. As the lips of ministers should keep knowledge, so the people should ask the law at their mouths. The apostle was as ready to resolve, as they were to propose, their doubts.

In the former chapter, he warns them to avoid fornication; here he gives some directions about marriage, the remedy God had appointed for it. He tells them in general,

1. That it was good, in that juncture of time at least, to abstain from marriage altogether; It is good for a man not to touch a woman; not to take her to wife by good hope, not understanding what is connubial and conformed to the mind and will of God, as if to do otherwise were sin; an extreme into which many of the ancients have run, in favour of celibacy and virginity. Should the apostle be understood in this sense, he would contradict much of the rest of his discourse. But it is good, that is, either abstracting from circumstances, there are many things in which the state of celibacy has the advantage above the marriage-state; or else at this juncture, by reason of the distresses of the Christian church, it would be a convenience for Christians to keep themselves single, provided they have the gift of continency, and at the same time can keep themselves chaste. The expression may also carry in it an intimation, that Christians must avoid all occasions of this sin, and flee all fleshly lusts, and incentivces to them; must neither look on, nor touch, a woman, so as to provoke lustful inclinations. Yet, I

II. He informs them that marriage, and the comforts and satisfactions of that state, are by divine wisdom prescribed for preventing fornication, (v. 2.)

III. He adds, that adulter}y, in every man's own house, and every woman her own husband. That is, marry, and confine themselves to their own mates. And when they are married, let each render the other the due benevolence, (v. 3.) consider the disposition and exigency of each other, and render conjugal duty, which is owing to each other. For, as the apostle argues, (v. 4.) in the married state neither is that made void which God hath joined together, but let the lusts of uncleanness, except it be with mutual consent, (v. 5.) and for a time only, while they employ themselves in some extraordinary duties of religion, or give themselves to fasting and prayer. Note, Seasons of deep humiliation require abstinence from lawful pleasures. But this separation between husband and wife must not be for a continuance, lest they should degenerate into evil company, discontent, or intemperance. This will deliver them into the power of the other. The wife her's into the power of the husband, the husband his into the power of the wife. Note, Polygamy, or the marriage of more persons than one, as well as adultery, must be a breach of marriage-covenants, and a violation of the partner's rights. And therefore they should not deprive one another of the use of their bodies, nor any other of the comforts of the conjugal state, which God hath joined together in sanctification and honour, and preventing the lusts of uncleanness; except it be with mutual consent, and for a time only, while they employ themselves in some extraordinary duties of religion, or give themselves to fasting and prayer. Note, Persons expose themselves to great danger, by attempting to perform what is above their strength, and at the same time not bound upon them by any law of God. If they abstain from lawful enjoyments, they may be insinuated into unlawful ones. The remedies God hath provided against sinful inclinations, are entirely best. III. The apostle limits what he had said about every man's having his own wife, &c. (v. 2.) I speak this by permission, not of command. He did not lay it as an injunction upon every man, to marry without exception. Any man might marry. No law of God prohibited the thing. But, on the other hand, no law bound a man to marry, so that he sinned if he did not; I mean, unless his circumstances required it, for the lust of uncleanness. It was a thing in which men, by the laws of God, were in a great measure left at liberty. And therefore Paul did not bind every man to marry, though every man had an allowance. No, he could wish all men were as himself; (v. 7.) that is, single, and capable of living continent in that state. There were several conveniences in it, which, at that season of the apostle's life, made it desirable in itself. Note, It is a mark of true goodness, to wish all men as happy as ourselves. But it did not answer the intentions of Divine Providence as well for all men to have as much command of his appetite as Paul had. It was a gift vouchsafed to such persons as Infinite Wisdom thought proper; Every one hath his proper gift of God, one after this manner, and another after that. Natural constitutions vary; and where there may not be much difference in the constitution, different degrees of grace are vouchsafed, which may give some a greater victory over natural inclination than others. Note, The gifts of God, both in nature and grace, are variously distributed. Some have them after this manner, and some after that. Paul could wish all men were as himself, but all men cannot receive such a saying, save them to whom it is given, Matt. 19. 11.

IV. He sums up his sense on this head; (v. 9. 10.) I say therefore to the unmarred and widows, to those in a state of virginity or widowhood, It is good for them if they abide even as I. There are many conveniences, and especially at this juncture, in a single state, to render it preferable to a married one. It is convenient therefore, that the unmarred abide as I, which plainly implies that Paul was at that time unmarried. But if they cannot avoid the marriage; for it is better to marry than to burn. This is God's remedy for lust. The fire may be quenched by the means he has appointed. And marriage, with all its inconveniences, is much better than to burn with impure and lustful desires. Marriage is honourable in all; but it is a duty to them who cannot contain, nor conquer those inclinations.

10. And unto the married I command, yet not I, but the Lord, Let not the wife depart from her husband: 11. But and if she depart, let her remain unmarried, or be reconciled to her husband: and let not the husband put away his wife. 12. But to the rest speak I, not the Lord, If any brother have a wife that believeth not, and she be pleased to dwell with him, let him not put her away. 13. And the woman which hath a husband that believeth not, and if he be pleased to dwell with her, let her not leave him. 14. For the unbelieving husband is sanctified by the wife, and the unbelieving wife is sanctified by the husband; else were your children unclean: but now are they holy. 15. But if the unbelieving depart, let him depart. A brother or a sister is not under bondage in such cases: but God hath called us to peace. 16. For what knowest thou, O wife, whether thou shalt save thy husband? Or how knowest thou, O man, whether thou shalt save thy wife? In this paragraph the apostle gives them direction in a case which must be very frequent in that age of the world, especially among the Jewish converts; I mean, whether they were to live with heathen relatives in a married state. Moses's law permitted divorce; and there was a famous instance in the Jewish state, when the people were obliged to put away their idolatrous wives, Ezra 10. 3. This might move a scruple in many minds, whether converts to Christianity were not bound to put away or desert their mates, continuing infidels. Concerning this matter, the apostle here gives direction. And, I. In general, he tells them, that marriage, by Christ's command, is for life; and therefore those who are married must not think of separation. The wife must not depart from the husband, (v. 10.) nor the husband put away his wife, v. 11. This I command, says the apostle; yet not I, but the Lord. Not that he commanded any thing of his own head, or upon his own authority. Whatever he commanded, was the Lord's command; dictated by his Spirit, and enjoined by his authority. But his meaning is, that the Lord himself, with his own mouth, had forbidden such separations, Matt. 5. 32. — 19. g. Mark 10. 11. Luke 16. 18. Note, Man and wife cannot separate at pleasure, or dissolve, when they will, their matrimonial bonds and relation. They must not separate for any other cause than what Christ allows. And therefore the apostle advises, that if any woman had been separated, either by a voluntary act of her own, or by an act of her husband, she should continue unmarried, and seek reconciliation with her husband, that they might cohabit again. Note, Husbands and wives should not quarrel at all, or should be quickly reconciled.
They are bound to each other for life. The divine law allows of no separation. They cannot throw off the burthen, and therefore should set their shoulders to it, and endeavour to make it light to each other as long as they live.

II. He brings the general advice home to the case of such as had an unbelieving mate; (v. 12.) But to the rest speak I, not the Lord; the Lord had not so expressly spoken to this case as to the former of divorce. It does not mean, that the apostle spake without authority from the Lord, or decided this case by his own wisdom, without the inspiration of the Holy Ghost. He closes this subject with a declaration to the contrary, (v. 40.) I think also, that I have the Spirit of God. But having thus prefaced his advice, we may attend,

1. To the advice itself; which is, that if an unbelieving husband or wife were pleased to dwell with a Christian relative, the other should not separate. The husband should not put away an unbelieving wife, nor the wife leave an unbelieving husband, v. 12. But the middle line did not dissolve the marriage covenant, but bind it the faster, by bringing it back to the original institution, limiting it to two persons, and binding them together for life. The believer is not by faith in Christ loosed from matrimonial bonds to an unbeliever, but is at once bound, and made apt, to be a better relative. But though a believing wife or husband should not separate from an unbelieving mate, yet, if the unbelieving relative desert the believer, and no means can reconcile to a cohabitation, in such a case a brother or sister is not in bondage, (v. 15.) not tied up to the unreasonable humour, and bound servilely to follow or cleave to the malicious deserter, or not bound to live unmarried, after all proper means for reconciliation have been tried, at least, if the deserter contract another marriage, or be guilty of adultery; which was a very easy supposition, because a very common instance and practice among the inhabitants of Corinth. In such a case the deserted person must be free to marry again, and it is granted on all hands. And some think, that such a malicious desertion is as much a dissolution of the marriage-covenant as death itself. For how is it possible, that the two shall be one flesh, when the one is maliciously bent to part from, or put away, the other? Indeed, the deserter seems still bound by the marriage-contract; and therefor apostle says, if the woman be defair from her husband upon account of his infidelity, let her remain unmarried. But the deserted party seems to be left more at liberty (I mean, supposing all the proper means have been used to reclaim the deserter, and other circumstances make it necessary) to marry another person. It does not seem reasonable that they should be still bound, when it is so clear and undeniable to perform conjugal duties or enjoy conjugal comforts, through the mere fault of their mate: in such a case marriage would be a state of servitude indeed. But whatever liberty be indulged Christians in such a case as this, they are not allowed, for the mere infidelity of a husband or wife, to separate; but, if the unbeliever be willing, they should continue in the relation, and cohabit as those without such related. This is the apostle's general direction.

2. We have here the reasons of this advice;

(1.) Because the relation or state is sanctified by the holiness of either party; For the unbelieving husband is sanctified by the wife, and the unbelieving wife by the husband, (v. 14.) or hath been sanctified.

The relation itself, and the conjugal use of each other, are sanctified to the believer. "To the first man all things are pure, Tit. 1. 15. Marriage is a divine instrument; it is a compact for life, by God's appointment. Should converse and congress with unbelievers in that relation defile the believer, or render him or her offensive to God, the ends of marriage would have been defeated, and the comforts of it in a manner destroyed, in the circumstances in which Christ speaks them. But the apostle tells them, that, though they were yoked with unbelievers, yet, if themselves were holy, marriage was to them a holy state, and marriage-comforts, even with an unbelieving relative, were sanctified enjoyments. It was no more displeasing to God for them to continue to live as they did before, with their unbelieving or heathen relation, than if they had become converts together. If one of the relatives were become holy, nothing of the duties or lawful comforts of the married state could defile them, and render them displeasing to God, though the other was a heathen. He is sanctified for the wife's sake. She is sanctified for the husband's sake. Both are one flesh. He is to be reputed clean, who is one flesh with her that is holy, and vice versa—in like manner, if the terms are exchanged. Else were your children unclean, but now are they holy; (v. 14.) that is, the child born of a Christian church and covenant of God. They would not be of the holy seed, (as the Jews are called, Isa. 6. 13.) but common and unclean, in the same sense as heathens in general were styled in the apostle's vision, Acts 10. 28. This way of speaking is according to the dialect of the Jews; among whom a child, beget by parents yet heathens, was said to be begotten out of holiness; and a child begotten by parents made proselytes, is said to be begotten intra sanctitatem—within the holy inclosure. Thus Christians are called commonly saints; such they are by profession, separated to be a peculiar people of God, and as such distinguished from the world; and therefore the children born to Christians, though married to unbelievers, are not to be reckoned as part of the world, but of the church, a holy, not a common and unclean seed. Continue therefore to the seven churches, in the relation of the unbelieving relative, as holy, the relation is so, the state is so, you may make a holy use even of an unbelieving relative, in conjugal duties, and your seed will be holy too. " What a comfort is this, where both relatives are believers!

(2.) Another reason is, that God hath called Christians to peace, v. 15. The Christian religion obliges us to act peaceably in all relations, natural and civil. We are bound, as much as in us lie, to live peaceably with all men, (Rom. 12. 18.) and therefore surely to promote the peace and comfort of our nearest relatives, those with whom we are one flesh, nay though they should be infidels. Note, It should be the labour and study of those who are married, to make each other as easy and happy as possible.

(3.) A third reason is, that it is possible for the believing relative to be an instrument of the other's salvation; (v. 16.) What knowest thou, O wife, whether thou shalt save thy husband? Note, It is the plain duty of those in so near a relation, to endeavour the salvation of their souls to whom they are related. "Do not separate. There is other duty now called for. The conjugal relation calls for the most close and tender care and regard of life. And should a Christian desert a mate, when an opportunity offers to give the most glorious proof of love? Stay, and labour heartily the conversion of thy relative. Endeavour to save a soul. Who knows but this may be the event? It is not impossible. And though there be no great probability, saving a soul is so good and glorious a service, that the bare possibility should put on one's soul. Note, Mere possibility of success should be a sufficient motive with us to use our diligent endeavours for saving the souls of our relations. "What know I, but I may save his soul? should move me to attempt it."

17. But as God hath distributed to every man, as the Lord hath called every one, so let him walk: and so ordain I in all churches. 18. Is any man called, being circumcised? Let him not become uncircumcised. Is any called in uncircumcision? Let him not become circumcised. 19. Circumcision is nothing, and uncircumcision is nothing, but the keeping of the commandments of God. 20. Let every man abide in the same calling wherein he was called. 21. Art thou called, being a servant? Care not for it; but if thou mayest be made free, use it rather. 22. For he that is called in the Lord, being a servant, is the Lord's freeman—servant, as he that is called, being free, is the Lord's servant. Though he be not discharged from his master's service, he is freed from the dominion and vassalage of sin. Though he be not enslaved to Christ, yet he is bound to yield himself up wholly to his pleasure and service; and yet that service is perfect freedom. Note, Our comfort and happiness depend on what we are to Christ, not what we are in the world. The goodness of our calling is not to be placed in the duties of Christianity, nor the badness of it debars from Christian privileges. He who is a slave, may yet be a Christian freeman; who he is a freeman, may yet be Christ's servant. He is bought with a price, and should not therefore be the servant of man. Not that he must quit the service of his master, or not take all proper measures to please him; (this were to contradict the whole scope of the apostle's discourse;) but he must not be so the servant of men, but that Christ's will must be obeyed, and regarded, more than his master's. He has paid a much dearer purchase for him, and has a much fuller property in him. He is to be served and obeyed without limit or reserve. Note, The servants of Christ should be at the absolute command of no other master beside himself, should serve no man, any farther than is consistent with their duty to him. No more than is necessary. Where he was converted to Christianity, let him abide therein, and suit his conversation to it. The rules of Christianity reach every condition. And in every state a man may live so as to be a credit to it. Note, It is the duty of every Christian to suit his behaviour to his condition and the rules of religion, to be content with his lot, and conduct himself in his rank and place as becomes a Christian. The apostle adds, that this was a general rule, to be observed at all times and in all places—So ordain I in all churches.

II. He specifies particular cases; as, 1. That of circumcision. Is any man called, being circumcised? Let him not be uncircumcised. Is any man called, being uncircumcised? Let him not be circumcised. It matters not whether a man be a Jew or Gentile; within the covenant of peculiarity made with Abraham, or without it. If he be converted, being a Jew, he has no need to give himself uneasiness upon that head, and wish himself uncircumcised. Nor is he who is converted from Gentilism, under an obligation to be circumcised; nor should he be concerned, because he wants that mark of distinction which did heretofore belong to the people of God. For as the apostle goes on, circumcision is nothing, and uncircumcision is nothing, but keeping the commandments of God, v. 19. In point of acceptance with God, it is neither here nor there whether men be circumcised or not. Note, It is practical religion, sincere obedience to the commands of God, on which the gospel lays stress. External observances without internal piety are as nothing. Therefore let every man abide in the calling, the state, wherein he was called, v. 20. 2. That of servitude and freedom. It was common in that age of the world, for many to be in a state of slavery, bought and sold for money, and so the property of those who purchased them. "Now," says the apostle, "art thou called, being a servant? Care not for it. Be not over-solicitous about it. It is not inconsistent with thy duty, profession, or hopes, as a Christian. Yet, if thou mayest be made free, use it rather," v. 21. There are many conveniences in a state of freedom, above that of servitude: a man has more power over himself, and more command of his time, and is not under the control of another lord; and therefore, liberty is the more eligible state. But men's outward condition does not let nor further their acceptance with God. For he that is called, being a servant, is the Lord's free-man—servant, as he that is called, being free, is the Lord's servant. Though he be not discharged from his master's service, he is freed from the dominion and vassalage of sin. Though he be not enslaved to Christ, yet he is bound to yield himself up wholly to his pleasure and service; and yet that service is perfect freedom. Note, Our comfort and happiness depend on what we are to Christ, not what we are in the world. The goodness of our calling is not to be placed in the duties of Christianity, nor the badness of it debars from Christian privileges. He who is a slave, may yet be a Christian freeman; who he is a freeman, may yet be Christ's servant. He is bought with a price, and should not therefore be the servant of man. Not that he must quit the service of his master, or not take all proper measures to please him; (this were to contradict the whole scope of the apostle's discourse;) but he must not be so the servant of men, but that Christ's will must be obeyed, and regarded, more than his master's. He has paid a much dearer purchase for him, and has a much fuller property in him. He is to be served and obeyed without limit or reserve. Note, The servants of Christ should be at the absolute command of no other master beside himself, should serve no man, any farther than is consistent with their duty to him. No more than is necessary. Where he was converted to Christianity, let him abide therein, and suit his conversation to it. The rules of Christianity reach every condition. And in every state a man may live so as to be a credit to it. Note, It is the duty of every Christian to suit his behaviour to his condition and the rules of religion, to be content with his lot, and conduct himself in his rank and place as becomes a Christian. The apostle adds, that this was a general rule, to be observed at all times and in all places—So ordain I in all churches.

III. He sums up his advice; Let every man whereby he is called, abide therein with God, v. 24. This is to be understood of the state wherein a man is converted to Christianity. No man should make his faith or religion an argument to break through any natural or civil obligations. He should quietly and comfortably abide in the condition in which he is; and this he may do, v. 20, with the mind at ease. Note, The special presence and favour of God are not limited to any outward condition or performance. He may enjoy it, who is circumcised; and so may he, who is uncircumcised. He who is bound, may have it as well as he who is free. In this respect, there is neither Greek nor Jew, circumcision nor uncircumcision, Barbarian nor Scythian, bond nor free, Col. 3. 11. The favour of God is not bound.

25. Now concerning virgins, I have no commandment of the Lord; yet I give my judgment as one that hath obtained mercy of the Lord to be faithful. 26. I suppose therefore that this is good for the present distress, I say, that it is good for a man so to be. 27. Art thou bound unto a wife? Seek not to be loosed. Art thou loosed from a wife? Seek not a wife. 28. But and if thou marry, thou hast not sinned; and if a virgin marry, she hath not sinned: nevertheless, such shall have trouble in the flesh: but I spare you. 29. But this I say, brethren, the time is short. It remaineth, that both they that have wives, be as though they had none; 30. And they that weep, as though they wept not; and they that rejoice, as though they rejoiced not; and they that buy, as though they possessed not; 31. And they that use this world, as not abusing it: for the fashion of this world passeth away. 32. But I would have you without carefulness. He that is unmarried, careth for the things that belong to the Lord, how he may please the Lord: 33. But he that is married, careth for the things that are of the world, how he may please his wife. 34. There is difference also between a wife and a virgin: The unmarried woman careth for the things of the Lord, that she may be holy both in body and in spirit: but she that is married, careth for the things of the world, how she may please her husband. 35. And this I speak for your own profit, not that I may cast a snare upon you, but for that which is comely, and that you may attend upon the Lord without distraction.

The apostle here resumes his discourse, and gives directions to virgins how to act. Concerning which we may take notice,

I. Of the manner wherein he introduces them:

"Now concerning virgins, I have no commandment of the Lord, v. 25. I have no express and universal law delivered by the Lord himself concerning celibacy; but I give my judgment, as one who hath obtained mercy of the Lord to be faithful, in the apostleship." He acted faithfully, and therefore his direction was to be regarded as a rule of Christ: for he gave judgment as one who was a faithful apostle of Christ. Though Christ had before delivered no universal law about that matter, he now gives direction by an inspired apostle, one who had obtained mercy of the Lord, to be faithful. Note, Faithfulness in the ministry is owing to the grace and mercy of Christ. It is what Paul was ready to acknowledge upon all occasions; I laboured more abundantly than they all; not I, but the grace of God which was with me, ch. 15. 10. And it is a great mercy they obtain from God, who prove faithful in the ministry of his word, either ordinary or extraordinary.

II. The determination he gives; which, considering the present distress, was, that a state of celibacy was preferable; It is good for a man so to be, that is, to be single. I suppose, says the apostle, or it is my opinion. It is worked with modesty, but delivered, notwithstanding, with apostolical authority. It is not the mere opinion of a private man, but the very determination of the Spirit of God in an apostle, though it be thus spoken. And it was thus delivered, to give it the more weight. Those that were prejudiced against the apostle, might have rejected this advice, had it been given with a mere authoritative air. Note, Ministers do not lose their authority by prudent concessions. They must become all things to all men, that they may do them the more good. This is good, says he, for the present distress. Christians, at the first planting of their religion, were grievously persecuted. Their enemies were very bitter against them, and treated them very cruelly. They were continually liable to be tossed and hurried by persecution. This being the then state of the case, what did he do? He gave advice to Christians that were single, to change conditions. The married state would bring more care and cumber along with it, (v. 33, 34,) and would therefore make persecution more terrible, and render them less able to bear it. Note, Christians, in regulating their conduct, should not barely consider what is lawful in itself, but what may be expedient for them.

III. Notwithstanding he thus determines, he is likewise careful to satisfy his consciences. He does not condemn marriage in the gross, or declare it unlawful. And therefore, though he says, "If thou art bound to a wife, a single state, whether bachelor or widower, virgin or widow, do not seek a wife, do not hastily change conditions," yet he adds, "If thou art bound to a wife, do not seek to be loosed. It is thy duty to continue in the married relation, and do the duties of it." And though such, if they were well to the purpose, were not condemned; yet no special difficulties in it; yet, to avoid these difficulties, they must not cast off or break through the bonds of duty. Duty must be done, and God trusted with events. But to neglect duty is the way to put ourselves out of the divine protection. He adds therefore, If thou marry, thou hast not sinned; or if a virgin marry, she hath not sinned: but such shall have trouble in the flesh. Marrying is not in itself a sin, but marrying at that time was likely to bring incontinence upon them, and add to the calamities of the times; and therefore he thought it advisable and expedient, that such as could contain, should refrain from it; but adds, that he would not lay celibacy on them as a yoke, or, by seeming to urge it too far, draw them into any snare; and therefore says, But I speak you. Note, How opposite in this the papist casuists are to the apostle Paul. They forbid many to marry, and entangle them with vows of celibacy, whether they can bear the yoke or no.

IV. He takes this occasion to give general rules to all Christians, to carry themselves with a holy indifference toward the world, and every thing in it. 1. As to relations; They that have wives, must be as though they had none. That is, they must not set their hearts too much on the comforts of the relation; they must be as though they had none. They know not how soon they shall have none. This advice must be carried into every other relation. Those that have children, should be as though they had none. They that were their comfort now, may prove their greatest cross. And soon may the flower of all comforts be cut down. 2. As to afflictions; They that weep, must be as though they were not. They must as much with any of our afflictions, not indulge ourselves in the sorrow of the world; but keep up a holy joy in God, in the midst of all our troubles, so that even in sorrow the heart may be joyful, and the end of our grief may be gladness. Weeping may endure for a night, but joy will come in the morning. And if we can but get to heaven at last, all tears shall be wiped from our eyes. The prospect of it now, should make us moderate our sorrows, and refrain our tears. 3. As to worldly enjoyments; They that rejoice should be as though... they rejoiced not; they should not take too great a complacency in any of their comforts. They must be moderate in their mirth, and sit loose to the enjoyments they most value. Here is not their rest, nor are these things their portion; and therefore their hearts should not be set on them, nor should they place their solace or satisfaction in them. 4. As to worldly traffic and employment; They that buy, must be as though they possessed not. Those that prosper in trade, increase in wealth, and purchase estates, should hold these possessions as though they held them not. It is but setting their hearts on that which will not last, (Ps. 30. 19.) and it is most crore wise in care and minding and possessing should not too much engage our minds. They hinder many people altogether from minding the better part. Purchasing land and trying oxen, kept the guests invited from the wedding-supper, Luke 14. 18, 19. And when they do not altogether hinder men from minding their chief business, they do very much divert them from a close pursuit. They are most likely to run so as to obtain the prize, who care their minds of all foreign cares and incumbrance. 5. As to all worldly concerns; They that use this world, as not abusing it, v. 31. The world may be used, but must not be abused. It is abused when it is not used to those purposes for which it is given, to honour God and do good to men: when, instead of being oil to the wheels of our obedience, it is made fuel to lust: when, instead of being a convenient place to rest, it is made by worldly cares and their room in our affections, which should be reserved for God. And there is great danger of abusing it in all these respects, if our hearts are too much set upon it. We must keep the world as much as may be out of our hearts, that we may not abuse it when we have it in our hands.

The apostle enforces these adages with two reasons; (1.) The time is short, v. 29. We have but little time to continue in this world; but a short season for possessing and enjoying worldly things; ἡγεσίαν μετέπεσεν. It is contracted, reduced to a narrow compass. It will soon be gone. It is just ready to be wrapped up in eternity, swallowed up of eternity. Therefore do not set your hearts on worldly enjoyments. Do not be overwhelmed with worldly cares and troubles. Possess what you must shortly leave, without suffering yourselves to be possessed by them, as we are possessed by them; what you must quickly resign? (2.) The fashion of this world passes away, v. 31. Χρόνος—THE habit, figure, appearance, of the world, passes away. It is daily changing countenance. It is in a continual flux. It is not so much a world as the appearance of one. All is shew; nothing solid in it. And yet it is transient shew too, and will be quickly gone. How proper and powerful an argument is this to enforce the former advice! How irrational is it to be affected with the images, the fading and transient images, of a dream! Surely man walketh in a vain thing, (Ps. 39. 9.) in an image, amidst the faint and vanishing appearances of things. And should he be deeply affected, or grievously afflicted, with such a scene? He presses his general advice, by warning them against the embarrassment of worldly cares; But I would have you without carefulness, v. 3. Indeed, to be careless is a fault; a wise concern about worldly interests is a duty; but to be careful, full of care, to have an anxious and perplexing care about them is a sin. All that care which disquiets the mind, and disturbs it in the worship of God, is evil; for God must be attended upon with sincere and serious mind. The whole mind must be engaged when God is worshipped. The work ceases while it diverts to any thing else, or is hurried and drawn hither and thither by foreign affairs and concerns. They who are engaged in divine worship, should attend to this very thing, should make it their whole business. But how is this possible, when the mind is swallowed up of the cares of this life? Note, It is the wisdom of a Christian, so to order his outward affairs, and choose such a condition in life, as to be without distracting cares, that he may attend upon the Lord with a mind at leisure and disengaged. This is the general maxim by which the apostle would have Christians govern themselves. In the application of it, Christian prudence must direct. That condition of life is best for every man, which is best for his soul, and keeps him from most care and anxiety of worldlings. By this maxim the apostle solves the case put to him by the Corinthians, whether it was advisable to marry? To this he says, That, by reason of the present distress, and it may be in general, at that time, when Christians were married to infidels, and perhaps under a necessity to do so, if they married at all: I say, in these circumstances to continue unmarried, would be the way to free themselves from many cares and incumbrances, and allow them more vacation for the service of God. Ordinarily, the less care we have about the world, the more freedom we have for the service of God. Now, the married state at that time, (if not at all times,) did bring most worldly care along with it. He that is married, careth for the things of the world, that he may please his wife, v. 33. And she that is married, careth for the things of the world, how may please her husband. But the unmarried man and woman mind the things of the Lord, that they may please the Lord, and be holy both in body and spirit, v. 32, 34. Not but the married person may be holy both in body and spirit too. Celibacy is not in itself a state of greater purity and sanctity than marriage; but the unmarried would be able to make religion more their business at that juncture, because they would have less distraction from worldly cares. Marriage is that condition of life, that brings care along with it, though sometimes it brings more than others. It is the constant care of those in that relation, to please each other; though this is more difficult to do at some seasons, and in some cases, than in others. At that season, therefore, the apostle advises, that those who were single, should abstain from marriage, if they were under a necessity to change conditions. And where the same reason is plain at other times, the rule is as plain, and as fit to be observed. And the very same rule must determine persons for marriage, where there is the same reason, that is, if in the unmarried state persons are likely to be more distracted in the service of God, than if they were married; which is a case supposable in many respects. This is the general rule, which every one's discretion must apply to his own particular case; and by it should be endeavour to determine, whether it be for marriage or against. That condition of life should be chosen by the Christian, in which it is most likely he shall have the best helps, and the least hindrances, in the service of God, and the affairs of his own salvation.

But if any man think that he behaveth himself unconcerned toward his virgin, if she pass the flower of her age, and need so require, let him do what he will, he sinneth not: let them marry. 37. Nevertheless, he that standeth steadfast in his heart, having no necessity, but hath power over his own will, and hath so decreed in his heart that he will keep his virgin, doeth well. 38. So then, he that giveth her in marriage doth well; but he that giveth her not in marriage doth better.

In this passage, the apostle is commonly supposed to give advice about the disposal of children, in many cases, upon the principle of his former determination. In this view, the general meaning is plain. It was in that age, and those parts of the world, and especially among the Jews, reckoned a disgrace for a woman to remain unmarried, past a certain number of years: it gave a suspicion of somewhat that was not for her reputation. "Now," says the apostle, "if any man thinks he behaves unhandsomely towards this, let him think, and that it is not for his credit to remain unmarried, when she is of full age, and that upon this principle, it is needful to dispose of her in marriage, he may use his pleasure. It is no sin in him, to dispose of her to a suitable mate. But if a man has determined in himself to keep her a virgin, and stands to this determination, and is under no necessity to dispose of her in marriage, but is at liberty, with her consent, to publish his purpose, he does well in keeping her a virgin. In short, he that giveth her in marriage, does well; but he that keeps her single, if she can be easy and innocent in such a state, does what is better; that is, more convenient for her in the present state of things, if not at all times and seasons. Note, Children should be at the disposal of their parents, and not dispose of themselves in marriage. Yet note again, Parents should consult their children's inclinations, both to marriage in general, and to the person in particular, and not reckon they have uncontrollable power to do with them, and dictate to them, as they please. Note, Thirdly, It is our duty not only to consider what is lawful, but in many cases, at least, what is fit to be done, before we do it.

But I think the apostle is here continuing his former discourse, and advising unmarried persons, who are at their own disposal, what to do; the man's virgin being meant of his virginity. Τὸν γὰρ γυναῖκα παρθένον, seems to be rather meant of preserving his own virginity, than keeping his daughter a virgin; though it be altogether uncommon to use the word in this sense. Several other reasons may be seen in Locke and Whitby, by those who will consult them. And it was a common matter of reproach, both amongst the civilized and uncivilized nations, for a man to continue single beyond such a term of years, though all did not agree in limiting the single life to the same term. The general meaning of the apostle is the same, that it was no sin to marry, if a man thought there was a necessity upon him, to avoid popular reproach, much less to avoid the hurrying fervours of lust. But he that was in his own power, stood firm in his purpose, and found himself under no necessity he does well, at that season, and in the circumstances of Christians at that time, at least, make a choice every way most for his own convenience, ease, and advantage, as to his spiritual concerns. And it is highly expedient, if not a duty, for Christians to be guided by such a consideration.

39. The wife is bound by the law as long as her husband liveth; but if her husband be dead, she is at liberty to be married to whom she will; only in the Lord. 40. But she is happier if she so abide, after my judgment: and I think also that I have the Spirit of God.

The whole is here closed up with advice to widows; As long as the husband liveth, the wife is bound by the law; confined to one husband, and bound to continue and cohabit with him. Note, The marriage-contract is for life; death only can annul the bond. But the husband being dead, she is at liberty to marry whom she will. There is no limitation by God's law, to be married only for such a number of years. It is certain, from this passage, that second marriages are not unlawful; for then the widow could not be at liberty to marry whom she pleased, nor to marry a second time at all. But the apostle asserts, she was such a liberty, when her husband was dead, only with a limitation, that she marry in the Lord. In our choice of relations, and change of conditions, we should always have an eye to God. Note, Marriages are then only likely to have God's blessing, when they are made in the Lord; when persons are guided by the fear of God, and the laws of God, and act in dependence on the providence of God, in the change and choice of a mate; when they can look up to God, and sincerely seek his direction, and humbly hope for his blessing upon their conduct. But she is happier, says the apostle, if she so abide, that is, continue a widow, in my judgment; and I think I have the Spirit of God, v. 40. At this juncture, at least, if not ordinarily, it will be much more for the peace and quiet of such, and give them less hinderance in the service of God, to be managed by the Spirit of God.

CHAP. VIII.

The apostle, in this chapter, answers another case proposed to him by some of the Corinthians, about eating those things that had been sacrificed to idols. 1. He hints at the occasion of this case, and gives a caution against too high an esteem of their knowledge, v. 1. 3. He asserts the vanity of idols, the unity of the Godhead, and the sole mediation of Christ between God and man, v. 4. 6. III. He tells them, that upon supposition that it were lawful in itself to eat of things offered to idols, (for that they themselves were nothing;) yet regard must be had to the weakness of Christian brethren, and nothing done that would lay a stumbling-block before them, and occasion their sin and destruction, v. 7, to the end.

1. Now as touching things offered unto idols, we know that we all have knowledge. Knowledge puffeth up, but charity edifieth. 2. And if any man think that he knoweth any thing, he knoweth nothing yet as he ought to know. 3. But if any man love God, the same is known of him.

The apostle comes here to the case of things that had been offered to idols, concerning which some of them sought satisfaction: a case that frequently occurred in that age of Christianity, when the church of Christ was among the heathen; and the Israel of God must live among the Canaanites. For the better understanding of it, it must be observed, that it was a custom among the heathen, not only to eat of things offered to their gods, but to make feasts, and not only to eat them, but invite their friends to partake with them. These were usually kept in the temple, where the sacrifice was offered; (v. 10.) and if any thing were left when the feast ended, it was usual to carry away a portion to their friends; what remained, after all, belonged to the priest, who sometimes sold it in the markets. See ch. 10. 25. Nay, feasts, as Athenian
And was always accounted among the heathen, sacred and religious things, that they were to sacrifice before all their feast; and it was accounted a very profane thing among them, to eat at their private tables any meat, whereof they had not first sacrificed on such occasions.

In this circumstance of things, while Christians lived among idolaters, had many relations and friends that were such with whom they must keep acquaintance, and maintain in good neighbourhood, and therefore have occasion to eat at their tables, what should they do, if any thing that had been sacrificed should be set before them? What, if they should be invited to feast with them in their temples? It seems as if some of the Corinthians were got into an opinion, that even this might be done, because they knew an idol was nothing in the world, and that their religion would prevail. There was no occasion, therefore, to keep such a strict rule, as that none should eat that were first sacrificed.

The apostle introduces his discourse with some remarks about knowledge, that seem to carry in them a censure of such pretences to knowledge as I have mentioned; We know, says the apostle, that God's creatures are all in heaven and earth.

The greatest knowledge the man can have, is, to know by which means he came to be. If any man think that he knoweth any thing, he knoweth nothing yet as he ought to know. He that knows most, best understands his own ignorance, and the imperfection of human knowledge. He that imagines himself a knowing man, and is vain and conceited on this imagination, has reason to suspect that he knows nothing arieth, nothing as he ought. But, as the apostle observes, If any man love God, the same is known of God. If any man love God, and is thereby influenced to love his neighbour, the same is known of God; that is, as some understand it, is made by him to know, is taught of God. Note, They that love God, are most likely to be taught of God, and be made by him to know as they ought. Some understand it, that he shall be approved of God; he will accept him, and have pleasure in him. Note, The charitable persons are most likely to have God's favour. They who love God, and for his sake love their brethren, and seek their welfare, are likely to be beloved of God; and how much better is it to be approved of God than to have a vain opinion of ourselves!

4. As concerning therefore the eating of those things that are offered in sacrifice unto idols, we know that an idol is nothing in the world, and that there is no other God but one. 5. For though there be that are called gods, whether in heaven or in earth, (as there be gods many, and lords many,) 6. But to us there is but one God, the Father, of whom are all things, and we in him; and one Lord Jesus Christ, by whom are all things, and we by him.

In this passage he shews the vanity of idols: As to the eating of things that have been sacrificed to idols, we know that an idol is nothing in the world; or, there is in this world; or, an idol can do nothing in the world: for the thing or of it, ex. om. in the original, is elliptical. The meaning in the geneal is, that heathen idols have no divinity in them; and therefore in the Old Testament, are commonly called des and vanities, or lying vanities. They are mere imaginary gods, and many of them no better than imaginary beings; they have no power to pollute the creatures of God, and thereby render them unfit to be the objects of worship. Every creature of God is good, if it be received with thanksgiving, 1 Tim. 4. 5. It is not in the power of the vanities of the heathens to change their nature. And there is no other God but one. Heathen idols are not gods, nor to be owned and respected as gods, for there is no other God but one. Note, The unity of the Godhead is a fundamental principle in Christianity, and in all right religion. The gods of the heathens must be next in heaven, and have no divinity in them, nothing of real godhead belonging to them; for there is no other God but one. Others may be called gods; there are that are called gods in heaven and earth, gods many, and lords many; but they are there falsely thus called. The heathens had many such, some in heaven, and some on earth; celestial deities, that were of highest rank and repute among them; and terrestrial ones, men made gods; they were to be worshipped, and worshiped by the former, and were reputed by them to preside over earthly affairs. These are in scripture commonly called Baalim. They had gods of higher and lower degree; nay, many in each order; gods many, and lords many; but all titular deities and mediators, so called, but not such in truth. All their divinity and meditation were imaginary. For, 1. To us there is but one God. The apostle, the Father, of whom are all things, and we in him, and we the Christians are better informed; we well know there is but one God, the Fountain of being, the Author of all things, Maker, Preserver, and Governor of the whole world, of whom, and for whom, are all things. Not one God to govern one part of mankind, or one rank and order of men, and another to govern another. One God made all, and therefore has power over all. All things are of God, and all things else, are for him. Called the Father here, not in contradistinction to the other persons of the sacred Trinity, and to exclude them from the Godhead, but in contradistinction to all creatures that were made by God, and whose formation is attributed to each of these three in other places of scripture, and not appropriated to the Father alone. God the Father, as Fons et fundamentum Trinitatis—as the first person in the Godhead, and the first in the order of beings—stands here for the Deity, which yet comprehends all three. The name God being sometimes in scripture ascribed to the Father, xev tis ex pro, or by way of eminency, because he is Fons et principium Divinitatis, (as Calvin ob-
I. CORINTHIANS, VIII.

7. Howbeit, there is not in every man that knowledge: for some, with conscience of the idol, unto this hour, eat it as a thing offered unto an idol; and their conscience, being weak, is defiled. 8. But meat commendeth us not to God: for neither if we eat, are we the better; neither if we eat not, are we the worse. 9. But take heed, lest by any means this liberty of yours become a stumbling-block to them that are weak. 10. For if any man see thee, who hast knowledge, sit at meat in the idol's temple, shall not the conscience of him which is weak be emboldened to eat those things which are offered to idols? 11. And through thy knowledge shall the weak brother perish, for whom Christ died? 12. But when ye sin so against the brethren, and wound their weak conscience, ye sin against Christ. 13. Wherefore, if meat make my brother to offend, I will eat no flesh while the world standeth, lest I make my brother to offend.

The apostle, having granted, and indeed confirmed, the opinion of some among the Corinthians, that idols were nothing, proceeds now to shew them, that their inference from this assumption was not just, namely, That therefore they might go into idol-temple, and eat of the sacrifices, and feast there with their heathen neighbours. He does not indeed here so much insist upon the unlawfulness of the thing in itself, as the mischief such freedom might do to weaker Christians, persons that had not the same measure of knowledge with these pretenders. And here he,

1. Informs them, that every Christian man, at that time, was not so fully convinced and persuaded that an idol was nothing; Howbeit, there is not in every man this knowledge; for some, with conscience of the idol, unto this hour, eat it as a thing offered unto an idol: with conscience of the idol that is, some confused veneration for it. Though they were converts to Christianity, and professed the true religion, they were not perfectly cured of the old idolatry, and retained an unaccountable respect for the idols they had worshipped before.

Note, Weak Christians may be ignorant, or have but a confused knowledge, of the greatest and plainest truths. Such were those of the one God, and one Mediator. And yet some of those who were turned from heathenism to Christianity among the Corinthians, seem to have retained a veneration for their idols, utterly irreconcilable with those great principles; so that when an opportunity offered them to eat things offered to idols, they did not abstain, to testify their abhorrence of idolatry, nor eat with a professed contempt of the idol, by declaring they looked upon it to be nothing; and so their conscience, being weak, was defiled; they contracted guilt; they ate out of respect to the idol, with an imagination that it had something divine in it, and so committed idolatry; whereas the design of the gospel, was, to turn men from dumb idols to the living God. They were weak in their understanding, not thoroughly apprized of the vanity of idols; and while they ate what was sacrificed to them, out of veneration for them, contracted the guilt of idolatry, and so greatly polluted themselves. This seems to be the sense of the place; though some understand it of weak Christians defiling themselves, by eating what was offered to idols. But the sense of it is, that which some have thought, that thereby it became unclean, and made them so in a moral sense, who should eat it; every one not having a knowledge that the idol was nothing, and therefore that it could not render what was offered to it, in this sense, unclean. Note, We should be careful to do nothing that may occasion weak Christians to defile their consciences.

II. He tells them that mere eating or drinking had nothing in them vicious or criminal, nothing that could make them better or worse, pleasing or displeasing to God; Meat commendeth us not to God: for neither if we eat are we the better; nor if we eat not are we the worse, v. 8. It looks as if some of the Corinthians made a merit of their eating what had been offered to idols, and that in their very temples too, (v. 10.) because it plainly shewed that they thought the idols nothing. But eating or drinking, when offered to idols, was a sort of idolatry, and so it was not an excellence in the man who ate, as much as it was a sin in him who did not eat. For the difference was, that the latter omitted the idolatry itself; the former committed it.

3. He argues here, that even upon supposition they had such power, they must be cautious how they use it; it might be possible, they might possibly be informed, that it was in some way intended that their actions might occasion their falling into idolatrous actions, perhaps their falling off from Christianity, and revolting again to heathenism. "If a man see thee, who hast knowledge, hast superior understanding to his, and hereupon conceived that thou hast a liberty to set at meat, or feast, in an idol's temple, because an idol, thou sayest, is nothing; shall not one who is less thoroughly informed in this matter, and thinks an idol something, be emboldened to eat what was offered to the idol, not as common food, but sacrifice, and thereby be guilty of idolatry?"
Such an occasion of falling they should be careful of laying before their weak brethren, whatever liberty or power they themselves had.

The apostle backs this caution with two considerations; 1. The danger that might accrue to weak brethren, even those weak brethren for whom Christ died. We must deny ourselves even what is lawful, rather than occasion their stumbling, and endanger their souls; (v. 11.) Through thy knowledge shall thy weak brother perish, for whom Christ died? Note, Those whom Christ hath redeemed with his most precious blood, should be very precious and dear to us. If he had such compassion as to die for them, that they might not perish, we should have so much compassion for them as to deny ourselves, for their sakes, in various instances, and not use our liberty to their hurt, to occasion them to fall and hazard their ruin. That man has very little of the spirit of a Redeemer, whom had rather his brother should perish than himself be abridged, in any respect, of his liberty. He who hath the Spirit of Christ in him, will love those whom Christ loved, so as to die for them, and will study to promote their spiritual and eternal welfare, and shun every thing that may occasion their stumbling, or every thing that shall be likely to occasion their stumbling, or falling into sin. 2. The hurt done to them, Christ takes as done to himself; When ye sin so against the weak brethren, and wound their consciences, ye sin against Christ, v. 12. Note, Injuries done to Christians, are injuries to Christ; especially to babes in Christ, to weak Christians; and, most of all, involving them in guilt; wounding their conscience, is wounding him. He has a particular care of the lambs and flock; He gathers them in his arm, and carries them in his bosom, Isa. 40. 11. Strong Christians should be very careful to avoid what will offend weak ones, or lay a stumbling-block in their way. Shall we be void of compassion for them to whom Christ has shewn so much? Shall we sin against Christ, who suffered for us? Shall we set ourselves to defeat his gracious designs, and help to ruin those whom he died to save?

IV. He enforces all with his own example; (v. 13.) Wherefore if meat make my brother to offend, I will eat no flesh while the world standeth, lest I make my brother to offend. He does not say that he will never eat more. This were to destroy himself, and to commit a heinous sin, to prevent the sin and fall of a brother. Such evil must not be done, that good may come of it. But though it was necessary, yet since it was not necessary, he would not do it, though it was lawful to do it. He had such a value for the soul of his brother, that he would willingly deny himself in a matter of liberty, and forbear any particular food, which he might have lawfully eaten, and might like to eat, rather than lay a stumbling-block in a weak brother's way, and occasion his fall. Note, In following his example, without being clear in his mind whether it was lawful or no. Note, We should be very tender of doing any thing that may be an occasion of stumbling to others; though it may be innocent in itself. Liberty is valuable, but the weakness of a brother should induce, and sometimes bind, us to waive it. We must not rigorously claim or use our own rights, to the hurt and ruin of a brother's soul, and so the injury of our Redeemer, who died for him. Where it is certainly foreseen that my doing what I may forbear, will occasion a fellow-Christian to do what he ought to forbear, I shall offend, scandalize, or lay a stumbling-block in his way; which to do is a sin, however lawful the thing itself be, which is done. And if we must be so careful not to occasion other men's sins, how careful should we be to avoid sin ourselves. If we must not endanger other men's souls, how much should we be concerned not to destroy our own.

CHAP. IX.

In this chapter, the apostle seems to answer some cavils against himself. 1. He asserts his apostolical mission and authority, and gives in his success among them, as a testimony to it, v. 1-12. He shews he by laying right to his ministry, and defends it by several arguments from natural reason and the Mosaical law, and asserts it also to be a constitution of Christ, v. 3. 14. III. He shews that he had willingly retired this privilege and power for the benefit, v. 15. 18. IV. He specifies several other things, in which he had denied himself for the sake of other men's spiritual interest and salvation, v. 19. 23. And, V. Concludes his account, by showing how he proceeded in this course, even the prospect of an incorruptible crown, v. 24, to the end.

1. A M I not an apostle? Am I not free? Have I not seen Jesus Christ our Lord? Are not ye my work in the Lord? 2. If be not an apostle unto others, yet doubtless I am to you: for the seal of mine apostleship are ye in the Lord.

Blessed Paul, in the work of his ministry, not only met with opposition from those without, but discouragement from those within. He was under reproof; false brethren questioned his apostleship, and were very indurated to lessen his character, and sink his reputation; particularly here at Corinth, a place to which he had been instrumental of doing much good, and from which he had deserved well; and yet there were those among them, who in these heads created him great uneasiness. Note, It is no strange or new thing for a minister to meet with very unkind returns for great good-will to a people, and diligent and successful services among them. Some among the Corinthians questioned, if they did not disown, his apostolical character. To their cavils he here answers, and in such a manner as to set forth himself as a remarkable example of that self-denial, for the good of others, which he had been recommending in the former chapter.

And, 1. He asserts his apostolical mission and character; Am I not an apostle? Have I not seen Jesus Christ our Lord? To be a witness of his resurrection was one great branch of the apostolical charge. "Now," says Paul, have not I seen the Lord; though not immediately after his resurrection. See ch. 19. 4. "Am I not free? Have I not the same commission, and charge, and powers, with the other apostles? What respect, or honour, or subsistence, can they challenge, which I am not at liberty to demand as well as they?" It was not because he had no right to live of the gospel, that he maintained himself with his own hands, but for other reasons.

2. He offers the success of his ministry among them, and the good he had done to them, as a proof of his apostleship; Are not ye my work in the Lord? Through the blessing of Christ on my labours, have not I raised a church among you? The seal of mine apostleship are ye in the Lord. Your conversion by my means is a confirmation from God of my mission. Note, The ministers of Christ should not think it strange to be put upon the proof of their ministry, by some who have had experimental evidence of the power of it, and the presence of God with it.

3. He justly upbraids the Corinthians with their disrespect; Doubtless, if I am not an apostle to others, I am so to you, v. 2. I have laboured so long, and with so much success, among you, that you, above all others, should own and honour my character, and not call it in question. Note, It is no new thing for faithful ministers to meet with the worst treatment, where they might expect the best. This church at Corinth had as much reason to believe, and as little reason to question, his apostolical mission, as any; they had as much reason, perhaps more than any church, to pay him respect. He had been instrumental to bring them to the knowledge and faith of Christ; he laboured long among them, near two years, and he laboured to good purpose, God having much people among them. See Acts 8. 10, 11. It was aggravated ingratitude for this people to call in question his authority.

3. Mine answer to them that do examine me, is this: 4. Have we not power to eat and to drink? 5. Have we not power to lead about a sister, a wife, as well as other apostles, and as the brethren of the Lord, and Cephas? 6. Or I only and Barnabas, have we not power to forbear working? 7. Who goeth a warfare at any time at his own charges? Who planteth a vineyard, and eateth not of the fruit thereof? Or who feedeth a flock, and eateth not of the milk of the flock? 8. Say I these things as a man? Or saith not the law the same also? 9. For it is written in the law of Moses, Thou shalt not muzzle the mouth of the ox that treadeth out the corn. Doth God take care for oxen? 10. Or saith he it altogether for our sakes? For our sakes, no doubt, this is written: that he that plougheth should plough in hope; and he that thresheth in hope, should be partaker of his hope. 11. If we have sown unto you spiritual things, is it a great thing if we shall reap carnal things? 12. If others be partakers of this power over you, are we not rather? Nevertheless, we have not used this power; but suffer all things, lest we should hinder the gospel of Christ. 13. Do ye not know that they who minister about holy things, live of the things of the temple; and they which wait at the altar, are partakers with the altar? 14. Even so hath the Lord ordained, that they who preach the gospel, should live of the gospel.

Having asserted his apostolical authority, he proceeds to claim the rights belonging to his office, especially that of being supported by the church. I. States, v. 3-6. "Mine answer to them that do examine me, that enquire into mine authority, or the reasons of my conduct, if I am an apostle, is this; Have we not power to eat and drink, (v. 4.) or a right to maintenance? Have we not power to lead about a sister, a wife, as well as other apostles, and the brethren of the Lord, and Cephas; and not only to lead about ourselves, but have they maintained ourselves also?" Though Paul was at that time single, he had a right to take a wife when he pleased, and to lead her about with him, and expect a maintenance for her, as well as himself, from the churches. Perhaps Barnabas had a wife, as the other apostles certainly had, and led them about with them. For that a wife is here to be understood by the sisterwoman—Husbos's point, is plain from hence, that it would have been utterly unfit for the apostles to have carried about women with them, unless they were wives. The word implies, that they had power over them, and could require their attendance on them, which none could have over any, but wives or servants. Now the apostles, who worked for their bread, do not seem to have been in a capacity to buy or have servants to carry with them. Not to observe, that it was a common practice to have carried about even women-servants, and much more other women to whom they were not married, for which the apostles would never give any occasion. The apostle therefore plainly asserts, he had a right to marry as well as other apostles, and claim a maintenance for his wife, nay, and his children too, if he had any, from the churches, without labouring; with his own hands to procure it. Or I only and Barnabas, have we not power to forbear working? v. 6. In short, the apostle here claims a maintenance from the churches, both for him and his. This was due from them, and what he might claim. II. He proceeds, by several arguments, to prove his claim. 1. From the common practice and expectations of mankind. Those who addict and give themselves up to any way of business in the world, expect to be paid for it. Soldiers expect to be paid for their service. Husbandmen, as they expect to get a livelihood out of their labours. If they plant vineyards, and dress and cultivate them, it is with expectation of fruit; if they feed a flock, it is with the expectation of being fed and clothed by it; (v. 9.) Who goeth a warfare at any time at his own charge? Who planteth a vineyard, and eateth not the fruit thereof? Who feedeth a flock, and eateth not the milk of the flock? 11. Note, It is very natural, and very reasonable, for ministers to expect a livelihood out of their labours. He argues it out of the Jewish law; Say I these things as a man? Or saith not the law the same also? v. 8. Is this merely a dictate of common reason, and according to common usage only? No, it is also consonant to the old law. God had therein ordered, that the ox should not be muzzled, while he was treading out the corn; or hindered from eating, while he was preparing the corn for man's use, and treading it out of the ear. But this law was not chiefly given out of God's regard to oxen, or concern for them, but to teach mankind, that all due encouragement should be given to them who are employed by us, or labouring for our good; that the labourers should taste of the fruit of their labours. They who plough, should plough in hope; and they who reap, should be partakers of their hope, v. 10. The law saith this about oxen for our sakes. Note, They that lay themselves out to do our souls good, should not have their mouths muzzled, but have food provided for them. 3. He argues from common equity; If we have sown unto you spiritual things, is it a great thing if we shall reap your carnal things? What they had sown was much better than they expected, as being instruments of converting the world, leading them to eternal life, and labouring heartily to put them in possession of it. It was no great matter, surely, while they were giving themselves up to this work, to expect a support of their own temporal life. They had been instruments of conveying to them the greater spiritual blessings; and had they no claim to as great a share in their carnal things as necessary to subsist on, it was not less reasonable, that those who enjoy spiritual honours by the ministry of the word, should not grudge a maintenance to such as are employed in this work. If they have received a real benefit, one would think they could not grudge them this. What, get so much good by them, and yet grudge to do so little good to them? Is this grateful or equitable? 4. He argues from the maintenance they afforded others; If others are partakers of this power over you, are we not rather? You allow others this maintenance, and confess their claim just; but who has so just a claim as I from the church of Corinth? Who has given greater evidence of the apostolical mission? Who has laboured so much for your good, or done like service among you? Note, Ministers should be valued and provided for according to their worth. “Nevertheless,” says Paul, “we have not used this power; but suffer all things, lest we should hinder the gospel of Christ. We have not insisted on our right, but have rather been in straits, to serve the interests of the gospel, and promote the salvation of souls.” He renounced his right, rather than by claiming it he would hinder his success. He denied himself, for fear of giving offence; yet claims his right, lest his self-denial should prove prejudicial to the ministry. Note, He is likely to plead most effectually for the rights of others, who shews a generous disregard to his own. It is plain, in this case, that justice, and not self-love, is the principle by which he is actuated. 5. He argues from the old Jewish establishment; “Do ye not know, that they who minister about holy things, live of the things of the temple, and they which wait at the altar, are partakers with the altar?” v. 13. And if the Jewish priesthood was maintained on such conditions as those that were then offered, shall not Christ’s ministers have a maintenance out of their ministry? Is there not as much reason that we should be maintained as they?” 6. He asserts it to be the institution of Christ; “Even so hath the Lord ordained, that they who preach the gospel, should live of the gospel;” (v. 14.) should have a right to a maintenance, though not bound to demand it, and insist upon it. It is the people’s duty to maintain their minister, by Christ’s appointment, though it be not a duty bound on every minister to call for or accept it. He may wave his right, as Paul did, without being a sinner; but they transgress an appointment of Christ, who deny or withhold it. They who preach the gospel, have a right to live by it; and they who attend on their ministry, and yet take no thought about their subsistence, fail very much in their duty to Christ, and the respect owing to them. 15. But I have used none of these things. Neither have I written these things, that it should be so done unto me: for I were better for me to die, than that any man should make my glorying void. 16. For though I preach the gospel, I have nothing to glory of: for necessity is laid upon me; yea, woe is unto me if I preach not the gospel. 17. For if I do this thing willingly, I have a reward: but if against my will, a dispensation of the gospel is committed unto me. 18. What is my reward then? Verily, that, when I preach the gospel, I may make the gospel of Christ without charge, that I abuse not my power in the gospel. Here he tells them that he had, notwithstanding, waved his privilege, and lays down his reason for doing it. 1. He tells them that he had neglected to claim his right in times past; “I have used none of these things above, for I have not used them by virtue of them, not to have done it at all, or for any reason of my own, but for your sakes, to make my claim now. Though he here asserts his right, yet he does not claim his due; but denies himself for their sakes, and the gospel. Vol. vi.—3 I.}
This duty. They must make their business a pleasure, and not esteem it a drudgery. And they who, out of regard to the honour of God, or good of souls, give up their claim to a maintenance, should do this duty willingly, if they would be accepted in it, or rewarded for it. But whether the duty of the office be done willingly, or with reluctance; whether the heart be in it, or averse from it; all in office have a trust and charge from God, for which they must be accountable. Ministers have a dispensation of the gospel, or stewardship—sirisavais, (Luke 16. 7.) committed to them. Note, Christ's willing servants shall fail not of a recompense, and that proportioned to their fidelity, zeal, and diligence; and his slothful and unwilling servants shall all be called to an account. Taking his name, and professing to do his business, will make men accountable at his bar. And how sad an account have slothful servants to give! V. The apostle sums up the argument, by laying before them the encouraging hope he had of a large recompense for his remarkable self-denial; What is my reward them? v. 18. What is it I expect a recompense from God for? That when I preach the gospel, I may make it without charge, that I abuse not my power to the gospel. Or, not so to claim my right of power. I might have interceded, having the great intentions and ends of my office, but renounce them for the sake of those." It is an abuse of power, to employ it against the very ends for which it is given. And the apostle would never use his power, or privilege of being maintained by his ministry, so as to frustrate the ends of it, but would willingly and cheerfully deny himself for the honour of Christ, and the interest of souls. That minister who follows his example, may have cheerful expectations of a recompense. 19. For though I be free from all men, yet have I made myself servant unto all, that I might gain the more. 20. And unto the Jews, I became as a Jew, that I might gain the Jews; to them that are under the law, as under the law, that I might gain them that are under the law; 21. To them that are without law, as without law, (being not without law to God, but under the law to Christ,) that I might gain them that are without law. 22. To the weak became I as weak, that I might gain the weak; I am made all things to all men, that I might by all means save some. 23. And this I do for the gospel's sake, that I might be partaker thereof with you. The apostle takes occasion, from what he had before discoursed, to mention some instances of his self-denial, and parting with his liberty for the benefit of others. I. He asserts his liberty; (v. 19.) Though I be free from all men. He was free-born, a citizen of Rome. He was in bondage to none, nor depended upon any for his subsistence; yet he made himself a servant to all, that he might gain the more. He carried it as a servant; he laboured for their good as a servant; he was careful to please, as a servant to his master; he acted, by way of means as if he had no privileges; and this, that he might gain the more, or make the more converts to Christianity. He made himself a servant, that they might be made free. 11. He specifies some particulars wherein he made himself a servant to all. He accommodated himself to all sorts of people. 1. To the Jews, and those under the law, he became a Jew, and as under the law to gain them. Though he looked on the ceremonial law as a yoke taken off by Christ, yet in many instances he submitted to it, that he might work upon the Jews, remove their prejudices, prevail with them to hear the gospel, and win them over to Christ. 2. To those that are without law, as without law, that is, to the Gentiles, whether converted to the Christian faith or not. In innocent things he could make himself to both, as Christ, in his章程, and the Jews, in what was of a religious nature. He thus would reason with the philosophers in their own way. And as to converted Gentiles, he behaved among them as one that was not under the bondage of the Jewish laws, as he had asserted and maintained concerning them; though he did not act as a lawless person, but as one who was bound by the laws of Christ. He would transgress no laws of Christ, to please or honour any man; but he would accommodate himself to all men, where he might do it lawfully, to gain some. Paul was the apostle of the Gentiles, and so, one would have thought, might have excused himself from complying with the Jews; and yet, to do them good, and win them over to Christ, he did, in innocent things, neglect the power he had to do otherwise, and conformed to some of their usages and laws. And though he might, by that, lose the advantage over the Gentiles, yet he acted himself, as much as he innocently might, to their prejudices and ways of thinking. Doing good was the study and business of his life; and, so that he might reach this end, he did not stand on privileges and punctilios. 3. To the weak he became as weak, that he might gain the weak, v. 22. He was willing to make the best of them. He did not despise nor judge them, but became as one of them, forbore to use his liberty for their sake, and was careful to lay no stumbling-block in their way. Where any, through the weakness of their understanding, or the strength of their prejudices, were likely to fall into sin, or fall off from the gospel into heathen idolatry, through his use of his liberty, he restrained himself. He denied himself for their sakes, that he might insinuate into their affections, and gain their souls. In short, he became all things to all men, that he might by all means, all lawful means, gain some. He would not sin against God, to save the soul of his neighbour, but he would very cheerfully and readily deny himself. The rights of God he could not give up, but he might resign his own, and he very often did it for the good of others. III. He assigns his reason for acting in this manner; (v. 23.) This I do for the gospel's sake, and that I might be partaker thereof with you; that is, for the honour of Christ, whose the gospel is, and for the salvation of souls, for which it was designed, and that he and they might communicate in the privileges of it, or partake together of them. For these ends did he thus condescend, deny himself as to his liberty, and accommodate himself to the capacities and expectations of those with whom he had to do, where he lawfully might. Note, A heart warmed with zeal for God, and breathing after the salvation of men, will not plead and insist upon rights and privileges in bar to this design. They manifestly abuse their power in the gospel, who employ it not to edification, but destruction, and therefore breathe nothing of its spirit. 24. Know ye not that they who run in a race, run all, but one receiveth the prize? So run, that ye may obtain. 25. And every man that striveth for the mastery, is temperate in all things: now, they do it to obtain a corruptible crown, but we an incorruptible.
I. CORINTHIANS, X.

26. I therefore so run, not as uncertainly: so fight I, not as one that beateth the air: 27. But I keep under my body, and bring it into subjection: lest that by any means, when I have preached to others, myself should be a cast-away.

In these verses the apostle hints at the great encouragement he had to act in this manner. He had a glorious prize, an incorruptible crown, in view. Upon this head, he compares himself to the racers and combatants in the Isthmian games, an allusion well known to the Corinthians, because they were celebrated in the neighborhood; "Know ye not that they which run in a race, run all, but one obtaineth the prize? v. 24. All run at your games, but one gets the race only, and wins the crown." And here he,

I. Excites them to their duty: "So run, that ye may obtain. It is quite otherwise in the Christian race than in your races; only one wins the prize in them. You may all run, so as to obtain. You have great encouragement, therefore, to persist constantly, and diligently, and vigorously, in your course. There is room for all to get the prize. You cannot fail if you run well. Yet there should be a noble emulation; you should endeavor to outdo one another. And it is a glorious contest, who shall get first to heaven, or have the best rewards in that blessed world. I make it my endeavor thus to run; so do you. No man ever more heartily pursued his public in your Isthmian races, than I do after the recompense of the reward; so do you, as you see me go before you." Note, It is the duty of Christians to follow their ministers closely in the chase of eternal glory, and the honour and duty of ministers to lead them in the way.

II. He directs them in their course, by setting more fully to view his own example, still carrying on the allusion. 1. They that run in their games, were kept to a set diet; * Every man that striveth for the mastery, is temperate in all things, v. 25. The fighters and wrestlers in your exercises are kept to diet and discipline; nay, they keep themselves to it. They do not indulge themselves, but restrain themselves from the food they might eat, and so from the liberties they used on other occasions. And should not Christians, move more to confine themselves to their liberty, for so glorious an end as winning the race, and obtaining the prize set before them? They used a very sparse diet, and coarse food, and denied themselves much, to prepare for their race and combat; so do I; so should you, after my example. It is hard, if, for the heavenly crown, you cannot abstain from heathen sacrifices. 2. They were not only temperate, but inwardly to hardships. They who fought with one another there their exercises, prepared themselves by beating the air, as the apostle calls it, or by throwing out their arms, and thereby inuring themselves, beforehand, to deal about their blows in close combat, or brandish them by way of flourish. There is no room for any such exercise in the Christian warfare. Christians are ever in close combat, and therefore their enemies make use of all ways of fighting and hearty opposition, and so are ever exposed to hardship, and for this reason they must lay about them in earnest, and never drop the contest, or flag and faint in it. They must fight, not as those that beat the air, but must strive against their enemies, with all their might. One enemy the apostle here mentions, that is, the body; this must be kept under, beaten black and blue; for some combatants were in these Grecian games, and thereby thrust into such extreme, as they say, that we are to understand fleshly appetites and inclinations. These the apostle set himself to curb and conquer, and in this the Corinthians were bound to imitate him. Note, They who would aight pursue the interests of their souls, must beat down their bodies, and keep them under. They must combat hard with fleshly lusts, till they have subdued them; and not indulge a wanton appetite, and long for heathenish sacrifices, or cut them, to please their flesh, at the hazard of their brethren's souls. The body must be made to serve the mind, not suffered to lord over it.

III. The apostle pressers this advice on the Corinthians, by proper arguments drawn from the same controivers. 1. They take pains, and undergo all those hardships, to obtain a corruptible crown; (* v. 23.) but we an incorruptible. They who conquered in these games, were only crowned with the withering leaves of the victor, and not with the firm and lasting crown of glory. But Christians have an incorruptible crown in view, a crown of glory that never fadeth away, an inheritance incorruptible, reserved in heaven for them. And would they yet suffer themselves to be out-done by these racers or wrestlers? Can they use abstinence in diet, exert themselves in racing, expose their bodies to so much hardship in combat, who have no more in view than the trilling huzzas of a giddy multitude, or a crown of laurel? Shall they not set their hearts on the prize, for the approbation of the sovereign Judge, and a crown of glory from his hands, stretch forward in the heavenly race, and exert themselves in beating down their fleshly inclinations, and the strong holds of sin? 2. The racers in these games run at uncertainty. All run, but one receives the prize, v. 24. Every racer, therefore, is at a great uncertainty whether he shall win it or not. But the Christian runner is at no such uncertainty. Every one may run hereafter to obtain; but then he must run within the lines, he must keep to the path of duty prescribed, which, some think, is the meaning of running not as uncertainly, v. 26. He who keeps within the limits prescribed, and keeps on in his race, will never miss his crown, though others may get their's before him. And would the Grecian racers keep within their bounds, and exert themselves to the very last, when one only could win, and all must be uncertain which that one would be? And shall not Christians be much more exact and vigorous, when all are sure of a crown when they come to the end of their race? 3. He sets before himself and them the danger of yielding to fleshly inclinations, and pampering the body, and its lusts and appetites; * I keep my body under, lest that by any means, when I have preached to others, and suffered unto the point of the cross, I should be brought into disreputation, or the church of God be troubled, or I should make the name of Christ profane in the sight of God; 1 Cor. x. 33. And I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ, lest I should be as he himself, who had preached to others, should let miss the crown, be disapproved and rejected by his sovereign Judge. A holy fear of himself was necessary to preserve the fidelity of an apostle; and how much more necessary is it to our preservation? Note, Holy fear of ourselves, and not presumptuous confidence, is the best security against apostasy from God, and final rejection by him.

CHAP. X.

In this chapter, the apostle prosecutes the argument at the close of the last, and, I. Warns the Corinthians against security, by the example of the Jews, who, notwithstanding their profound doctrine, and their strong arguments, were cast down by the Galatians, left undone. God for their many sins, their history being left upon record for the admonition of Christians, v. 1. 14. II. He resumes his former argument. (ch. 8.) about eating things offered to idols, and shows, that it is utterly inconsistent with true Christianity, that it was downright gross idolatry.
1. *Moreover, brethren, I would not that ye should be ignorant, how that all our fathers were under the cloud, and all passed through the sea; 2. And were all baptized unto Moses in the cloud, and in the sea; 3. And did all eat the same spiritual meat; 4. And did all drink the same spiritual drink: (for they drank of that spiritual Rock that followed them; and that Rock was Christ:) 5. But with many of them God was not well pleased; for they were overthrown in the wilderness.

In order to dissuade the Corinthians from communion with idolaters, and security in any sinful course, he sets before them the example of the Jews, the church under the Old Testament, who enjoyed great privileges, but having been guilty of heinous provocations, they fell under very grievous punishments. In these verses he reckons up their privileges, which, in the main, were the same with our's. 1. He prefaces this discourse with a note of regard; "Moreover, brethren, I would not that ye should be ignorant. I would not have you without the knowledge of this matter; it is a thing worthy both of your knowledge and attention. It is a history very instructive and monitory." Judaism was Christianity under a veil, wrapt up in types and dark hints. The gospel was preached to them, in their legal rites and sacrifices. And the providence of God toward them, and what happened to them notwithstanding these privileges, may and ought to be warnings to us. 2. He specifies some of their privileges. He begins, 1. With their deliverance from Egypt; "Our fathers, that is, the ancestors of us Jews, were under the cloud, and all passed through the sea. They were all under the divine covering and conduct." The cloud served for both purposes: it sometimes contracted itself into a cloudy pillar, shining on one side to show them their way, dark on the other to hide them from their pursuers enemies; and sometimes spread itself over them as a mighty sheet, to defend them from the burning sun in the sandy desert, Ps. 105. 39. They were miraculously conducted through the Red Sea, where the pursuing Egyptians were drowned; it was as a fate to them, but a grave to these. A proper type of our redemption by Christ, who saves us by conquering and destroying his enemies, and ours. They were very dear to God, and much in his favour, when he would work such miracles for their deliverance, and take them so immediately under his guidance and protection. 2. They had sacraments like our's; (1.) They were all baptized unto Moses in the cloud, and in the sea, (v. 2.) or into Moses, that is, brought under obligation to Moses's law and covenant, as we are by the Christian law and covenant. It was to them a typical baptism. (2.) They did all eat of the same spiritual meat, and drink of the same spiritual drink, that we do. The manna on which they fed was a type of Christ crucified, the Bread which came down from heaven, whose eateh shall live for ever. Their drink was a stream fetched from a Rock which followed them in all their journeyings in the wilderness; and this Rock was Christ, that is, in type and figure. He is the Rock on which the Christian church is built; and of the streams that issue from him do all believers drink, and are refreshed. Now all the Jews did eat of this meat, and drink of this rock, called here a spiritual rock, because it typified spiritual things. These were great privileges. One would think that this should have saved them; that all who ate of that spiritual meat, and drank of that spiritual drink, should have been holy and acceptable to God. Yet was it otherwise; "With many of them God was not well pleased, for they were overthrown in the wilderness, v. 5. Note, Men may enjoy many and great spiritual privileges in this world, and yet come short of eternal life. Many of those who were baptized unto Moses in the cloud and sea, that is, had their faith of his divine commission confirmed by these miracles, were yet overthrown in the wilderness, and never saw the promised land. Let none presume upon their great privileges, or profession of the truth; these will not secure heavenly happiness, nor prevent judgments here on earth, except the root of the matter be in us. 6. Now these things were our examples, to the intent we should not lust after evil things, as they also lusted. 7. Neither be ye idolaters, as were some of them; as it is written, The people sat down to eat and drink, and rose up to play. 8. Neither let us commit fornication, as some of them committed, and fell in one day and twenty thousand. 9. Neither let us tempt Christ, as some of them also tempted, and were destroyed of serpents. 10. Neither murmur ye, as some of them also murmured, and were destroyed of the destroyer. 11. Now all these things happened unto them for ensamples: and they are written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the world are come. 12. Wherefore let him that thinketh he standeth, take heed lest he fall. 13. There hath no temptation taken you, but such as is common to man: but God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able; but will with the temptation also make a way to escape, that ye may be able to bear it. 14. Wherefore, my dearly beloved, flee from idolatry.

The apostle, having recited their privileges, proceeds here to an account of their faults and punishments, their sins and plagues, which are left upon record, for an example to us; a warning against the like sins, if we would escape the like punishments. We must not do as they did, lest we suffer as they suffered. Several of their sins are specified, as cautions to us; as, 1. We should shun inordinate desires after carnal objects; not lust after evil things, as they lusted, Ps. 110. 4. They had food for their supply, but, not content with that, they asked meat for their lusts, Ps. 106. 14. Carnal desires get head by indulgence, and therefore should be observed and checked in their first rise: if once they prevail, and bear away in us, we know not whither they will carry us. This

II. He warns against idolatry; (v. 7.) Neither be ye idolaters, as were some of them; as it is written, The people sat down to eat and drink, and rose up to play. The sin of the golden calf is referred to, Exod. 32. 6. They first sacrificed to their idol, then feasted on the sacrifices, and then danced before it. Though only eating and drinking are mentioned here, yet the sacrifice preceded. They were led on to the case of the Corinthians, who were tempted to feast on the heathen sacrifices, things offered to idols, though they do not seem to have been under any temptation to sacrifice themselves. Even eating and drinking of the sacrifices before the idol, and as things sacrificed, was idolatry, which, by the example of the Israelites, they should be warned to avoid.

III. He cautions against fornication, a sin to which the inhabitants of Corinth were in a peculiar manner addicted. They had a temple among them dedicated to Venus, that is, to lust, with above a thousand priestesses belonging to it, all common harlots. How needful was a caution against fornication, to those who lived in so corrupt a city, and had been used to such dissolute manners, especially when they were under temptations to idolatry too, and spiritual corruptness, which is the habit of fornication. Most of the gods whom the heathens served, were represented as very patterns of lewdness; and much lewdness was committed in the very worship of many of them. Many of the Jewish writers, and many Christians after them, think that such worship was paid to Baal-Peor; and that fornication was committed with the daughters of Moab, in the worship of those gods, both to spiritual and corporeal whoredom; first, to feast on the sacrifice, if not to do more beastly acts, in honour of the idol, and then to defile themselves with strange flesh; (Numb. 25.) which brought on a plague, that in one day slew twenty-three thousand, beside those who fell by the hand of public justice. Note, Whoremongers and adulterers God will judge, in whatever external relation they may stand to him, and whatsoever outward privileges he may bestow upon them. Let us fear the sins of Israel, if we would shun their plagues.

IV. He warns us against tempting Christ, (as some of them tempted, and were destroyed of serpents, v. 9.) or provoking him to jealousy, v. 22. He was with the church in the wilderness; he was the Angel of the covenant, who went before them. But he was greatly grieved and provoked by them many ways; They speak against him and Moses, Wherefore have ye brought us out of Egypt to die in the wilderness? For which reason God sent fiery serpents among them, (Numb. 21. 5, 6.) by which many of them were stung mortally. And it is but just to fear, that such as tempt Christ under the present dispensation, will be left by him in the power of the old serpent.

V. He warns against murmuring; Neither murmur ye, as some of them also murmured, and were destroyed of the destroyer, (v. 10.) by a destroying angel, an executioner of divine vengeance. They quarelled with God, and murmured against Moses his minister, when any difficulties pressed them. When they met with discouragement in the way to Canaan, they were very apt to fly in the face of their leaders, they were for disputing them, they were for taking them to Egypt unless the consent of others of their own choosing. Somewhat like this seems to have been the case of the Corinthians; they murmured against Paul, and in him against Christ, and seem to have set up other teachers, who would indulge and soothe them in their inclinations, and particularly in a revolt to idolatry. Rather let them feast on idol sacri-ices, than bear the reproach, or expose themselves to the ill-will, of their neighbours. Such conduct was very provoking to God, and was likely to bring upon them swift destruction, as it did on the Israelites, Numb. 14. 37. Note, Murmuring against divine dispositions and commands, is a sin that greatly provokes, especially when it grows to such a head as to issue in apostacy, and a revolt from him and his good ways.

1. The apostle subjoins to these particular cautions a more general one; (v. 11.) All these things happen... to them for an example, as we are written for our admonition. Not only the laws and edicts of the Jews, but the providences of God toward them, were typical. Their sins against God, and backslidings from him, were typetical of the infidelity of many under the gospel. God's judgments on them were types of spiritual judgments now. Their exclusion from the earthly Canaan typified the exclusion of many under the gospel on earth, the heavenly Canaan, for their unbelief. Their history was written, as a standing monitory to the church, even under the last and most perfect dispensation; To us, on whom the end of the world is come, the concluding period of God's gracious government over men. Note, Nothing in scripture is written in vain. God had wise and gracious purposes towards us in leaving the Jewish history upon record; and it is our wisdom and duty to receive it into our church discipline. Upon this hint the apostle grounds a caution; (v. 12.) Let him take heed, etc. Let him who standeth, take heed lest he fall. Note, The judgments sustained by us should be cautions to us. He that thinks he stands, should not be confident and secure, but upon his guard. Others have fallen, and so may we. And then we are most likely to fall, when we are most confident of our own strength, and Titius most apt to be secure, and off our guard. Disturb not himself, put him at once upon vigilance and dependence on God, is the Christian's best security against all sin. Note, He who thinks he stands, is not likely to keep his footing, if he fears no fall, nor guards against it. God has not promised to keep us from falling, if we do not look to ourselves; his protection supposes our own care and caution.

2. But to this word of caution he adds a word of comfort, v. 13. Though it is displeasing to God, and to us to presume, it is not pleasing to him for us to despair. If the former be a great sin, the latter is far from being innocent. Though we must fear and take heed lest we fall, yet should we not be terrified and amazed; for either our trials will be proportioned to our strength, or strength shall be supplied in proportion to our temptations. We live indeed in a tempting world, where we are compassed about with snares. Every place, condition, relation, employment, and enjoyment, abounds with them; yet what comfort may we fetch from such a passage? For, (1.) "No temptation," says the apostle, "hath yet taken you, but such as is common to man, what is human; that is, such as you may expect from men of such principles as heathens, and such powerful; or else such as spring not from mankind in the present state; or else, such as the spirit of God, or the fear of God, or the love of God, or the love of more men may bear you through." Note, The trials of common Christians are but common trials: others have the like burdens, and the like temptations: what they bear up under, and break through, we may also. (2.) God is faithful. Though Satan be a deceiver, God is true. Men may be false, and the world may be false; but God is faithul, and our strength and security are in him. Keep your covenant, and will never fail the filial heart, or the tenderest of his children. (3.) He is wise as well as faithful, and will proportion our burden to our strength. He will not suffer us to be tempted above what we are able. He knows what we can bear, and what we can bear up against; and he will, in his wise providence, either proportion our temptations to our strength, or make us able to grapple with them. He will take care that we be not overcome, if we rely upon him, and resolve to approve ourselves faithful to him. We need not perplex ourselves with the difficulties in our way, when God will take care that they shall not be too great for us to encounter; especially, (4.) When he will make them to issue well. He will make a way to escape, either the trial itself, or at least the mischief of it. There is no valley so dark, but he can find a way through it; no affliction so grievous, but he can prevent, or remove, or enable us to support, and, in the end, over-rule to our advantage.

3. And upon this argument he grounds another caution against idolatry; Wherefore, my dearly beloved, flee from idolatry. Observe, (1.) How he addresses them; My dearly beloved. It is out of tender affection to them that he presses this advice upon them. (2.) The matter of his advice; "Flee idolatry; shun it, and all approaches towards it." Idolatry is the most heinous injury and affront to the true God. It is transferring his worship and honour to a rival. 3. The ground of this advice; "Seeing you have such encouragement to trust God, and be faithful, do you approve yourselves men, be not shaken by any discouragements your heathen enemies may lay before you. God will succour and assist, help you in your trials, and help you out of them; and therefore be not guilty of any idolatrous compliances." We have all the encouragement in the world to flee sin, and prove faithful to God. We cannot fall by a temptation, if we cleave fast to him.

15. I speak as to wise men: judge ye what I say. 16. The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not the communion of the blood of Christ? The bread which we break, is it not the communion of the body of Christ? 17. For we, being many, are one body, and one Spirit: for we are made partakers of one bread, or loaf; (v. 17.) which I think is thus more truly rendered; "By partaking of one broken loaf, the emblem of our Saviour's broken body, who is the only true Bread that came down from heaven, we coalesce into one body, become members of him and one another." Those who truly partake by faith, have this communion with Christ, and one another: and those who eat the outward elements, make profession of having this communion of belonging to God, and the blessed fraternity of his people and worshippers. This is the true meaning of this holy rite.

III. He confirms this from the Jewish worship and customs; Behold Israel after the flesh: are not they, who eat of the sacrifices, partakers of the altar? 19. What say I then? That the idol is any thing, or that which is offered in sacrifice to idols is any thing? 20. But I say, that the things which the Gentiles sacrifice, they sacrifice to devils, and not to God: and I would not that ye should have fellowship with devils. 21. Ye cannot drink the cup of the Lord, and the cup of devils: ye cannot be partakers of the Lord's table, and of the table of devils. 22. Do we provoke the Lord to jealousy? Are we stronger than he?

In this passage the apostle urges the general caution against idolatry, in the particular case of eating the heathen sacrifices as such, and out of any religious respect to the idol, to whom they were sacrificed.

I. He prefaces his argument with an appeal to their own reason and judgment; "I speak to wise men: judge ye what I say, v. 15. Ye are great pretenders to wisdom, to close reasoning and argument; I can leave it with your own reason and conscience, whether I do not argue justly." Note, It is no dishonour to an inspired teacher, nor disadvantage to his argument, to appeal for the truth of it to the reason and consciences of his hearers. It comes upon them with the greater force, when it comes with this conviction. Paul, an inspired apostle, would yet, in some cases, leave it with the Corinthians to judge, whether what he taught was not conformable to their own light and sense.

II. He states his argument from the Lord's supper; The cup which we bless, is it not the communion of the blood of Christ? The bread which we break, is it not the communion of the body of Christ? Is not this sacred rite an instrument of communion with God? Do we not therein profess to be in friendship, and to have fellowship with him, is it not a token whereby we profess to hold communion with Christ, whose body was broken, and blood shed, to take effect in our security of our communion with him? And can we be in alliance with Christ, or friendship with God, without being devoted to him? In short, the Lord's supper is a feast on the sacrificed body and blood of the Lord; fuipum ex obiatis. And to eat of the feast, is to partake of the sacrifice, and so to be his guests, to whom the sacrifice was offered, and this in token of friendship with him. Thus to partake of the Lord's table, is to profess ourselves his guests, and covenant with him on purpose and intention of this symbolical eating and drinking; it is holding communion with God, and partaking of those privileges, and professing ourselves under those obligations, which result from the death and sacrifice of Christ, and this in conjunction with all true Christians, with whom we have communion also in this ordinance. Because bread, when broken, being many, are one body, for we are made partakers of one bread, or loaf; (v. 17.) which I think is thus more truly rendered; "By partaking of one broken loaf, the emblem of our Saviour's broken body, who is the only true Bread that came down from heaven, we coalesce into one body, become members of him and one another." Those who truly partake by faith, have this communion with Christ, and one another: and those who eat the outward elements, make profession of having this communion of belonging to God, and the blessed fraternity of his people and worshippers. This is the true meaning of this holy rite.

IV. He applies this to the argument against feasting with idolaters on their sacrifices, and to prove that they do so, idolaters. This he does, 1. By following the principle on which they would argue it to be lawful, namely, that an idol was nothing. Many of them were nothing at all, none of them had any divinity in them; what was sacrificed to idols was nothing, no way changed from what it was before, but was every whit as fit for food, considered in itself. They indeed seem to argue, that, because an idol was nothing, what was offered upon it was no sacrifice, and to be sanctified thereby; and therefore sure to worship God, and be in alliance or covenant with him, even the God of Israel, to whom the sacrifice was made: this was a symbol or token of holding communion with him.
the god to whom it was made, and have fellowship or communion with him: just as he who eats the Lord's supper, is supposed to partake in the Christian sacrifice; or as they who eat the Jewish sacrifices, did partake of what was offered on their altar. But heathens sacrificed to devils: "Therefore do not feast on their sacrifices. Doing it is a token of your having fellowships with the devils, with whom the angels sinned. I would not have you be in communion with devils." (2.) It was a virtual renouncing of Christianity; Ye cannot drink the cup of the Lord, and the cup of devils: ye cannot be partakers of the Lord's table, and the table of devils, v. 21. To partake of this Christian feast, was to have communion with Christ: to partake of the feasts made out of honour to the heathen idols, and made of things served to them, was to have communion with devils. Now this was to compound contraries; it was by no means consistent. Communion with Christ, and communion with devils, could never be had at once. One must be renounced, if the other was maintained. He who held communion with Christ, must renounce that with devils: he who held communion with devils, must by that very deed renounce communion with Christ. And what a monstrous self-contradiction must this be, that would partake of the Lord's table, and yet partake of the table of demons! God and Mammon can never be served together, nor fellowship be at once had with Christ and Satan. Those who communicate with devils, must virtually renounce Christ. This may also intimate, that such as indulge themselves in gluttony or drunkenness, and by so doing make their own table the table of devils, or keep up fellowship with Satan by a course of known and willful wickedness, cannot partake truly of the cup and table of the Lord. They may use the sign, but do not the thing signified thereby. For a man can never be at once in communion with Christ and his church, and yet in fellowship with Satan. Note, How much reason have we to look to it, that every sin and idol be renounced by us, when we eat and drink at the Lord's table.

He warns them, by the whole, against such idolatry, by signifying to them that God is a jealous God; v. 22.) Do we provoke the Lord to jealousy? Are we stronger than he? It is very probable that many among the Corinthians made light of being at these heathen feasts, and thought there was no harm in it. But the apostle bids them beware. The reason with which the second commandment is enforced, is, I am a jealous God. God cannot endure a rival in matter of worship; nor give his glory, nor suffer it to be given, to another. They who have fellowship with other gods, provoke him to jealousy, Deut. 32. 16. And before this be done, persons should consider whether they are stronger than he. It is a dangerous thing to provoke God's anger, unless we could withstand his power. But who can stand before him when he is angry? Numb. 1. 6. This should further make us shun all that is like the godliness of the heathens, and in league with it, while yet they profess to keep up communion with Christ. Is it not the way to provoke his jealousy and indignation? Note, Attention to the greatness of God's power should restrain us from provoking his jealousy, from doing any thing to displease him. Shall we rouse almighty wrath? And how shall we withstand it? Are we a match for God? Can we resist his power, or control it? And if not, shall we arm it against us, by provoking him to jealousy? No, let us fear his power, and let this restrain us from all provocation.

23. All things are lawful for me, but all things are not expedient: all things are lawful for me, but all things are not expedient.

I. Corinthians, X, 24. Let no man seek his own, but every man another's wealth. 25. Whatsoever is sold in the shambles, that eat, asking no question for conscience-sake: 26. For the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof. 27. If any of them that believe not, bid you to a feast, and ye be disposed to go: whatsoever is set before you, eat, asking no question for conscience-sake. 28. But if any man say unto you, This is offered in sacrifice unto idols, eat not, for his sake that showed it, and for conscience-sake: for the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof. 29. Conscience, I say, not thine own, but of the other: for why is my liberty judged of another man's conscience? 30. For, if I by grace be a partaker, why am I evil spoken of for that for which I give thanks? 31. Whether therefore ye eat or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God. 32. Give no offence, neither to the Jews, nor to the Gentiles, nor to the church of God: 33. Even as I please all men in all things, not seeking mine own profit, but the profit of many, that they may be saved.

In this passage, the apostle shews in what instances, notwithstanding, Christians might lawfully eat what had been sacrificed to idols. They must not eat it out of religious respect to the idols, nor go into his temple, and hold a feast there, upon what they knew was an idol-sacrifice; nor perhaps out of the temple, if they knew it was a feast held upon a sacrifice: but there were cases wherein they might eat what had been offered, without sin. Some such the apostle here enumerates. But,

I. He gives a caution against abusing our liberty in lawful things. That may be lawful, which is not expedient, which will not edify. A Christian must not barely consider what is lawful, but what is expedient, and for the use of edification. A private Christian should do so even in his private concerns. He must not seek his own only, but his neighbour's wealth. He must be concerned not to hurt his neighbour, nor to be concerned to promote his welfare; and must consider how to act, so that he may help others, and not hinder them, in their holiness, comfort, or salvation. They who allow themselves in every thing not plainly sinful in itself, will often do much mischief by accident, and do much mischief to others. Every thing lawful if itself to be done, is not therefore lawfully done. Circumstances may make that a sin, which in itself is none. These must be weighed, and the expediency of an action, and its tendency to edification, must be considered before it be done. Note, The welfare of others, as well as our own convenience, must be consulted in many things we do, if we would do them to the best.

as such might be bought and used; for the earth is the Lord’s, and the fulness thereof; (v. 26.) and the fruit and products of the earth were designed by him, the great Proprietor, for the use and subsistence of mankind, and more especially of his own children and servants. It is with respect to the property of God, and with reason, if it be received with thanksgiving; for it is sanctified by the word of God and prayer. 1 Tim. 4. 4. To the pure all things are pure, Tit. 1. 15. Note, Though it is sinful to use any food in an idolatrous manner, it is no sin, after such abuse, to apply it, in a holy manner, to its common use.

II. He adds, that if they were invited by any heathen acquaintance to a feast, they should go and eat what was set before them, without asking questions; lest, though they knew things sacri-fied to idols were served up at such entertainments, as well as sold in the shambles. Note, The apostle does not prohibit their going to a feast, upon the invitation of them that believe not. There is a civility owing even to infidels and heathens. Christianity does by no means bind us up from the common offices of humanity, or allow us an uncourtly be-davour to any of them, provided however they may not encourage their idolatrous sentiments or practices. And when Christians were invited to feast with infidels, they were not to ask needless questions about the food set before them, but eat without scruple. Needless inquiries might perplex their minds and consciences, for which reason they were to be avoided. Any thing fit to be eaten, that was set before them as a common entertainment, they might cheerfully eat. And why should they knowingly inquire, whether what was set before them had been sacrificed? It is to be understood of civil feasting, not religious; for these last among the heathens were few’s upon their sacrifices, which he had condemned before, as a participation in their idolatrous worship.

At a common feast they might expect common food; and they needed not to move scruples in their own minds, whether what was served before them was otherwise or no. Note, Though Christians should be very careful to know and understand their duty, yet they should not, by needless inquiries, perplex themselves.

IV. Yet even at such an entertainment, he adds, if any should say it was a thing that had been offered to idols, they should refrain; Eat not, for his sake that sinned, and for conscience-sake. Whether it were the master of the feast, or any of the guests; whether it were spoken in the hearing of all, or whispered in the ear; they should refrain for his sake who suggested this to them, whether he were an infidel, or an infirm Christian; and for conscience-sake, out of regard to conscience, that they might shew a regard to it in themselves, and keep up a regard to it in others. This he backs with the same reason as the former; for the earth is the Lord’s. There is food enough provided by our common Lord, of which every man may eat and be satisfied. But this doctrine may be variously improved, as here; “The earth is the Lord’s, therefore you may eat any thing without scruple, that is set before you as common food; and yet, because the earth is the Lord’s, eat nothing that will give offence, lay a stumbling-block before others, and encourage some in idolatry, or tempt others to eat when they are not clear in their own mind that it is lawful for them to eat.” Note, Christians should be very cautious of doing what may thus prejudice the consciences of others, and weaken their authority with them, which is by all means to be kept up.

V. He urges them to refrain, where they will give offence, while yet he allows it lawful to eat what was set before them as common food, though it had been sacrificed. “Another man’s conscience is no measure to our conduct. What he thinks unlawful, is not therefore made unlawful to me, but may be a matter of liberty still; and as long as I own God as the Giver of my food, and render him his thanks for it, it is very unjust to reprehend me for using it.” This must be understood abstracted from the scandal given, by eating in the circumstance mentioned. Though some understand it to mean, “Why should I, by using the liberty I have, give occasion to those who are scandalized, to speak evil of me?” According to that advice of the apostle, (Rom. 14. 16.) Let not your good be evil spoken of. Note, Christians should take care not to use their liberty to the hurt of others, nor their own reproach.

VI. The apostle takes occasion from this discourse to lay down a general rule for Christians’ conduct, and apply it to this particular case, (v. 31, 32.) namely, that in eating and drinking, and in all we do, we should aim at the glory of God, at pleasing and honouring him. This is the fundamental principle of practical godliness. The great end of all practical religion must direct us, where particular and express rules are wanting. Nothing must be done against the glory of God, and the good of our neighbours, connected with it. Nay, the tendency of our behaviour to the common good, and the credit of our holy religion, should give direction to it. And therefore nothing should be done by us, to offend any, whether Jew, or Gentile, or the church, v. 32. This Jews should not be unnecessarily grieved or prejudiced; nor have such abhorrence of idols, that they reckon every thing offered to them, thereby defiled, and that it will pollute and render culpable all who partake of it; nor should heathens be countenanced in their idolatry, by any behaviour of ours, which they might construe as homage or honour done to their idols; nor young converts from Gentilism take any encouragement from our conduct, to retain any veneration for the heathen gods and worship, which they have ren-nounced: nor should we do any thing that might be a means to pervert any members of the church from their Christian profession or practice. Our own humour and appetite must not determine our practice, but the honour of God, and the good and edification of the church. We should not so much consult our own pleasure and interest, as the advancement of the kingdom of God among men.

XV. A Christian should be a man devoted to God, and of a public spirit.

VII. He presses all upon them by his own example; Even as I please all men, (or study to do it,) in all things, (that I lawfully can,) not seeking mine own profit, but that of many, that they may be saved, v. 33. Note, A preacher may press his advice home with boldness and authority, when he can enforce it with his own example. It is a public spirit in others, who can give evidence of it in himself. And it is highly commendable in a minister to neglect his own advantages, that he may promote the salvation of his hearers. This shews that he has a spirit suitable to his function. It is a station for public usefulness, and can never be faithfully discharged by a man of a narrow spirit and selfish principles.

CHAP. XI.

In this chapter, the apostle blames, and endeavours to rectify, some great defects and manifest disorders in the church of Corinth; as, 1. The misconduct of their women (some of whom seem to have been inspired) in the public assembly, who hid by their veils, the common token of subjection to their husbands in that part of the world. This misbehaviour he reprehends, requires them to keep veiled, asserts the superiority of the husband, yet so as to remind the husband that both were made for mutual help and comfort, v. 1. 16. 11. He blames them for their discord, riot, and
Be ye followers of me, even as I also am of Christ. 2. Now I praise you, brethren, that you remember me in all things, and keep the ordinances, as I delivered them to you. 3. But I would have you know, that the head of every man is Christ; and the head of the woman is the man; and the head of Christ is God. 4. Every man praying or prophesying, having his head covered, dishonoureth his head. 5. But every woman that prayeth or prophesieth with her head uncovered, dishonoureth her head: for that is even all one as if she were shaven. 6. For if the woman be not covered, let her also be shorn: but if it be a shame for a woman to be shorn or shaven, let her be covered. 7. For a man indeed ought not to cover his head, for as much as he is the image and glory of God: but the woman is the glory of the man. 8. For the man is not of the woman; but the woman of the man. 9. Neither was the man created for the woman; but the woman for the man. 10. For this cause ought the woman to have power on her head, because of the angels. 11. Nevertheless, neither is the man without the woman, neither the woman without the man in the Lord. 12. For as the woman is of the man, even so is the man also by the woman; but all things of God. 13. Judge in yourselves: is it comely that a woman pray unto God uncovered? 14. Doth not even nature itself teach you, that if a man have long hair, it is a shame unto him? 15. But if a woman have long hair, it is a glory to her: for her hair is given her for a covering. 16. But if any man seem to be contentious, we have no such custom, neither the churches of God.

Paul, having answered the cases put to him, proceeds in this chapter to the redress of grievances. The first verse of the chapter is put, by those who divided the epistle into chapters, as a preface to the rest of the epistle, but seems to have been a proper close to the last, in which he had enforced the cautions he had given against the abuse of liberty, by his own example; Be ye followers of me, as I also am of Christ, (v. 1.) fully closes his argument; and the way of speaking in the next verse looks like a transition to another. But whether it more properly belong to this, or the last chapter, it is plain from it that Paul not only preached such doctrine as they ought to believe, but led such a life as they ought to imitate. Be ye followers of me is, “Be imitators of me; live as ye see me live.” Note, Ministers are likely to preach most to the purpose, when they can press their hearers to follow their example. Yet would not Paul be followed blindly neither. He encourages neither implicit faith nor obedience. He would be followed himself no farther than he followed Christ. Christ’s pattern is a copy with another’s hand; so it is the case here. Note, We should follow no leader farther than he follows Christ. Aposles should be left by us when they deviate from the example of their Master. He passes next to reprehend and reform an indecency among them, of which the women were more especially guilty. Concerning which, observe.

1. How he prefakes it. He begins with a commendation of what was praise-worthly in them; (v. 2.) praise nothing that you remember me in all things, and keep the ordinances, as I delivered them to you. Many of them, it is probable, did this in the strictest sense of the expression: and he takes occasion, from thence, to address the body of the church under this good character, and the body politic, in the main, have continued to observe the ordinances and institutions of Christ, though in some things they deviated from, and corrupted, them. Note, When sin is reproved in any particular it is to be set right, and made fit to commend what is good in them; it will shew that the reproof is not from ill-will, and a humour of censuring and finding fault; and it will thereupon procure the more regard to it. 2. He lays a foundation for his further reprehension, by asserting the superiority of the man over the woman; I would have you know, that the head of every man is Christ, and the head of the woman is the man, and the head of Christ is God. Now, in his mediatorial character and glorified humanity, is at the head of mankind. He is not only first of the kind, but Lord and Sovereign. He has a name above every name: though in this high office and authority he has a superior, God being his Head. And as God is the Head of Christ, and Christ the Head of the whole human kind, so the man is the head of the woman: and it is indeed when such dominion as Christ has over the kind, or God has over the Man Christ Jesus, but a superiority and headship as he has; and the woman should be in subjection, and not assume or usurp the man’s place. This is the situation in which God has placed her; and for that reason she should have a mind suited to her rank, and not do any thing that looks like an affectation of changing places. Somewhat like this the woman of the church, believing God has been guilty of, who were under inspiration, and prayed and prophesied even in their assemblies, v. 5. It is indeed an apostolical canon, that the women should keep silence in the churches, (ch. 14. 34. 1 Tim. 2. 12.) which some understand without limitation, as if a woman under inspiration also must keep silence; which seems well to agree with the connexion of the apostle’s discourse, ch. 14. Others with this, that is, in any case, it is very unjust not from her own abilities pretend to teach, or so much as question and debate anything in the church, yet, when under inspiration, the case was altered; she had liberty to speak. Or, though she might not preach even by inspiration, (because teaching is the business of a superior,) yet she might pray, or utter hymns by inspiration, even in the public assembly. So it is a mutual affectation of superiority over the man by such acts as these. It is plain, the apostle does not in this place prohibit the thing, but the manner of doing it. And yet he might utterly disallow the thing, and lay an unlimited restraint on the woman, in another part of the epistle. These things are not contradictory. It is to his present purpose to reprehend the manner wherein the woman prayed and prophesied in the church, without determining in this place, whether they did well or ill in praying or prophesying. Note, The manner of doing a thing enters into the morality.
I. CORINTHIANS, XI.

of it. We must not only be concerned to do good, but that the good we do be well done.

III. The thing he reprehends, is the woman's praying or prophesying uncovered, or the man's doing either covered, v. 4, 5. To understand this, it must be observed, that it was a signification either of shame or subjection, for persons to be veiled, or covered, in the Eastern countries, contrary to the custom of our's, where the being bare-headed becomes subjection, and being covered, superiority and dominion. And this will help us the better to understand,

IV. The reasons on which he grounds his reprehension. 1. The man that prays or prophesies with his head covered, dishonoureth his Head, that is, Christ, the Head of every man, (v. 3.) by appearing in a habit unsuitable to the rank in which God has placed him. Note, We should, even in our dress and habit, avoid every thing that may dishonour God; The woman, on the other hand, hath no need of prays or prophesies with her head uncovered, dishonoureth her head, that is, the man, v. 3. She appears in the dress of her superior, and throws over the token of her subjection. She might, with equal decency, cut her hair short, or cut it close, the common dress of the man in that age. This would be in a manner to declare, that she was desirous of changing sexes; a manifest effectation of that superiority which God had given her; and shew thereby what is the proper defect of these prophetesses in the church of Corinth. It was doing a thing which, in that age of the world, betokened superiority, and therefore a tacit claim of what did not belong to them, but the other sex. The sexes should not affect to change places. The order in which Divine Wisdom has placed persons and things, is best and fittest; to endeavour to amend it, is to destroy all order, and introduce confusion. Women should keep to the rank God has chosen for them, and not dishonour their head; for this, in the result, is to dishonour God. If she was made out of the man, and for the man, and made to be the glory of the man, she should do nothing, especially in public, that looks like a wish of having this order inverted. 2. Another reason against this conduct was, that the man is the image and glory of God, the representative of that glorious dominion, and universal power, which God has given to his world. It is the man who is set at the head of this lower creation, and therein bears the resemblance of God. The woman, on the other hand, is the glory of the man; (v. 7.) she is his representative. Not but she has dominion over the inferior creatures, as she is a partaker of human nature, and so far is God's representative too, but it is at second-hand. She is the image of God, inasmuch as she is the image of the man; For the man was not made out of the woman, but the woman out of the man, v. 8. The man was first made, and made head of the creation here below, and therein the image of the divine dominion; and the woman was made out of the man, and shone with a reflection of his glory, being made superior to the other creatures here below, but in subjection to her husband, and deriving that honour from him. For the man was not made out of the woman, but the woman made for the man, his head-man, and not the man for the woman. She was naturally, therefore, made subject to him, because made for him, for his use and help and comfort. And she who was intended to be always in subjection to the man, should do nothing, in Christian assemblies, that looks like an affectation of equality. 4. She ought to be covered, because of the angels. Power, that is, a veil, the token, not of her having power or superiority, but being under the power of her husband, subjected to him, and inferior to the other sex. Rebekah, when she met Isaac, and was delivering herself into his possession, put on her veil, in token of her subjection, Gen. 24. 50. Thus would the apostle have the women appear in Christian assemblies, even though they spake there by inspiration, because of the angels, that is, say some, because of the evil angels. The woman was first in the transgression, being deceived by the Devil, (1 Tim. 2. 11.) which increased her subjection to the man, Gen. 3. 16. Now, because evil angels will be sure to mix in all Christian assemblies, therefore should women wear the token of their subordination and subjection, which it is, that age and country was a veil. Others say, because of the good angels. Jews and Christians have had an opinion, that these ministering spirits are many of them present in their assemblies. Their presence should restrain Christians from all indecencies in the worship of God. Note, We should learn from all to behave in the public assemblies of divine worship, so as to express a reverence for God, and a content and satisfaction with that rank in which he has placed us.

V. He thinks fit to guard his argument with a caution, lest the inference be carried too far; (v. 11, 12.) Nevertheless, neither is the man without the woman, nor the woman without the man in the Lord. They were made for one another. It is not good for him to be alone, (Gen. 2. 18.) and therefore was a woman made, and made for the man; and the husband was hence ordered to be the protector, and chief defender, to the woman, though not so directly and immediately made for her. They were made to be a mutual comfort and blessing, not one a slave, and the other a tyrant. Both were to be one flesh; (Gen. 2. 24.) and this for the propagation of a race of mankind. They are reciprocal instruments of each other's production. As the woman was first formed out of the man, the man is ever since predestinated to the woman; (v. 12.) all by the divine wisdom and power of the First Cause so ordaining it. The authority and subjection should be no greater than are suitable to two in such near relation and close union to each other. Note, As it is the will of God that the woman know her place, so it is his will also, that the man abuse not his power.

VI. He enforces his argument from the natural covering provided for the woman, (v. 13—15.) as a badge of her inferiority, to the man, and makes his own reason, as the creature he hearken to what nature suggests; Is it comely for a woman to pray to God uncovered? Should there not be a distinction kept up between the sexes, in wearing their hair, since nature has made them one? Is it not a distinction which custom has kept up among all civilized nations? The woman's hair is a natural covering; to wear it long, is a glory to her; but for a man to have long hair, or cherish it, is a token of softness and effeminacy. Note, It should be our concern, especially in Christian and religious assemblies, to make no breach upon the rules of natural decency.

VII. He sums up all, by referring them who were contentious, to the usages and customs of the churches, v. 10. Custom is in a great measure the rule of decency. And the common practice of the churches, in this case, could not have them govern them. He does not silence the contentious by mere authority, but lets them know that they would appear to the world as very odd and singular in their humour, if they would quarrel for a custom to which all the churches of Christ were at that time utter strangers, or against a custom in which they all concurred, and that upon the ground of natural decency. It was the common usage here among all the churches in the East, in public assemblies, and join in public worship, veiled; and it was manifestly decent that they should so do. They must be very contentious indeed, who would quarrel with this, or lay it aside.
17. Now in this that I declare unto you, I praise you not, that ye come together, not for the better, but for the worse. 18. For first of all, when ye come together in the church, I hear that there are divisions among you; and I partly believe it. 19. For there must be also heresies among you, that they who are approved may be made manifest among you. 20. When ye come together therefore into one place, this is not to eat the Lord's supper. 21. For in eating, every one taketh before other, his own supper; and one is hungry, and another is drunken. 22. What! have ye not houses to eat and to drink in? Or despise ye the church of God, and shame them that have not? What shall I say to you? I shall praise you in this? I praise you not.

In this passage the apostle sharply rebukes them for much greater disorders than the former, in their partaking of the Lord's supper; which was commonly done in the first ages, as the ancients tell us, with a love-feast annexed, which gave occasion to the scandalous disorders which the apostle here reproaches them with, although indifferent in the church.

I. The manner in which he introduces his charge: "Now in this that I declare unto you, I praise you not, v. 17. I cannot commend, but must blame and condemn you." It is plain, from the beginning of the chapter, that he was willing and pleased to commend as far as he could. But such scandalous disorders, in so sacred an institution, as they were guilty of, called for a sharp reprehension. They quite turned the institution against itself. It was intended to make them better, to promote their spiritual interests; but it really made them worse. They came together, not for the better, but for the worse. Note, The ordinances of Christ, if they do not make us better, will be very apt to make us worse; if they do not do our souls good, they may do us harm; if they do not melt and mend, they will harden. Corruptions will be confirmed in us, if the proper means do not work a cure of them.

II. He enters upon his charge against them in more particulars than one; 1. He tells them, that, upon coming together, they fell into divisions, schisms — ἀδιακόπτως. Instead of concurring unanimously in celebrating the ordinance, they fell a quarrelling with one another. Note, There may be schism, where there is no separation of communion. Persons may come together in the same church, and sit down at the same table of the Lord, and yet be schismatic. Uncharitableness, alienation of affection, especially if it grows up to discord, and feuds, and contentions, constitute schism. Christians may separate from each other's communion, and yet be charitable one towards another; they may continue in the same communion, and yet be uncharitable. This last is schism, not then the former. The apostle had heard a report of the Corinthians' divisions, and he tells them he had too much reason to believe it. For, adds he, there must be heresies also; not only quarrels, but factions, and perhaps such corrupt opinions as strike at the foundation of Christianity, and all sound religion. Note, No marvel there should be breaches of Christian love in the churches, when such offences will come, as shall make shipwreck of faith and a good conscience. Such offences must come. Not that men are necessitated to be guilty of them; but the event is certain, and God permits them, that they who are approved, (such honest hearts as will bear the trial,) may be set to view, and appear faithful by their constant adherence to the truths and ways of God, notwithstanding the distractions and seductions of their time. The word of God can make the weaned and overs of others a foil to the piteous and integrity of the saints.

2. He charges them not only with discord and division, but with scandalous disorder; For in eating, every one taketh before other, his own supper; and one is hungry, and another is drunken. Heathens used to drink plentifully at their feasts upon their sacrifices. Many of the wealthier Corinthians seem to have taken the same liberties at their Lord's table, or at least at their ἀγαθείς, or love-feasts, that were annexed to the supper. They would not stay for one another; the rich despised the poor, and ate and drank up the provisions themselves brought, before the poor were allowed to partake; and thus some wanted, while others had more than enough. This was profaning a sacred institution, and corrupting a divine ordinance, to the last degree. Why should an apostle use his pen to employ their food to feed their lusts and passions. What should have been a bond of mutual unity and affection, was made an instrument of discord and division. The poor were deprived of the food prepared for them, and the rich turned a feast of charity into a debauch. This was scandalous irregularity.

III. The apostle lays the blame of this conduct closely on them, 1. By telling them, that their conduct perfectly destroyed the purpose and use of such an institution; This is not to eat the Lord's supper, v. 20. It was coming to the Lord's table, and not coming. They might as well have staid away. Thus to eat the outward elements, was not to eat Christ's body. Note, There is a careless and irregular eating of the Lord's supper, which is as none at all; it will turn to no account, but to increase guilt. Such an eating was that of the Corinthians; their practices were a direct contradiction to the purposes of this sacred institution. 2. Their conduct carried in it a contempt of God's house, or of the church, v. 22. If they had a mind to feast, they might do it at home in their own houses; but to come to the Lord's table, and cabal and quarrel, and keep the poor from their share of the provision there made for them as well as the rich, was such an abuse of the ordinance, and such a contempt of the poor members of the church more especially, as merited a very sharp reproof. Such a behaviour tended much to the shame and discouragement of the poor, whose souls were as dear to Christ, and cost him as much, as those of the rich. Note, Common meals may be managed after a common manner, but religious feasts should be attended religiously. Note also, It is a heinous evil, and severely to be censured, for Christians to treat their fellow-Christians with contempt and insolence, but especially at the Lord's table. This is doing what they can to pour contempt on divine ordinances. And we should look carefully to it, that nothing in our behaviour at the Lord's table have the appearance of contemning so sacred an institution.

23. For I have received of the Lord that which also I delivered unto you, That the Lord Jesus, the same night in which he was betrayed, took bread: 24. And when he had given thanks, he brake it, and said, Take, eat; this is my body, which is broken for you: this do in remembrance of me. 25. After the same manner also he took the cup, when he had supped, saying, This cup is the New Testament in my blood: this do ye, as oft as ye drink it, in remembrance of me. 26. For as often as ye eat this bread, and drink this cup, ye do shew the Lord's death, till he come. 27. Wherefore, whosoever shall eat this bread, and drink this cup of the Lord, unworthily, shall be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord. 28. But let a man examine himself, and so let him eat of that bread, and drink of that cup. 29. For he that eateth and drinketh unworthily, eateth and drinketh damnation to himself, not discerning the Lord's body. 30. For this cause many are weak and sickly among you, and many sleep. 31. For if we would judge ourselves, we should not be judged. 32. But when we are judged, we are chastened of the Lord, that we should not be condemned with the world. 33. Wherefore, my brethren, when ye come together to eat, tarry one for another. 34. And if any man hunger, let him eat at home; that ye come not together unto condemnation. And the rest will I set in order when I come.

To rectify these gross corruptions and irregularities, the apostle sets the sacred institution here to view. This should be the rule in the reformation of all abuses.

I. He tells us how he came by the knowledge of it. He was not among the apostles at the first institution; but he had received from the Lord what he delivered to them, v. 23. He had the knowledge of this matter by revelation from Christ: and what he had received he communicated, without varying from the truth a little, without adding or diminishing.

II. He gives us a more particular account of the institution than we meet with elsewhere. We have here an account, 1. Of the Author; our Lord Jesus Christ. The King of the covenant, who, by his power, instituted sacraments. 2. The time of the institution; it was the very night wherein he was betrayed; just as he was entering on his sufferings, which are therein to be commemorated. 3. The institution itself; our Saviour took bread, and when he had given thanks, or blessed, (as it is in Matt. 26.) he brake, and said, Take, eat; this is my body, broken for you; this do in remembrance of me. And in like manner he took the cup, when he had supped, saying, This cup is the New Testament in my blood; this do, as oft as ye drink it, in remembrance of me, v. 24, 25. In which observe,

(1.) The materials of this sacrament; both, [1.] As to the visible signs; these are bread and the cup; the former of which is called bread many times over in this passage; even such with the pasch his will cost secr eaton. What is eaten is called bread, though it be at the same time said to be the body of the Lord; a plain argument that the apostle knew nothing of their monstrous and absurd doctrine of transsubstantiation. The latter is as plainly a part of this institution as words can make it. St. Matthew tells us, our Lord did this, and all drink of it, (ch. 26. 27.) as if he should, by this expression, set a caveat against the papists' depraving the laty of the because it a holy feast. Nor is it here, or any where, made necessary, that any particular liquor should be in the cup. In one evangelist, indeed, it is plain that wine was the liquor used by our Saviour, though it was, perhaps, mingled with water, according to the Jewish custom; vide Lightfoot on Matt. 26. But this by no means renders it unlawful to have a sacra ment, where persons cannot come at wine. In every balance of scripture in which we have been accustomed of this part of the institution, it is always expressed by a figure. The cup is put for what was in it, without once specifying what the liquor was, in the words of the institution. [2.] The things signified by these outward signs; they are Christ's body and blood, his body broken, his blood shed, together with all the benefits which flow from his death and sacrifice. It is the institution of the Lord's last supper. His blood is the seal and sanction of all the privileges of the new covenant; and worthy receivers take it as such, at this holy ordinance. They have the New Testament, and their own title to all the blessings of the new covenant, confirmed to them by his blood.

(2.) We have here the sacramental actions, the manner in which the materials of the sacrament are to be used. [1.] Our Saviour's actions, which are, taking the bread and cup, giving thanks, breaking the bread, and giving about both the one and the other. [2.] The actions of the communicants, which were, to take the bread and eat, to take the cup and drink, and both in remembrance of Christ. But the external acts are not the whole or the principal part of what is to be done at this holy ordinance; each of them has a significance. Our Saviour, having undertaken to make an offering of himself to God, procured, by his death, the remission of sins, with all other gospel-benefits, for true believers, did, at the institution, deliver his body and blood, with all the benefits procured by his death, to his disciples, and continues to do the same every time the ordinance is administered to true believers. This is here exhibited, or set forth, as the food of souls. And as food, though ever so wholesome or rich, will yield no nourishment, its use be the worse, so it matters not to the communicants to take and eat, or to receive Christ and feed upon him, his grace and benefits, by faith convert them into nourishment to their souls. They are to take him as their Lord and Life, yield themselves up to him, and live upon him. He is our Life, Col. 3. 4.

(3.) We have here an account of the ends of this institution. [1.] It was appointed to be done in remembrance of Christ, to keep fresh in our minds an ancient favour, his dying for us, as well as to remember an absent friend, even Christ interceding for us, in virtue of his death, at God's right hand. The best of friends, and the greatest acts of kindness, are here to be remembered. The motto on this ordinance, and the very meaning of it, is, When this you see, remember me. [2.] It was to show forth Christ's death, to declare and publish it. It is not barely in remembrance of Christ, of what he has done and suffered, that this ordinance was instituted; but to commemorate, to celebrate, his glorious condescension and grace in our redemption. We declare his death to be our life, the spring of all our comforts and hopes. And we glory in such a declaration; we shew forth his death, and spread it before God, as a sacrifice accepted, for the remission of our sins. We hope, by the view of our own faith, for our own comfort and quickening; and we own, before the world, by this very service, that we are the disciples of Christ, who trust in him alone for salvation, and acceptance with God.

It is moreover hinted here concerning this ordinance, Flesh. That it should be frequent; as often as ye eat it, and drink of it. Our bodies daily need food; and our bodies daily return food; we cannot maintain life and health without this. And it is fit that this spiritual diet should be taken often too. The ancient churches celebrated this ordinance every Lord's day, if not every day when they assembled for worship. Secondly, That it must be perpetual. It is to be celebrated till the Lord shall come; till he shall come the second time, without sin, for the salvation of them that believe, and to judge the world. This is our warrant for keeping this feast. It was our Lord's will that we should thus celebrate the memorials of his death and passion, till he come in his own glory, and his Father's glory, with his holy angels, and put an end to the present state of things, and his own mediatorial administration, by passing the final sentence. Note, The Lord's supper is not a temporary, but a standing and perpetual, ordinance.

III. He lays before the Corinthians the danger of repeating his unprofitably; of prostituting this institution as they did, and using it to the purposes of feasting and faction, with intentions opposite to its designs, or as a temper of mind altogether unsuitable to it; or keeping up the covenant with sin and death, while they are there professedly renewing and confirming their covenant with God. 1. It is great guilt which such contract. They shall be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord, and of his body and blood, and shall be guilty of his body and blood. They act as if they counted the blood of the covenant, whereby they are sanctified, an unholy thing, Heb. 9. 26. They profane the institution, and in a manner crucify their Saviour over again. Instead of being cleansed by his blood, they are guilty of his blood. 2. It is a great hazard which they run; They eat and drink judgment to themselves, v. 23. The profanation of the Lord's table is an unprofitable concern on themselves. No doubt but they incur great guilt, and so render themselves liable to damnation, to spiritual judgments and eternal misery. Every sin is in its own nature damning; and therefore surely so heinous a sin, as profaning such a holy ordinance, is so. And it is profaned in the grossest sense, by such irreverence and rudeness as the Corinthians were guilty of. But perhaps the worst of these considerations is the neglect of the Lord's supper from attending at this holy ordinance, by the sound of these words, as if they bound upon themselves the sentence of damnation, by coming to the table of the Lord unprepared. This sin, as well as all others, leaves room for forgiveness upon repentance; and the Holy Spirit never indited this passage of scripture to deter serious Christians from their duty, though the Devil has often made this advantage of it, and has successfully enticed many of his votaries into their own idolatrous use of the Lord's table.

The Corinthians came to the Lord's table as to a common feast, not discerning the Lord's body, not making a difference or distinction between that and common food, but setting both on a level: nay, they used much more indecency at this sacred feast than they would have done at a civil one. This was very sinful in them, and very displeasing to God, and brought down his judgments on them; For this cause, says, 1 Cor. 11. 29, 30. but the profanation of the Lord's table is an unprofitable concern on themselves. Some were punished with sickness, and some with death. Note, A careless and irreverent receiving of the Lord's supper may bring temporal punishments. Yet the connexion seems to imply, that even those who were thus punished, were in a state of favour with God, at least many of them; They were chastened of the Lord, that they should not be condemned with the world, v. 32. Now divine chastisement is a sign of divine love. Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, (Heb. 12. 6.) especially with so merciful a purpose, to prevent their final condemnation. In the midst of judgment, God remembers mercy: he many times punishes those whom he tenderly loves. It is kindness to use the rod, to prevent the child's ruin. He will visit such iniquity as this under consideration with stripes, and yet make those evidences of his love. They were in the favour of God, who yet so highly offended him in this instance, and brought down judgments on themselves; at least many of them were: for they were punished by him out of fatherly good-will; punished now, that they might not perish for ever. Note, It is better to bear trouble in this world, than to be miserable to eternity. And God punishes his people now, to prevent their eternal woe.

IV. He points out the duty of those who would come to the Lord's table. 1. In general; Let a man examine himself, (v. 28.) try and approve himself. Let him consider the sacred intention of this holy ordinance, its nature and use; and compare his own views in attending on it, and his disposition of mind towards it; and he knows himself that, by his own conscience in the sight of God, then let him attend. Such self-examination is necessary to a right attendance at this holy ordinance. Note, Those who, through weakness of understanding, cannot try themselves, are by no means fit to eat of this bread and drink of this cup; nor those who, upon a fair trial, have just ground to charge themselves with impenitence, unbelief, and alienation from the life of God. They should have the wedding-signal on, who would be welcome at this marriage-feast; grace in habit, and grace in exercise. 2. The duty of those who were yet unpunished for their profanation of this ordinance; If we would judge ourselves, we should not be judged, v. 31. If we would thoroughly search and explore ourselves, and condemn and correct what we find amiss, we should judge ourselves by a different divine line of argument. To be exact and severe on ourselves and our own cases, is the most proper way in the world not to fall under the just severity of our heavenly Father. We must not judge others, lest we be judged; (Matt. 7. 1.) but we must judge ourselves, to prevent our being judged and condemned by God. We may be critical as to ourselves, but should be very candid in judging of others.

V. He closes all with a caution against all the irregularities of which they were guilty, (v. 32, 34.) charging them to avoid all indecency at the Lord's table. They were to eat for hunger and pleasure only at home, and not change the holy supper to a common feast; and much less eat up the provisions, before those who could bring none, did partake of them, lest they should come together for condemnation. Note, Our holy duties, through our own neglect, may be used as instruments of judgment and condemnation on others. Christians may keep sabbaths, hear sermons, attend on the sacraments, and only aggravate guilt, and bring on a heavier doom. A sad, but serious truth! Of let all look to it, that they do not come together at any time to God's worship, and all the while provoke him, and bring down vengeance on themselves. Holy things are to be used in a holy manner, or else they are profaned. What else was amiss in this matter, he tells them, he would rectify when he came to them.
to understand, that no man, speaking by the Spirit of God, calleth Jesus accursed; and that no man can say that Jesus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghost. 4. Now there are diversities of gifts, but the same Spirit. 5. And there are diversities of administrations, but the same Lord. 6. And there are diversities of operations; but it is the same God, which worketh all in all. 7. But the manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man to profit withal. 8. For to one is given, by the Spirit, the word of wisdom; to another the word of knowledge, by the same Spirit; 9. To another faith, by the same Spirit; to another gifts of healing, by the same Spirit; 10. To another the working of miracles; to another prophecy; to another discerning of Spirits; to another divers kinds of tongues; to another the interpretation of tongues: 11. But all these worketh that one and the self-same Spirit, dividing to every man severally as he will.

The apostle comes now to treat of spiritual gifts, which abounded in the church of Corinth, but were greatly abused. What these gifts were, is at large told us in the body of the chapter; extraordinary offices and powers, bestowed on ministers and Christians in the first ages, for conviction of unbelievers, and propagation of the gospel. Gifts and graces, xρήματα and χάρις, greatly differ. Both indeed were freely given of God. But where grace is given, it is for the salvation of those who have it. Gifts are bestowed for the advantage and salvation of others. And there may be great gifts, where there is not a dram of grace; but persons possessed of them are utterly out of the divine favour. They are great instances of divine benignity to men, but do not by themselves prove those who have them to be the objects of divine complacency. This church was rich in gifts, but there were many things scandalously out of order in it. Now concerning these spiritual gifts, that is, the extraordinary powers they had received from the Spirit.

I. The apostle tells them, he would not have them ignorant, either of their original or use. They came from God, and were to be used for him. It would lead them far astray, if they were ignorant of one or the other of these. Note, Right information is of great use to all religious practice. It is a wretched work which gifted men make, who either do not know, or do not advert to, the nature and right use of the gifts with which they are endued. He reminds them in mind of the sad state out of which they had been recovered; Ye were Gentiles, carried away to dumb idols, even as ye were led, v. 2. While they were so, they could have no pretensions to be spiritual men, or to have spiritual gifts. While they were under the conduct of the spirit of Gentilism, they could not be influenced by the Spirit of Christ. If they well understood their condition, they could know no other way how true spiritual gifts were from God. Now concerning this, observe,

1. Their former character; they were Gentiles. Not God's peculiar people, but of the nations whom he had in a manner abandoned. The Jews were, before, his chosen people, distinguished from the rest of the world by his favour. To them the knowledge and worship of the true God were in a manner confined. The rest of the world were strangers to the covenant of promise, aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and in a manner without God, Eph. 2. 12. Such Gentiles were the body of the Corinthians, before their conversion to Christianity. What a change was here! Christian Corinthians were once Gentiles. Note, It is of great use to the Christian, and a proper consideration to stir him up both to duty and thankfulness, to think what once he was; Ye were Gentiles.

2. The conduct they were under; carried away to these dumb idols, even as ye were led. They were hurried upon the grossest idolatry, the worship even of stones and stones, through the force of a vain imagination, and the fraud of their priests practising on their ignorance; for whatever were the sentiments of their philosophers, this was the delusion of the herd. The body of the people paid their homage and worship to dumb idols, that had ears but could not hear, and mouths but could not speak, Ps. 115. 5, 6. Miserable abjectness of mind! And those who despised these gross conceptions of the vulgar, yet contemnenced them by their practice. O dismal state of Gentilism! Could the Spirit of God be among such stupid idolaters, or they be influenced by it? How much the pride of this world triumph in the blindness of mankind! How thick a mist shall he cast over their minds!

III. He shews them how they might discern those gifts that were from the Spirit of God, true spiritual gifts; No man, speaking by the Spirit, calls Jesus accursed. Thus did both Jews and Gentiles: they blasphemed him as an impostor, and executed his name, and acknowledged it abominable. And yet many who were exorcists and magicians, were about, pretending to work wonders by the Spirit of God; (vid. Lightfoot's Hore in loc,) and many among the Gentiles pretended to inspiration. Now the apostle tells them, none could act under the influence, or by the power, of the Spirit of God, who disowned and blasphemed Christ: for the Spirit of God bore uncontrollable witness to Christ, by prophecy, miracles, his resurrection from the dead, the success of his doctrine among men, and its effect upon them; and could never so far contradict itself, as to declare him accursed. And on the other hand, no man could say Jesus was the Lord, (that is, live by this faith, and work miracles to prove it,) but it must be by the Holy Ghost. To own this truth before men, and maintain it to death, and live under the influence of the true, and without the contamination of the Holy Ghost. No man can call Christ Lord, with a believing subjection to him, and dependence upon him, unless that faith be wrought by the Holy Ghost. No man can confess this truth in the day of trial, but by the Holy Ghost animating and encouraging him. Note, We have as necessary a dependence on the Spirit's operation and influence for our sanctification and perseverance as we have on the Spirit's operation and influence for our conversion and reformation; and he that could confirm this truth with a miracle, but by the Holy Ghost. No evil spirit would lend assistance, if it were in his power, to spread a doctrine and religious so ruinous to the Devil's kingdom. The substance of what the apostle asserts and argues here, is, that, whatever pretences there were to inspiration or miracles, they could not be from the God of heaven, or from the Gentile deity, they could not be from the Spirit of God: but no man could believe this with his heart, or prove with a miracle that Jesus was Christ, but by the Holy Ghost. So that the extraordinary operations and powers among them did all proceed from the Spirit of God. He adds, IV. These spiritual gifts, though proceeding from the same Spirit, are yet divers. They have one Author and Original, but are themselves of various kinds. A free cause may produce variety of effects; and the same giver may bestow various gifts, v. 4. There are diversities of gifts, such as revelations, tongues, prophecy, interpretations of tongues; but the same Spirit. There are diversities of administrations, or different offices, and officers to discharge the several duties of the Church. (See v. 28-30.) But the same Lord, who appointed all, v. 6. There are diversities of operations, or miraculous powers, called διανοομέναι δυνάμεις, (v. 10.) as here ἑναντίον; but it is the same God which worketh all in all. There are various gifts, administrations, and operations, but all proceed from one God, one Lord, one Spirit; that is, from Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, the Spring of the Divine Bounty. All issue from one Fountain; all have the same Author. However different they may be in themselves, in this they agree; all are from God. And several of the kinds are here specified, v. 8-10. Several persons had their several gifts, some one, some another, all from and by the same Spirit. To one was given the word of wisdom; that is, say some, a knowledge of the mysteries of the gospel, and ability to explain them; an exact understanding of the design, nature, and doctrines, of the Christian religion. Others say, an uttering grave sentences, like Solomon's proverbs. Some confine this word of wisdom to the revelations made to and by the apostles. To another, the word of knowledge, by the same Spirit; that is, say some, the knowledge of mysteries, (ch. 2. 13.) wrapped up in the prophecies, types, and histories of the Old Testament: say others, a skill, and readiness to give advice and counsel in perplexed cases. To another, faith, by the same Spirit; that is, the faith of miracles, or a faith in the divine power and promise, whereby they were enabled to work miracles; or, an extraordinary impulse from above, whereby they were enabled to trust God in any emergency, and go on in the way of their duty, and own and profess the truths of Christ, whatever were the difficulty or danger. To another, the gift of healing, by the same Spirit; that is, healing the sick, either by laying on of hands, or anointing with oil, or with a bare word. To another, the working of miracles; the efficacies of powers, ὑπομνή συνάρπαι; such as raising the dead, restoring the blind to sight, giving speech to the dumb, hearing to the deaf, and the use of limbs to the lame. To another, prophecy, that is, ability to foretell future events, and to discern spiritual things. To another, the gift of uttering languages, or the power of languages, or ability to render foreign languages readily and properly into their own. With such variety of spiritual gifts were the first ministers and churches blessed.

V. The end for which these gifts were bestowed; the manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man, to profit withal, v. 7. The Spirit was manifested by the exercise of these gifts: his influence and operations upon the body and soul of men. They were intended for the mere honour and advantage of those who had them, but for the benefit of the church, to edify the body, and spread and advance the gospel. Note, Whatever gifts God confers on any man, he confers them, that he may do good with them, whether they be common or spiritual. The outward gifts of his bounty are to be improved for his glory, and employed in doing good to others. No man has them merely for himself. They are a trust put into his hands, to profit withal; and the more he profits others with them, the more abundantly will they turn to his account in the end, Philip. 4. 17. Spiritual gifts are bestowed, that men may with them profit the church, and promote Christianity. They are not given for show, but for service; not for pomp and ostentation, but for edification; not to magnify those that have them, but to edify others.

VI. The measure and proportion in which they are given; All these worketh one and the same Spirit, dividing to every man as he will. It is according to the sovereign pleasure of the Divine. What more free than a gift? And shall not the Spirit of God do as he will? May he not give to what persons he pleases, and in what proportion he pleases; one gift to one man, and another to another; to one more, and another fewer, as he thinks fit? Is he not the best judge how his own purposes shall be served, and his own donations bestowed? It is not as men will, nor as they may think fit, but as the Spirit pleases. Note, The Holy Ghost is a Divine Person. He works divine effects, and divides divine gifts as he will, by his own power, and according to his own pleasure, without dependence or control. But though he distributes these gifts free and uncontroll'd, they are intended by him, not for private honour and advantage, but for public benefit, for the edification of the body, the church.

12. For as the body is one, and hath many members, and all the members of that one body, being many, are one body; so also is Christ. 13. For by one Spirit are we all baptized into one body, whether we be Jews or Gentiles, whether we be bond or free; and have been all made to drink into one Spirit. 14. For the body is not one member, but many. 15. If the foot shall say, Because I am not the hand, I am not of the body; is it therefore not of the body? 16. And if the ear shall say, Because I am not the eye, I am not of the body; is it therefore not of the body? 17. If the whole body were an eye, where were the hearing? If the whole were hearing, where were the smelling? 18. But now hath God set the members, every one of them in the body, as it hath pleased him. 19. And if they were all one member, where were the body? 20. But now are they many members, yet but one body. 21. And the eye cannot say unto the hand, I have no need of thee: nor again, the head to the feet, I have no need of you. 22. Nay, much more, those members of the body, which seem to be more feeble, are necessary: 23. And those members of the body, which we think to be less honourable, upon these we bestow more abundant honour; and our uncomely parts have more abundant comeliness. 24. For our comely parts have no need: but God hath tempered the body together, having given more abundant honour to that part which lacked: 25. That there should be no schism in the body: but that the members should have the same care one for another. 26. And whether one member suffer, all the members suffer with it; or one member be honoured, all the members rejoice with it.

The apostle here makes out the truth of what was above asserted, and puts the gifted men among the Corinthians in mind of their duty, by comparing the church of Christ to a human body.

1. By telling us that one body may have many members, that the many members of the same body make but one body, (v. 12.) and that the body is not one member, but many members; and that Christ, as is himself, is Christ mystical, as divine commonly speak, Christ and his church making one body; as head and members, this body is made up of many parts or members, yet but one body: for all the members are baptized into the same body, and made to drink of the same Spirit, v. 13. Jews and Gentiles, bond or free, are upon a level in this; all are baptized into the same body, and communed in the same Spirit. Christians become members of this body by baptism: they are baptized into one body. The outward rite of divine institution, significant of the new birth, called therefore the washing of regeneration, Tit. 3. 5. But it is by the Spirit, by the renewing of the Holy Ghost, that we are made members of Christ's body. It is the Spirit's operation, signified by the outward administration, that makes us members. But all the parts of the body, or the other ordinance we are sustained; but then it is not merely by drinking the wine, but by drinking into one Spirit. The outward administration is a mean appointed of God for our participation in this great benefit; but it is baptism by the Spirit, it is internal renovation, and drinking into one Spirit, partaking of his sanctifying influence from time to time, that makes us true members of Christ's body, and maintains our union with him. Being animated by one Spirit, makes Christians one body. Note, All who have the Spirit of Christ, without difference, are the members of Christ, whether Jew or Gentile, bond or free; and none but such. And all the members of Christ make up one body; the members many, but the body one. They are one body, because they have one principle of life; all are quickened and animated by the same Spirit.

II. Each member has its particular form, place, and use. 1. The meanest member makes a part of the body. The foot and ear are less useful, perhaps, than the hand and eye; but because one is not a hand, and the other an eye, shall they say, therefore, that they do not belong to the body? v. 15, 16. So every member of the body mystical cannot have the same place and office; but what then? Shall it hereupon disown relation to the same body? Because it is not fixed in the same station, or favoured with the same gifts, as others, shall it say, "I do not belong to Christ?" No, the meanest member of his body is as much a member as the noblest, and as truly regarded by him. All his members are dear to him. 2. There must be a distinction of members in the body; Were the whole body eye, where were the hearing? and if the ear, where the smelling? v. 17. If all were one member, where were the body? v. 19. They are many members, and for that reason must have distinction among them, and yet are but one body. v. 20. One member of a body is not a body; this is made up of many; and among these there must be a distinction, difference of situation, shape, use, &c. So it is in the body of Christ; its members must be different at, and the members, have different powers, and be in different places, some having one gift, and others a different one. Variety in the members of the body contributes to the beauty of it. What a monster would a body be, that were all ear, or eye, or arm? So it is for the beauty and good appearance of the church, that there should be diversity of gifts and offices in n. 3. The disposal of members to a mutual body, and their station, are as God pleases; But now hath God set the members, every one of them, in the body, as it hath pleased him, v. 18. We may plainly perceive the divine wisdom in the distribution of the members; but it was made according to the counsel of his will; he distinguished and distributed them as he pleased. So is it also in the members of Christ's body: they are chosen out to such stations, and employed in such offices, as that he may make them useful and happy in their several stations. God, the sovereign Lord of all, disposes his favours and gifts as he will. And who should gainsay his pleasure? What foundation is here for repining in ourselves, or envying others? We should be doing the duties of our own place, and not murmuring in ourselves, or quarrelling with others, that we are not in their's. 4. All the members of the body are, in some respect, useful to each other. The eye should put to the hand, I have no need of thee; nor the head to the feet, I have no need of you: nay, these members of the body, which seem to be more seelle, (the bowels, &c.) are necessary; (v. 21, 22.) God has so fitted and tempered them together, that they are all necessary to one another, and to the whole body; there is no part redundant and unnecessary. Every member serves some good purpose or other: it is useful to the good state of the whole body. Note, the good state of the whole body. Nor is there a member of the body of Christ but may and ought to be useful to his fellow-members, and at some times, and in some cases, is needful to them. None should despire and envy another, seeing God has made the distinction between them as he pleased, yet so as to keep them all in some degree of mutual dependence, and make them valuable to each other, and necessary to one another, that the body may be useful and happy. Those who excel in any gift, cannot say that they have no need of them who in that gift are their inferiors, while perhaps, in other gifts, they exceed them. Nay, the lowest members of all have their use, and the highest cannot do well without them. The eye has need of the hand, and the head of the feet. 5. Such is the man's concern for his whole body. That on the less honourable members more abundant honour is bestowed, and our uncomely parts have more abundant condescension. Those parts which are not fit, like the rest, to be exposed to view, which are either deformed or shameful, we most carefully clothe and cover; whereas the comely parts have no such need. The wisdom of Providence has so contrived and tempered things, that the more abundant regard and honour should be paid to that which must needs be most naked. So should the members of Christ's body behave toward their fellow-members: instead of despising them, or reproaching them, for their infirmities, they should endeavour to cover and conceal them, and put the best face upon them that they can. 6. Divine wisdom has contrived and ordered things in this manner, that the members of the body should regard one another, not as schismatics, divided from the body, but as acting in one interest, but well affected to each other; tenderly concerned for each other, having a fellow-feeling of each other's griefs, and a communion in each other's pleasures and joys; v. 25, 26. God has tempered the members of the body natural in the manner mentioned, that there might be no schism in the body, (v. 25.) no rupture or disunion among the members, neither disdain nor disregard. This should be avoided also in the spiritual body of Christ. There should be no schism in this body, but the members should be closely united by the strongest bonds of love. All decays of this affection are the seeds of schism. Where Christians grow cold towards each other, they will be careless and unconcerned for each other. And this mutual disregard is a schism begun. The members of the natural body are made to have a care and concern for each other, to prevent a schism in it. So should it be in Christ's body; the members should sympathize with each other. As in the natural body, the pain of the one part affects the whole, the ease and pleasure of one part affects the whole; so should Christians reckon themselves honoured in the honours of their fellow Christians, and should suffer in their sufferings. Note, Christian sympathy is a great branch of Christian duty. We should be so far from slighting our brethren's sufferings, that we should suffer with them; so far from envying their honours, that we should rejoice with them, and reckon ourselves honoured by them.

27. Now ye are the body of Christ, and members in particular. 28. And God hath set some in the church; first, apostles; secondarily, prophets; thirdly, teachers; after that, miracles; then gifts of healings, helps, governments, diversities of tongues. 29. Are all apostles? Are all prophets? Are all teachers? Are all workers of miracles? 30. Have all the gifts of healing? Do all speak with tongues? Do all interpret? 31. But covet earnestly the best gifts: and yet shew I unto you a more excellent way.

Here the apostle sums up the argument, and applies this similitude to the church of Christ. Concerning which, observe, 1. The relation wherein Christians stand to Christ, and one another. The church, or a whole body of Christians in all ages and places, is a body, even one of God's members, and every other Christian stands related to him as a fellow-member; (v. 27.) Now ye are the body of Christ, and members in particular, or particular members. Each is a member of the body, not the whole body; each stands related to the body as a part of it, and all have a common relation to one another, dependence upon one another, and should have a mutual care and concern. Thus are members of the natural body considered, and members of the mystical body be, disposed. Note, Mutual indifferenceness, and much more, contempt, and hatred, and envy, and strife, are very unnatural in Christians. It is like the members of the same body being destitute of all concern for one another, or quarreling with each other. This is the apostle's scope in this argument. He endeavours in it to suppress the proud, vaunting, and contentious spirit, that had prevailed among the Corinthians, by way of any of their spiritual gifts. 2. The variety of offices instituted by Christ, and gifts or favours dispensè by him; (v. 28.) God hath set some in the church. First, Apostles, the chief ministers intrusted with all the powers necessary to found a church, and make an entire revelation of God's will. Secondarily, Prophets, or persons enabled by inspiration to prophesy, interpret scriptures, or write by inspiration, as the evangelists did. Thirdly, Teachers, those who labour in word and doctrine, whether with pastoral charge, or without it. After that, miracles, or miracle-workers. Then gifts of healing, or those who had power to heal diseases. Helps, or such as had compassion on the sick and weak, and ministered to them. Governments, or such as had the disposal of the charitable contributions of the church, and dealt them out to the poor. Diversities of tongues, or such as could speak divers languages. Concerning all which observe, (1.) The plenteous variety of these gifts and offices. What a multitude are they! A good God was free in his communications to the primitive church; he was no niggard of his benefits and favours. No, he provided richly for them. They had no want, but a store; all that was necessary, even a more, what was convenient for them too. (2.) Observe the order of these offices and gifts. They are here placed in their proper ranks. Those of most value have the first place. Apostles, prophets, and teachers, were all intended to instruct the people, to inform them well in the things of God, and promote their spiritual edification: without them, neither apostles nor angels nor even the word of God would have been proclaimed. But the rest, however failed to spread the great intentions of Christianity, had no such immediate regard to religion, strictly so called. Note, God does, and we should, value things according to their real worth; and the use of things is the best criterion of their real worth. These are most valuable, that best answer the highest purposes. Such are the apostolical powers, compared with their's who had only the gift of healing and miracles. What holds the last and lowest rank in this enumeration, is, diversity of tongues. It is by itself the most useless and insignificant of all these gifts. Healing diseases, relieving the poor, helping the sick, have their use; but how vain a thing is it to speak languages, if a man does it merely to amuse or boast himself! This may indeed raise the ambition, but cannot promote the edification, of the hearers, or do them any good. It yet is a manifest, from ch. 14. that the Corinthians valued the exercise exceedingly on this gift. Note, How proper a method it is to beat down pride, to let persons know the true value of what they pride themselves in! It is but too common a thing for men to value themselves most on what is least worth: and it is of great use to bring them to a sober mind, by letting them know how much they are mistaken. (2.) The several distribution of these gifts is not to be set down, nor to be of one rank in the church, nor the same endowments; (v. 29, 30.) Are all apostles? Are all prophets? This were to make the church a monster; all one, as if the body were all ear or all eye. Some are fit for one office and employment, and some for another; and the Spirit distributes to every one as he will. His dispensation must be content with our own rank and share, if they be less exalted than those of others. We must not be conceited of ourselves, and despise others, if we are in the higher rank, and have greater gifts. Every member of the body is to preserve its own rank, and do its own office; and all are to minister to one another, and promote the good of the body in general, without envying, or despising, or neglecting, or ill-using, any one particular member. How blessed a constitution were the Christian church, if all the members did their duty!

He closes this chapter with an advice, (as the generality read it,) and a hint. [1.] An advice to covet the best gift, διαλογισμός τα γλώττησι—dona potiora, praestantiora, either the most valuable in themselves, or the most serviceable to others; and these are, in truth, most valuable in themselves, though men may be apt to esteem those most, that will raise their fame and esteem highest. Those are truly best, by which God will be most honoured, and his church edified. Such gifts should be most earnestly coveted. Note, We should desire that most, which is best, and most worth. Grace is therefore to be preferred before gifts; and of gifts, those are to be preferred, which are of greatest use. But some read this passage, not as an advice, but a charge: ὃς ἔχει, οὐκ εἰσορεύεται at each other's gifts. Ch. 13. 4. the same word is thus translated; Paul quarrel and contend about them. This they certainly did. And this behaviour the apostle here reprehends, and labours to rectify. Only of pride. cometh contention. These contests in the church of Corinth sprang from this original. It was a quarrel about precedence; (as most quarrels among Christians are, with whatever pretences they are gilded over;) and it is no wonder that a quarrel about precedence should extinguish charity. When all would stand in the first rank, no wonder if they justle, or throw down, or thrust back, their brethren. Gifts may be valued for their use, but they are mischievous when made the fuel of pride and contention. This therefore the apostle endeavours to prevent, [2.] By giving them the hint of a more excellent way, that is, of charity, of mutual love and good-will. This was the only right way to quiet and cement them, and make their gifts turn to the advantage and edification of the church. This would render them kind to each other, and concerned for each other, and therefore calm their spirits, and put an end to their little piques and contests, their disputes about precedence. They would appear to be in the foremost rank, according to the apostle, who had most of true Christian love. Note, True charity is greatly to be preferred to the most glorious gifts. To have the heart glow with mutual love, is vastly better than to gleam with the most pomptous titles, offices, or powers.

CHAP. XIII.

In this chapter, the apostle goes on to shew more particularly what that more excellent way was, of which he had just before been speaking. He recommends it, I. By shewing the necessity and importance of it, v. 1... II. By giving a description of the properties and fruits, v. 4... III. By shewing, how much it exceeds the best of the other graces, by its continuance, when they shall be no longer in being, or of any use, v. 8, to the end.

1. THOUGH I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not charity, I am become as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal. 2. And though I have the gift of prophecy, and understand all mysteries, and all knowledge; and though I have all faith, so that I could remove mountains; and have not charity, I am nothing. 3. And though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, and though I give my body to be burned, and have not charity, it profitteth me nothing.

Here the apostle shews what more excellent way he meant, or had in view, in the close of the former chapter, that is, charity, or, as it is commonly elsewhere rendered, love—15:3: not what is meant by charity in our common use of the word, which most men understand of alms-giving, but love in its fullest and most extensive meaning; true love to God and man; a benvolent disposition of mind towards our fellow-Christians, growing out of sincere and fervent devotion, the foundation of all duties, and obedience is the more excellent way of which the apostle speaks; preferable to all gifts. Nay, without this the most glorious gifts are nothing, of no account to us, of no esteem in the sight of God. He specifies,

I. The gift of tongues; Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not charity, I am become as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal, v. 1. Could a man speak all the languages on earth, and that with the greatest propriety, elegance, or fluency; could he talk like an angel, and yet be without charity, it would be all empty noise, mere unharmonious and useles sound, that would neither profit nor delight. It is not talking freely, nor finely, nor learnedly, of the things of God, that will save ourselves, or profit others, if we are destitute of holy love. It is the charitable heart, not the vociferous tongue, that is acceptable with God. The apostle specifies first this gift, because hereupon the Corinthians seemed chiefly to value themselves, and despise their brethren.

II. Prophecy, and the understanding of mysteries, and all knowledge. This without charity is as nothing, v. 2. Had a man ever so clear an understanding of the prophecies and types under the old dispensation, and so accurate an insight into the doctrines of Christianity, and this by inspiration, from the infallible dictates and illumination of the Spirit of God, without charity he would be nothing; all this would stand him in no stead. Note, A clear and deep head is of no signification, without a benevolent and charitable heart. It is not great knowledge that God sets a value upon, but true and hearty devotion.

III. Miraculous faith, the faith of miracles, or the faith by which persons were enabled to work miracles; Had I all faith, (the utmost degree of this kind of faith,) that I could remove mountains, (or say to them, “Go hence into the midst of the sea,” and have my command obeyed, Mark 11. 23.) and had no charity, I am nothing. The most wonder-working faith, to which nothing is in a manner impossible, is nothing, unless it be accompanied with charity. Removing mountains is a great achievement in the account of men; but one dram of charity is, in God’s account, of much greater worth than all the faith of this sort in the world. They may do many wondrous works in Christ’s name, whom yet he will disown, and bid depart from him, as workers of iniquity, Matt. 7. 22. Saving faith is ever in conjunction with charity, but the faith of miracles is not.

IV. The outward works of charity; Bestowing his goods to feed the poor, v. 3. Should all a man has be laid out in this manner, if he had no charity, it would profit nothing. There may be an open and lavish hand, where there is no liberal and charitable heart. The external act of giving alms may proceed from a very ill principle. Vain-glorious ostentation, or a proud conceit of merit, may put a man to a large expense this way, who has no true love to God or men. Our doing good to others will do none to us, if it be not well done, that is, from a principle of devotion and charity, love to God, and good will to men. Note, If we leave charity out of religion, the most costly services will be of no avail to us. If we give away all we have, while we withhold the heart from God, it will not profit.

V. Even sufferings, and those of the most grievous kind; If we give our bodies to be burnt without charity, it profiteth the gospel, v. 3. Should we sacrifice our lives for the faith of the gospel, and be burnt to death in maintenance of its truth, this will stand us in no stead without charity, unless we are animated to these sufferings by a principle of true devotion to God, and sincere love to his church and people, and good-will to mankind. The outward application of that will be little in effect, when the invisible principle is very bad. Some men have thrown themselves into the fire, to procure a name and reputation among men. It is possible, that the very same principle may have worked up some to resolution enough to die for their religion, who never heartedly believed and embraced it. But vindicating religion at the cost of our lives will profit nothing, if we feel not the power of it, and true charity is the very heart and soul of religion. If we feel none of its sacred heat in our hearts, it will profit nothing, though we be burnt to ashes for the truth. Note, The most grievous sufferings, the most costly sacrifices, will not recommend us to God, if we do not love the brethren; should we give our own bodies to be burnt, it would not profit us. How strange a way of recommending themselves to God are they got into, who hope to do it by burning others, by murdering, and massacring, and tormenting their fellow-Christians, or by any injurious usage of them! My soul, enter not thou into their secrets! If I cannot hope to recommend myself to God by giving mine own body to be burnt while I have no charity, I will never hope to do it by burning or mal-treating others, in open defiance to all charity.

4. Charity suffereth long, and is kind; charity envieth not; charity vaunteth not herself, is not puffed up; 5. Doth not behave herself unseemly, seeketh not her own, is not easily provoked, thinketh no evil; 6. Rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth; 7. Beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things.

The apostle gives us these verses some of the properties and effects of charity, both to describe and commend it, that we may know whether we have can never wish well to any. These are the properties of love, which shall rather wait and wish for the reformation of a brother, than fly out in resentment of his conduct. It will put up with many slight and neglects from the person it loves, and wait long to see the kindly effects of such patience on him.

I. It is long suffering—μακαρδομαι. It can endure evil, and injury, and provocation, without being filled with resentment, indignation, or revenge. It makes the firm mind, gives it power over the angry passions, and furnishes it with the true bearing of a brother, that shall rather wait and wish for the reformation of a brother, than fly out in resentment of his conduct. It will put up with many slight and neglects from the person it loves, and wait long to see the kindly effects of such patience on him.

II. It is kind—χρηστότατος. It is benign, bountiful; it is courteous and obliging. The law of kindness is in her life; her heart is large, and her hand open. She seeks to be useful; and not only seeks on opportunities of doing good, but searches for them. This is her general character. She is patient under injuries, and apt and inclined to do all good offices in her power. And under these two generals all the particulars of the character may be reduced.

III. Charity suppresses envy; It envieth not; it is not grieved at the good of others; neither at their gifts nor at their good qualities, their honours, or their estates. If we love our neighbour, we shall be so far from envying his welfare, or being displeased with it, that we shall share in it, and rejoice at it. His bliss and satisfaction will be an addition to our's, instead of impairing or lessening it. This is the proper effect of kindness and benevolence: envy is the effect of ill-will. The prosperity of those to whom we wish well, can never grieve us; and the mind that is bent on doing good to all others will not grieve us.

IV. Charity subdues pride and vain-glory; It vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up; it is not bloated with self-conceit, does not swell upon its acquisitions, nor arrogate to itself that honour, or power, or respect, which does not belong to it. It is not insolent, apt to despise others, or trample on them, or treat with contempt and scorn. Those who are addicted to the principle of true brotherly love, will in honour prefer one another, Rom. 12. 10. They will do nothing outside of a spirit of contention, or vain-glory, but in lowliness of mind will esteem others better than themselves, Phil. 2. 3. True love will give us an esteem of our brethren, and raise our value for them; and this will limit our esteem of ourselves, and prevent the tumours of self-conceit and arrogance. These ill qualities can never grow out of tender affection for the brethren, or a diffusive benevolence. The word rendered in our translation, vaunteth itself, bears other significations; nor is the proper meaning, as I can find, settled; but in every sense and meaning, true charity stands in opposition to it. The Syriac renders it, non tumultatur—does not raise tumults and disturbances. Charity calms the angry passions, and is kind of raising them. Others render it, Non perferram et perversae agi—It does not act insidiously with any, seek to insnare them, nor tease them with needless importunities and addresses. It is not forward, nor stubborn and untractable, nor apt to be cross and contradictory. Some understand it of dissembling and flattery, when a fair face is put on, and fine words said, without any regard to truth, or kind of self-love, and respect to superiors, with kindness and condescension to inferiors, with courtesy and good-will towards all men. It is not for breaking order, confounding ranks, bringing all men on a level; but for keeping up the distinction God has made between men, and acting decently in its own station, and minding its own business, without taking upon it to mend, or concern, or despise, the conduct of others. Charity will not destroy the principle which is wrought into our nature. But charity never seeks its own to the hurt of others, or with the neglect of others. It many times neglects its own for the sake of others; prefers the welfare, and satisfaction, and advantage, to its own; and it ever prefers the weal of the public, of the community whether civil or ecclesiastical, to its private advantage. It would not advance, or aggrandize, or enrich, or gratify itself, at the cost and damage of the public.

VII. It tempers and restrains the passions. ὥστε μὴ φανερώσει—Is not exasperated. It corrects a sharpness of temper, and softens the mind, so that it does not suddenly conceive, nor long continue, a vehement passion. Where the fire of love is kept in, the flames of wrath will not easily kindle, nor long keep burning. Charity will never be angry without a cause, and will endeavour to confine the passions within proper limits, that they do not exceed the measure that is just, either in degree or duration. Anger cannot rest in the bosom where love reigneth. It would be hard to be angry with those we love, but very easy to depopulate our resentments, and be reconciled.

VIII. Charity thinks no evil. It cherishes no malice, nor gives way to revenge: so some understand it. It is not soon, nor long; angry; it is never mischievous, nor inclined to revenge; does not suspect evil of others, ὥστε μὴ φανερώσει ὑπὲρ ἀλλού—It does not reason out evil, charge guilt upon them by inference and intuition, when nothing of this sort appears open. True love is not apt to be jealous and suspicious; it will hide faults that appear, and draw a veil over them, instead of hunting and raking out those that lie covered and concealed: it will never indulge suspicion with regard to others, but will firmly and distinctly disbelieve against the person it affects. It will hardly give into an ill opinion of another, and it will do it with regret and reluctance when the evidence cannot be resisted; hence it will never be forward to suspect ill, and reason itself into a bad opinion upon mere appearances, or give way to suspicion without any. It will not make the worst construction of things, but put the best face that it can upon circumstances that have no good appearance.

IX. The matter of its joy and pleasure is here suggested: 1. Negatively; If rejoiceth not in iniquity; it takes no pleasure in doing injury or hurt to any; it thinks not evil of any, without very clear proof; it wishes ill to none; much less will it hurt or wrong any; and least of all make this the matter of its delight, rejoice in doing harm and mischief. Nor will it receive the reports of faults and failings of others, and triumph over them; either out of pride or ill-will, because it will set off its own excellences, or gratify its spite. The sins of others are rather the grief of a charitable spirit, than its sport or delight; they will touch it to the quick, and stir all its compassion, but can give it no entertainment. It is the very height of malice, to take pleasure in the misery of a fellow-creature. And is not falling into sin the greatest calamity that can befall one? How inconsistent is it with Christian charity, to rejoice at such a fall? 2. Affirmatively; If rejoiceth in the truth; is glad of the success of the gospel, commonly called the truth, by way of emphasis, in the New Testament; and rejoices to see men moulded into an evangelical temper by it, and made good. It takes no pleasure in their sins, but is highly delighted to see them do well, to approve themselves men of probity and integrity. It gives it much satisfaction to see truth and justice prevail among men, innocence cleared, and mutual faith and trust established, and to see piety and true religion flourish.

X. It beareth all things, it endureth all things, πάντα ψησά, πάντα ωςίων. Some read the first, covers all things. So the original also signifies. Charity will cover a multitude of sins, 1 Pet. 4. 8. It will draw a veil over them, as far as it can, in conformity with the way for blasing and publishing the faults of a brother, till duty manifestly demands it. Necessity only can extort this from the charitable mind. Though such a man be free to tell his brother his faults in private, he is very unwilling to expose him by making them public. Thus we do by our own faults, and thus charity would teach us to do by the faults of others; not publish them, but through such benevolence, and if it diffused over its whole frame? Happy the man who has this heavenly fire glowing in his heart, flowing out of his mouth, and diffusing its warmth over all with whom he has to do! How lovely a thing would Christiani appear to the world, if those who profess it were more actuated and animated by this divine principle, and paid a due regard to a command on which its blessed Author laid a chief stress! A new commandment I give unto you, that ye love one another, as I have loved you, that ye also love one another, John 13. 34. By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, v. 35. Blessed Jesus! how few of thy professed disciples are to be distinguished and marked out by this characteristic!

8. Charity never faileth: but whether there be prophecies, they shall fail; whether there be tongues, they shall cease: whether there be knowledge, it shall vanish away.

9. For we know in part, and we prophesy in part. 10. But when that which is perfect is come, then that which is in part shall be done away. 11. When I was a child, I spake as a child, I understood as a child; but when I became a man, I put away childish things. 12. For now we see through a glass, darkly; but then face to face: now I know in part; but then shall I know even as also I am known. 13. And now abide faith, hope, charity, these three; but the greatest of these is charity.

Here the apostle goes on to commend charity, and shew how much preferable it is to the gifts on which the Corinthians were so apt to pride themselves, to the utter neglect, and almost extinction, of charity. This he makes good in these three ways:

From a longer continuance and duration; Charity never faileth. It is a permanent and perpetual grace, lasting as eternity; whereas the extraordinary gifts on which the Corinthians valued themselves, were of a short continuance. They were only to edify the church on earth, and that but for a time, not during its whole continuance in this world; but in heaven would be all superseded, which yet is the very seat and element of love. Prophecy must fail: that is, either the prediction of things to come (which is its most common sense,) or the interpreta-

of scripture by immediate inspiration. Tongues will cease; that is, the miraculous power of speaking languages without learning them. There will be but one language in heaven. There is no confusion of tongues in the region of perfect tranquillity. And knowledge will vanish away. Not that, in the perfect state above, holy and happy souls shall be unknowing, ignorant: it is a very poor happiness, that can consist with utter ignorance. The apostle is plainly speaking of miraculous gifts, as therefore, known to be vain; but by being had and cherished, they lead to a more perfect state; (see ch. 14. 6.) a knowledge of mysteries supernaturally communicated. Such knowledge was to vanish away. Some indeed understand it of common knowledge acquired by instruction, taught and learnt. This way of knowing is to vanish away, though the knowledge itself, once acquired, will not be lost. But it is plain that the apostle is here setting the grace of charity in opposition to supernatural gifts. And it is more valuable, because more durable; it shall last, when they shall be no more; it shall enter into heaven, where they will have no place, because they will be of no use; though, in a sense, even our common knowledge may be said to cease in heaven, by reason of the improvement that will then be made in it. The light of a candle is perfectly obscured by the moon, so is any natural strength.

II. He hints, that these gifts are adapted only to a state of imperfection; We know in part, and we prophesy in part, v. 9. Our best knowledge and our greatest abilities are at present like our condition, narrow and temporary. Even the knowledge they had by inspiration was but in part. How little a portion of God, and the unseen world, was heard even by apostles and inspired men? How much short do others come of them! But these gifts were fitted to the present imperfect state of the church, valuable in themselves, but not to be compared with charity, because they were to vanish with the imperfections of the church, nay, and long before, whereas charity was to last for ever.

III. He takes occasion hence, to shew how much better it will be with the church hereafter than it can be here. A state of perfection is in view; (v. 10.) When that which is perfect is come, we shall no more prophesy in part shall be done away. When the end is once attained, the means will of course be abolished. There will be no need of tongues, and prophesy, and inspired knowledge, in a future life, because then the church will be in a state of perfection, complete both in knowledge and holiness. God will be known then clearly, and in a manner by intuition, and as perfectly as the capacity of glorified minds will allow; not by such transient glimpses, and little portions, as here. The difference between these two states is here pointed at in two particulars; 1. The present state is a state of childhood, the future that of manhood; When I was a child, I spake as a child, (that is, as some think, spake with tongues,) I understood as a child; ιηςινως—αφθίεμαι, (that is,) I spake unto men as a child, (alluding to the kingdom of heaven, in such an extraordinary way as manifested I was not out of my childlike state, &c.) I thought, or reasoned, ιηςινως, as a child: but when I became a man, I put away childish things. Such is the difference between earth and heaven. What narrow views, what confused and indistinct notions of things, have children, in comparison of grown men; or even those who are not such by nature, but are ripen and matured, despise and relinquish their infant thoughts, put them away, reject them, esteem them as nothing! Thus shall we think of our most valued gifts and acquisitions in this world, when we come to heaven. We shall despire our childish folly, in priding ourselves in such things when we are grown up to men in Christ. 2. Things are all dark and confused now, in comparison of what they will be hereafter; Now we see through a glass, dimly, (see metaphor, in a riddle,) then face to face; now we know in part, but then we shall know as we are known. Now we can only discern things at a great distance, as through a telescope, and that involved in clouds and obscurity; but hereafter the things to be known will be near and obvious, open to our eyes; and our knowledge will be free from all obscurity and error. God is to be seen face to face; and we are to know him, as we are known by him; not indeed as perfectly, but in some sense in the same manner. We are known to him by mere inspection; he turns his eye towards us, and sees, and searches throughout. We shall then fix our eye on him, and see him, as he is, 1 John 3. 2. We shall know how we are known, enter into all the mysteries of divine love and grace. O glorious change! To pass from darkness to light, from cloud to clear sunshine of our Saviour's face, and in God's own light to see light! Ps. 56. 9. Note, It is the light of heaven only, that will remove all clouds and darkness from the face of God. It is at best but twilight while we are in this world; there it will be perfect and eternal day.

IV. To sum up the excellences of charity, he prefers it not only to gifts, but to other graces, to faith and hope—To faith and hope we shall also add charity; but the greatest of these is charity. True grace is much more excellent than any spiritual gifts whatever. And faith, hope, and love, are the three principal graces, of which charity is the chief, being the end to which the other two are but means. This is the divine nature, the soul's felicity, or it is complacent rest in God, and holy delight in all his saints. And it is everlasting work, when faith and hope shall be no more; but charity shall continue. It is the revelation, and assents to that: hope fastens on future felicity, and waits for that: and in heaven, faith will be swallowed up of vision, and hope in fruition. There is no room to believe and hope, when we see and enjoy. But love fastens on the divine perfections themselves, and the divine image on the creatures, and our mutual relation both to God and them. These will all shine forth in the most glorious splendour in another world, and there will love be made perfect; there we shall perfectly love God, because he will appear perfectly amiable for ever, and our hearts will kindle at the sight, and glow with perpetual devotion. And there shall we perfectly love one another, when all the saints meet there, when none but saints are there, and saints made perfect. O blessed state! How much surpassing the best below! O amiable and excellent grace of charity! How much does it exceed the most valuable gift, when it outshines every grace, and is the everlasting consummation of them! When faith and hope are at an end, true charity will burn for ever with the brightest flame. Note, They border most upon the heavenly state and perfection, whose hearts are fullest of this divine principle, and burn with the fervent love of it. They love God, and bear his fairest impression. For God is Love, 1 John 4. 8, 16. And where God is to be seen as he is, and face to face, there charity is in its greatest height; there, and there only, will it be perfected.

CHAP. XIV.

In this chapter, the apostle directs them about the use of their spiritual gifts, preferring those most, that are best, and fitted to do the greatest good. 1. He begins with advising them of all spiritual gifts to prefer prophesying, and shews that this is much better than speaking with tongues, v. 1, 2. He goes on to shew them how unprofitable the foreign languages were, useless to the conversion of the Gentiles, and how in one tone, like sounding a trumpet without any certain note, like talking gibberish; whereas gifts should be used for the good of the church, v. 6, 13, 14. He advises that worship should be celebrated, so that the most ignorant
I. CORINTHIANS, XIV.

1. FOLLOW after charity, and desire spiritual gifts; but rather that ye may prophesy. 2. For he that speaketh in an unknown tongue, speaketh not unto men, but unto God: for no man understandeth him; howbeit in the Spirit he speaketh mysteries. 3. But he that prophesieth speaketh unto men to edification, and exhortation, and comfort. 4. He that speaketh in an unknown tongue edifieth himself; but he that prophesieth edifieth the church. 5. I would that ye all spake with tongues, but rather that ye prophesied: for greater is he that prophesieth than he that speaketh with tongues, except he interpret, that the church may receive edifying.

The apostle, in the foregoing chapter, had himself preferred, and advised the Corinthians to prefer, Christian charity to all spiritual gifts. Here he teaches them, among spiritual gifts, which they should prefer, and by what rules they should make comparison. He begins the chapter, I. With an exhortation to charity; (v. 1.) Follow after charity, pursue it. The original, ἄγω την ἀγάπην, when spoken of a thing, signifies a singular concern to obtain it; and is commonly taken in a good and laudable sense. It is an exhortation to obtain charity, to get this excellent disposition of mind upon any terms, whatever pains or prayers it may cost: as if he had said, "In whatever you fail, see you do not miss of this; the principal of all graces is worth your getting at any rate."

II. He directs them which spiritual gift to prefer, from a principle of charity; "Desire spiritual gifts, but rather that ye may prophesy, or chiefly that you may prophesy. While they were in close pursuit of charity, and made this Christian disposition their chief scope, they might be zealous of spiritual gifts, be ambitious of them in some measure, but especially of prophesying, that is, of interpreting scripture. This preference would most plainly discover that they were indeed upon such pursuit, that they had a name for charity, and were intent upon it. Note, Gifts are fit objects for our desire and pursuit, in subordination to grace and charity. That should be sought first, and with greatest earnestness, which is most worth.

III. He assigns the reasons of this preference. And it is remarkable here, that he only compares prophesying with speaking with tongues. It seems, this was the reason why the Corinthians principally valued themselves. This was more ostentatious than the plain interpretation of scripture; more fit to gratify pride, but less fit to pursue the purposes of Christian charity; it would not equally edify, or do good to, the souls of men. For,

1. He that speak with tongues, must wholly speak between God and himself; for whatever mysteries might be communicated in his language, none of his own countrymen could understand them, because they did not understand the language. v. 2. Note, What cannot be understood, can never be profitably known. No advantage can be reaped from the most excellent discourses, if delivered in unintelligible language, such as the audience can neither speak nor understand: but he that prophesieth, speaketh to the advantage of his hearers; they may profit by his gift. Interpretation of scripture will be for their edification; they may be exhorted and comforted by it, v. 3. and indeed his voice must go together. Duty is the proper way to comfort; and they that would be comforted, must bear being exhorted.

2. He that speaks with tongues, may edify himself, v. 4. He must understand, and be affected with, what he speaks; and so every minister should; and he that is most edified himself, is in the disposition and fitness to do good to others, by what he speaks; but he that speaks with tongues or language unknown, can only edify himself; others can reap no benefit from his speech. Whereas the end of speaking in the church is to edify the church, (v. 4.) to which prophesying, or interpreting scripture by inspiration, or otherwise, is immediately adapted. Note, That is the best and most eligible gift, which best answers the purposes of charity, and does most to advance that: it is not only that which can edify others, but that which will edify the church. Such is prophesying, or preaching, and interpreting scripture, compared with speaking in an unknown tongue.

Indeed, no gift is to be despised, but the best are to be preferred. I could wish, says the apostle, that ye all spake with tongues, but rather that ye prophesied, v. 5. Every gift of God is a favour from God, and may be improved for his glory, and as such is to be valued and thankfully received; but then those are to be most valued, that are most useful. Greater is he that prophesieth than he that speaketh with tongues, unless he interpret, that the church may receive edifying, v. 5. Benevolence makes a man truly great. It is more blessed to give than to receive. And it is true magnanimity to study and seek to be useful to others, rather than to raise their admiration, and draw their esteem. Such a man has a large soul and generous heart; he is ready to his benevolence, and bent of mind for public good. Greater is he who interprets scripture to edify the church, than he who speaks tongues to recommend himself. And what other end he who spake with tongues could have, unless he interpreted what he spoke, is not easy to see. Note, That makes most for the honour of a minister, which is most for the church's edification, not that which shews gifts to most advantage. He acts in a narrow sphere, while he aims at himself; but his spirit and character increase in proportion to his usefulness, I mean his own intention and endeavours to be useful.

3. Now, brethren, if I come unto you speaking with tongues, what shall I profit you, except I shall speak to you, either by revelation, or by knowledge, or by prophesying, or by doctrine? 7. And even things without life giving sound, whether pipe or harp, except they give a distinction in the sounds, how shall it be known what is piped or harped? 8. For if the trumpet give an uncertain sound, who shall prepare himself to the battle? 9. So likewise ye, except ye utter by the tongue words easy to be understood, how shall it be known what is spoken? For ye shall speak into the air.
kinds of voices in the world, and none of them is without signification. 11. Therefore, if I know not the meaning of the voice, I shall be unto him that speaketh, a barbarian; and he that speaketh shall be a barbarian unto me. 12. Even so ye, for as much as ye are zealous of spiritual gifts, seek that ye may excel to the edifying of the church. 13. Wherefore, let him that speaketh in an unknown tongue, pray that he may interpret. 14. For if I pray in an unknown tongue, my spirit prayeth, but my understanding is unfruitful.

In this paragraph he goes on to shew how vain a thing that ostentation of speaking unknown and unintelligible language must be. It was altogether unedifying and unprofitable; (v. 6.) If I come to you speaking with tongues, what will it profitt you, unless I speak to you by revelation, or by knowledge, or by prophecy, or by doctrine? It would signify nothing to utter any of these in an unknown tongue. An apostle, with all his furniture, could not edify, unless he spake to the capacity of his hearers. New revelations, the most clear explications of old ones, the mysteries of the Gospel, the deep things of God, could be unprofitable in a language not understood. Nay, interpretations of scripture, made in an unknown tongue, would need to be interpreted over again, before they could be of any use. This he illustrates by several allusions. 1. To a pipe and a harp playing always in one tone. Of what use can this be to those who are dancing? If there be no distinction of sounds, how should they order their steps or motions? Unintelligible language is like piping or harping, without distinction of sounds: it gives no more direction how a man should order his conversation, than a pipe with but one stop, or a harp with but one string, can direct a dancer how he should order his steps, v. 7. 2. To a trumpet giving an uncertain sound, &c. It is not a sound manifest; either not the proper sound for the purpose, or not distinct enough to be discerned from every other sound. If, instead of sounding an important thing like a retreat, or sounded one knew not what, who would prepare for the battle? To talk in an unknown language in a Christian assembly, is altogether as vain and to no purpose, as for a trumpet to give no certain sound in the field or day of battle. The army in one case, and the congregation in the other, must be all in suspense, and at a perfect nonplus. To speak words that have no significance to those who hear them, is to leave them in the dark, as if what is spoken of is not the very tongue, but without their proper signification. This is true of the several languages spoken by several nations. All of them have their proper signification. Without this they would be words—words—a voice, and no voice. For that is no language, nor can answer the end of speaking, which has no meaning. But whatever proper signification the words of any language may have in themselves, and to those who understand them, they are perfect gibberish to men of another language, who understand them not. In this case, speaker and hearers are barbarians to each other, v. 11. They talk and hear only sounds without sense; for this is to be a barbarian. For this, says the polite Ovid, when banished into Pontus,

Barbarus hic ego sum, quia non intelligor uli—
I am a barbarian here, none understand me.

To speak in the church in an unknown tongue, is to talk gibberish; it is to play the barbarian; it is to confound the audience, instead of instructing them; and for this reason utterly vain and unprofitable.

The apostle, having thus established his point, in the two next verses applies it: (1.) By advising them to be chiefly desirous of those gifts that were most for the church's edification, v. 12. "Forasmuch as you are zealous of spiritual gifts, this way it will become commendable zeal; be zealous to edify the church, to promote Christian knowledge and practice; and covet those gifts most, that will do the best service to men's souls." This is the great rule he gives; which, (2.) He applies to the matter in hand, that, if they did speak a foreign language, they should beg of God the gift of interpreting it, v. 13. This alluded to may be as

10. They might speak and understand a foreign language, who could not readily translate it into their own: and yet was this necessary to the church's edification; for the church must understand, that it might be edified; which yet it could not do, till the foreign language was translated into its own. Let him therefore pray for the gift of interpreting what he speaks in an unknown tongue; or rather covet and ask of God the gift of interpreting, than of speaking in a language that needs interpretation, this being most for the church's benefit, and therefore among the gifts that excel; vide v. 12. Some understand it, "Let him pray so as to interpret what he utters in prayer, in a language unintelligible without it." The sum is, that they should perform all religious exercises in their assemblies, so that all might join in them, and profit by them. (5.) He encourages this advice with a proper reason, that, if he prayed in an unknown tongue, his spirit might pray, that is, a spiritual gift might be exercised in prayer, or his own mind might be devoutly engaged, but his understanding would be unfruitful, (v. 14.) that is, the sense and meaning of his words would be unfruitful; he would not be understood, nor therefore would others join with him in his devotions. Note, It should be the concern of such as pray in public, to pray intelligibly, not in a foreign language, nor in a language, that, if it be not foreign, is above the level of the audience. Language that is most obvious and easy to be understood, is the most proper for devotions, and other religious exercises.

15. What is it then? I will pray with the spirit, and I will pray with the understanding also: I will sing with the spirit, and I will sing with the understanding also. 16. Else when thou shalt bless with the spirit, how shall he that occupieth the room of the unlearned, say Amen at thy giving thanks, seeing he understandeth not what thou sayest? 17. For thou verily givest thanks well, but the other is not edified. 18. I thank my God, I speak with tongues more than ye all: 19. Yet in the church I had rather speak five words with my understanding, that by my voice I might teach others also, than ten thousand words in an unknown tongue. 20. Brethren, be not children in understanding: howbeit, in malice be ye children, but in understanding be men.

The apostle here sums up the argument hitherto, and,
I. Directs them how they should sing and pray in public; (v. 15.) What is it then? I will pray with the spirit, and I will pray with the understanding also. I will sing with the spirit, &c. He does not forbid their praying or singing under a divine affilia-tus, or when they were inspired for this purpose, or have a spiritual gift connected to them in it; but he would have them perform both, so as to be understood by others, that others might join with them. Note, Public worship should be performed so as to be understood.
II. He enforces the argument with several reasons. 1. That otherwise the unlearned could not say Amen to their prayers or thanksgivings; could not join in the worship, for they did not understand it, v. 16. He who fills up or occupies the place of the unlearned, that is, as the ancients interpret it, the body of the people, who, in most Christian assemblyes, are illiterate; how should they say Amen to prayers in an unknown tongue? How should they declare their consent and concurrence? This is saying amen. So be it, God grant the thing we have requested; or, We join in the confession that has been made with the understanding, that this acknowledgment that has been made of divine mercies and favours. This is the import of saying amen. All should say amen inwardly; and it is not improper to testify this inward concurrence in public prayers and devotions, by an audible amen. The ancient Christians said amen aloud. Vide Just. Mart. apol. 2. prohj. fin. Now, how should the people say amen to what they did not understand? Note, There can be no concurrence in those prayers that are not understood.

The intention of public devotions is, therefore, enti-tirely destroyed, if they be performed in an unknown tongue. He who performs, may pray well, and give thanks well, but not in that time and place, because others are not, cannot be, edified (v. 17.) by what they understand not.

2. He alleges his own example, to make the ground smooth before. Concerning which, observe, (1.) That he did not come behind any of them in this spiritual gift; I thank my God, I speak with tongues more than ye all; (v. 18.) not only more than any single person among you, but more than all together. It was not envy at their better furniture, that made Paul depreciate what they so highly va-eued, and so much vaunted of; he surpassed them all in this very gift of tongues, and did not vilify their gift because he had it not. This spirit of envy is too common in the world. But the apostle took care to guard against this misconstruction of his pur-

do, by letting them know there was more ground for them to envy him upon this head, than for him to envy them. Note, When we beat down men's unreasonable value for themselves, or any of their possessions or attainments, we should let them see, if possible, that this does not proceed from an envi-

ev and grudge among all the rest, but that we can fairly give our conduct this invincible turn. Paul could not be justly censured or suspected for any such principle in this whole argument. He spake more languages than they all. Yet, (2.) He had rather speak five words with understanding, that is, so as to be understood, and instruct and edify others, than nine hundred and fifty in an unknown tongue, v. 19. He was so far from valuing himself upon talking languages, or making ostentation of his talents of this kind, that he had rather speak five intelligi-ble words, to benefit others, than make a thousand, ten thousand fine discourses, that would do no one else any good, because they did not understand them. Note, A truly Christian minister will value himself much more upon doing the least spiritual good to men's souls, than upon procuring the greatest applause and commendation to himself. This is true grandeur and nobleness of spirit; it is acting up to his character; it is approving himself the servant of Christ, and not a vassal to his own pride and vanity.

3. He adds a plain intimation, that the fondness they discovered for this gift, was but too plain an indication of the immaturity of their judgment; Brethren, be not children in understanding; in malice be ye children, but in understanding be men, v. 20.

Children are apt to be struck with novelty and strange appearances. They are taken with an outward shew, without inquiring into the true nature and worth of things. Do not you act like them, and prefer noise and shew to worth and substance; shew a greater ripeness of judgment, and act a more manly part; be like children in nothing but an innocent and inoffensive disposition. A double rebuke is couched in this passage, both of their pride upon account of their gifts, and their arrogance and haughtitiness towards each other, and the contents and quarrels proceeding from them. Note, Christians should be harmless and inoffensive as children, void of all guile and malice; but should have wisdom and knowledge that are ripe and mature. They should not be unskillful in the word of righteousness, (Heb. 5. 13.) though they should be unskillful in all the arts of mischief.

21. In the law it is written, With men of other tongues and other lips will I speak unto this people; and yet for all that will they not hear me, saith the Lord. 22. Wherefore tongues are for a sign, not to them that believe, but to them that believe not: but prophesying serveth not for them that believe not, but for them that believe.
23. If therefore the whole church be come together into one place, and all speak with tongues, and there come in those that are unlearned or unbelievers, will they not say that ye are mad? 24. But if all prophesy, and there come in one that believeth not, or one unlearned, he is convinced of all, he is judged of all: 25. And thus are the secrets of his heart made manifest; and so, falling down on his face, he will worship God, and report that God is in you of a truth.

In this passage the apostle pursues the argument and reasons from other topics; as,
1. Tongues, as the Corinthians used them, were rather a token of judgment from God, than mercy to any people; (v. 21.) In the law, that is, the Old Testament, it is written, With men of other tongues and other lips I will speak to this people; and yet for all that will they not hear me, saith the Lord, Isa. 28. 11. Compare Deut. 28. 46, 49. To both these places, it is thought, the apostle refers. Both are delivered by way of threatening, and one is supposed to interpret the other. The meaning in this view, is, that it is an evidence that a people are abandoned of God, (Isa. 28. 11.) for they speak not in the language of religious instruction, to the discipline of those who speak in another language. And surely the apostle's discourse implies, You should not be fond of the tokens of di-goine displeasure. God can have no gracious regards to those who are left merely to this sort of instruc tion, and taught in language which they cannot understand. They can never be benefited by such teaching as this; and when they are left to it, it is a sad sign that God gives them over as past cure. And should Christians covet to be in such a state, or bring *the churches into it? Yet thus did the Christian preachers in effect, who would always deliver their speculations in an unknown tongue. 22. To speak to unbelievers than to believers, v. 22. They were a spiritual gift, intended for the conviction and conversion of infidels, that they might be brought into the Christian church; but converts were to be built up in Christianity by profitable instructions in their own language. The gift of tongues was necessary to spread Christianity, and gather churches; it was proper and needful. Unbelievers are under a dispensation in which Christians had already embraced; but prophesying, and interpreting scripture in their own language, were most for the edification of such as did already believe: so that speaking with tongues in Christian assemblies was altogether out of time and place; neither one nor the other was proper for it. Note, That gifts may be rightly used, it is proper to know their several limits and bounds, and to use them accordingly.

To go to the conversion of infidels, as the apostles did, without the gift of tongues, and the discovery of this gift, had been a vain undertaking; but in an assembly of Christians already converted to the Christian faith, to make use and ostentation of this gift would be perfectly impertinent, because it would be of no advantage to the assembly; not for conviction of truth, because they had already embraced; but for the edification, because they did not understand, and could not get benefit without understanding, what they heard.

III. The credit and reputation of their assemblies among unbelievers required them to prefer prophesying before speaking with tongues. For, 1. If when they were all assembled for Christian worship, their ministers, or all employed in public worship, should talk unintelligible language, and infidels should drop in, they would conclude them to be mad, to be no better than a parcel of wild fanatics. Who in their right senses could carry on religious worship in such a manner? Or what sort of religion is that which leaves out sense and understanding? Would not this make Christianity ridiculous to a heathen, to hear the ministers of it pray, or preach, or perform other religious exercise, in a language that neither he nor any other understood? Christian religion is a sober and reasonable thing in itself, and should not, by the ministers of it, be made to look wild or senseless. They disgrace their religion, and vilify their own character, who do any thing that has this aspect. But, on the other hand, 2. If instead of speaking with tongues, those who minster, plainly interpret scripture, or preach, in language intelligible and proper, the good truths and rules of the gospel, a heathen or unlearned person coming in, would probably be convinced, and become a convert to Christianity; (v. 24, 25.) his conscience will be touched, the secrets of his heart will be revealed to him, he will be condemned by the truth he hears, and so will be brought to confess his guilt, to pay his homage to God, and own that He is infinite in power and knowledge. Instead of indulging in the senseless, incoherent, and wild ravings of Scripture-truth, plainly and duly taught, has a marvellous aptness to awaken the conscience, and touch the heart. And is not this much more for the honour of our religion, than that infidels should conclude the ministers of it a set of madmen, and their religious exercises only fits of phrensy? This last would at once cast contempt on themselves, and their religion too. Instead of procuring applause for themselves, it would render them ridiculous, and involve their profession in the same censure: whereas prophesying would certainly edify the church, much better keep up their credit, and might probably converse and convert infidels who might occasionally hear them. Note, Religious exercises in Christian assemblies should be such as are fit to edify the faithful, and converse, affect, and convert unbelievers. The ministry was not instituted to make ostentation of gifts and parts, but to save souls.

26. How is it then, brethren? When ye come together, every one of you hath a psalm, hath a doctrine, hath a tongue, hath a revelation, hath an interpretation. Let all things be done to edifying. 27. If any man speak in an unknown tongue, let it be by two, or at the most by three, and that by course; and let one interpret. 28. But if there be no interpreter, let him keep silence in the church: and let him speak to himself, and to God. 29. Let the prophets speak two or three, and let the other judge. 30. If anything be revealed to another that sitteth by, let the first hold his peace. 31. For ye may all prophesy one by one, that all may learn, and all may be comforted. 32. And the spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets. 33. For God is not the author of confusion, but of peace, as in all churches of the saints.

In this passage the apostle reproves them for their disorder, and endeavours to correct and regulate their conduct for the future.

1. He blames them for the confusion they introduced into the assembly, by ostentation of their gifts; (v. 26.) When ye come together, every one hath a psalm, hath a doctrine, hath a tongue, &c. that is, either, “You are apt to confound the several parts of worship; and while one has a psalm to utter by inspiration, another has a doctrine, or revelation,” or else, “You are apt to be confused in the same branch of worship, many of you having psalms or doctrines to propose at the same time, without staying for one another. Is not this perfect uproar? Can this be edifying? And yet, all religious exercises in public assemblies should have this view, Let all things be done to edifying.”

II. He corrects their faults, and lays down some regulations for their future conduct. As, 1. To speaking in an unknown tongue, he orders, that no more than two or three should do it at one meeting, and this not altogether, but successively, one after another. And even this was not to be done unless there were some one to interpret, (v. 27, 28.) some other interpreter. He would have: for to speak in an unknown tongue, what thing is afterward to interpret, could only be for ostentation. But if another were present, who could interpret, two miraculous gifts might be exercised at once, and thereby the church edified, and the faith of the hearers confirmed at the same time. But if there were none to interpret, he was to be silence in the church, and not exercise his gift between God and himself, (v. 28.) that is, (as before,) one in private, at home; for all who are present at public worship, should join in it, and not be at their private devotions in public assemblies. Solitary devotions are out of time and place, when the church is met for social worship. 2. As to prophesying, he orders, (1.) That two or three only should speak at one meeting, (v. 20.) and this successively, not all at once; and the other should examine and judge what he delivered, that is, discern and determine concerning it, whether it were of divine inspiration or not. There might be false prophets, mere pretenders to divine inspiration; and the true prophets were to judge of these, and discern and discover who was divinely inspired, and by such interpretation, taught the church, and who was not; what was of divine inspiration, and what was not. This seems to be the meaning of this rule. For where a prophet was known to be such, and under the divine afflatus, he could not be judged; for this were to subject even the Holy Spirit to the judgment of men. He who was indeed inspired, and known to be so, was above all human judgment. (2.) He orders, that, if any assistant prophets had a revelation, while another was prophesying, the other should hold his peace, be silent, (v. 30.) before the inspired assistant uttered his revelation. Indeed, it is by many understood, that the former speaker should immediately hold his peace. But this seems unnatural, and not so well to agree with the context. For why must one that was speaking by inspiration, be immediately silent upon another man's being inspired, if he was as truly inspired as the other? was not the same Spirit? Indeed, he who had the new revelation, might claim liberty of speech in his turn, upon producing his vouchers: but why must liberty of speech be taken from him who was speaking before, and his mouth stopped, when he was delivering the dictates of the same Spirit, and could produce the same vouchers? Would the Spirit of God move one who was speaking before to deliver what he had to say, move another to insert his thoughts, and prevent him to silence? This seems to me an unnatural thought. Nor is it more agreeable to the context, and the reason annexed, (v. 31.) That all might prophesy, one by one, or one after another; which could not be, where any one was interrupted and silenced before he had done prophesying; but might easily be, if he, who was afterward inspired, forbore to deliver his new revelation, till the former prophet had finished what he had to say. And to confirm this sense, the apostle quickly adds, The spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets; (v. 33.) that is, the spiritual gifts they have, leave them still possessed of their reason, and capable of using their own judgment in the exercise of them. Divine inspirations are not like the diabolical possessions of heathen priests, violent and ungodly, and passionate, and destructive to the church, if they were not restrained by them themselves; but are sober and calm, and capable of regular conduct. The man inspired by the Spirit of God, may still act the man, and observe the rules of natural order and decency in delivering his revelations. His spiritual gift is thus far subject to his pleasure, and to be managed by his discretion.

III. The apostle gives the reasons of these regulations. As, 1. That they would be for the church's benefit, and that it is, That all might learn, and all may be comforted or exhorted, that the prophets were to speak in the orderly manner the apostle advises. Note, The instruction, edification, and comfort, of the church, is that for which God instituted the ministry. And surely ministers should, as much as possible, fit their communications to these purposes. 2. He tells them, God is the author of peace and order, and the preservation of peace and good order, v. 33. And therefore the inspired must be inspired by no means throw Christian assemblies into confusion, and break through all rules of common decency; which yet would be unavoidable, if several inspired men should all at once utter what was suggested to them by the Spirit of God, and not wait to take their turns. Note, The honour of God requires that things should be managed in Christian assemblies, so as not to transgress the rules of natural decency. If they are managed in a tumultuous and confused manner, what a notion must this give of the God who is worshipped, to considerate observers! Does it look as if he were the God of peace and order, and an enemy to confusion? Things should be managed so in divine worship, that no unlovely or dishonourable notion of God should be formed in the minds of men. So the apostle goes on.

34. Let your women keep silence in the churches: for it is not permitted unto them to speak; but they are commanded to be under obedience, as also saith the law. 35. And if they will learn anything, let them ask their husbands at home: for it is a shame for women to speak in the church.

Here the apostle,

1. Enjoins silence on their women in public assemblies, to a degree, that they must not ask questions for their own information in the church, but ask their husbands at home. They are to learn in silence with all subjection; but, says the apostle, I suffer them not to teach, 1 Tim. 2. 11, 12. There is indeed an intimation, (ch. 11. 5.) as if the women sometimes did pray and prophesy in their assemblies, which the apostle, in that passage, does not simply condemn, but the manner of performance, that is, praying or prophesying with the head uncovered, which, in that age and country, was throwing off the distinction of sexes, and setting themselves on a level with the men. But here he seems to forbid all public performances of theirs. They are not permitted to speak (v. 34.) in the church, neither in praying nor prophesying. The connexion seems plainly to include the last, in the limited sense in which it is taken, in this chapter, that is, for preaching, or interpreting scripture by inspiration. And indeed, for a woman to prophesy in this sense, were to teach, which does not so well befit her state of subjection. A teacher of others has in that respect a superiority over them, which is not allowed the woman over the man, nor must she therefore be allowed to teach in a congregation; I suffer them not to teach. But praying, and uttering hymns inspired, were not teaching. And seeing there were women that had spiritual gifts of this sort in the church, (see Acts 12. 9.) and might be under this impulse in the assembly, must they altogether suppress it? Or why should they have this gift, if it must never be publicly exercised? For these reasons, some think that these general prohibitions are only to be understood in common cases; but that upon extraordinary occasions, when women were present at a meeting of the church, and there were spiritual gifts of this sort in the assembly, the church, might have liberty of speech. They were not ordinarily to teach, not so much as to debate and ask questions in the church, but learn in silence there; and if difficulties occurred, ask their own husbands at home. Note, As it is the woman's duty to learn in subjection, it is the man's duty to keep up his superiority, by being able to instruct her; if it be her duty to teach, ask her husband at home, it is his concern and duty to endeavour at least to be able to answer.
I. CORINTHIANS, XV.

ner inquiries: if it be a shame for her to speak in the church, where she should be silent, it is a shame for him to be silent. Christ should speak, and not be able to give an answer, when she asks him at home.

2. We have here the reason of this injunction: It is God's law and commandment, that they should be under obedience; (v. 34.) they are placed in subordination to the man; and it is a shame for them to do any thing that looks like an affectation of changing ranks, which speaking in public seemed to imply, at least in that age, and among that people, as with the public teaching of the Church: that the apostle concludes, it was a shame for women to speak in the church, in the assembly. Shame is the mind's uneasy reflection on having done an indecent thing. And what more indecent than for a woman to quit her rank, renounce the subordination of her sex, or do what, in common account, had such aspect and appearance? Note, Our spirit and conduct should be suitable to our rank. The natural distinctions God has made, we should observe. Those he has placed in subjection to others, should not set themselves on a level, or affect or assume superiority. The woman was made subject to the man, and she should keep her station, and be content with it. For this reason they must be silent in the churches, not set up for teachers; for this is setting up for superiority over the man.

36. What! Came the word of God out from you? Or came it unto you only? 37. If any man think himself to be a prophet, or spiritual, let him acknowledge that the things that I write unto you are the commandments of the Lord. 38. But if any man be ignorant, let him be ignorant. 39. Wherefore, brethren, covet to prophesy, and forbide not to speak with tongues. 40. Let all things be done decently and in order.

In these verses the apostle closes his argument, 1. With a just reprove of the Corinthians for their extravagant pride and self-conceit: they so managed with the public teaching of the Church, that they behaved in a manner by themselves, and would not easily endure control or regulation. Now, says the apostle, to beat down this arrogant humour, "Came the gospel out from you? Or came it to you only?" v. 36. Did Christianity come out of Corinth; was its original among you? Or, if not, is it now limited and confined to you; are you the only church favourved with divine revelations, that you will depart from the decent usages of all other churches; and, to make ostentation of your spiritual gifts, bring confusion into Christian assemblies? How intolerably assuming is this behaviour! Pray bethink yourselves." When it was needful or proper, the apostle could rebuke with all authority; and surely his rebukes, if ever, were proper here. Note, They must be reproved and humbled, whose spiritual pride and self-conceit throw Christian churches and assemblies into confusion; though such men will hardly hear even the rebukes of an apostle.

2. He lets them know, that what he said to them was the command of God; nor durst any true prophet, any one really inspired, deny it; (v. 37.) "If any man think himself a prophet, or spiritual, let him acknowledge, &c. nay, let him be tried by this very rule. If he will not own what I deliver on this head, he shall be held to himself never at the part of the Spirit of Christ. The Spirit of Christ can never contradict itself; if it speak in me, and in them, it must speak the same things in both. If their revelations contradict mine, they do not come from the same spirit; either I or they must be false prophets. By this therefore you may know them. If they say that my directions in this matter are no divine commandments, you may depend, the Corinthians are not divinely inspired. But if any continue after all, through prejudice or obstinacy, uncertain or ignorant whether they or I speak by the Spirit of God, they must be left under the power of this ignorance. If their pretences to inspiration can stand in competition with the apostolical character and powers which I have, I have lost all my authority and influence; and the persons who allow of this competition against me, are out of the reach of conviction, and must be left to themselves." Note, It is just with God, to leave them to the blindness of their own minds, who wilfully shut out the light. They who would be ignorant in so plain a case, were justly left under the power of their mistake.

3. He sums up all in two general advices. (1.) That though they should not despise the gift of tongues, nor altogether disuse it, under the mentioned regulations, yet they should prefer prophesying. This is indeed the scope of the whole argument. It was to be preferred to the other, because it was the more useful gift. (2.) He charges them to let all things be done decently and in order, (v. 40.) that is, that they should avoid every thing that was manifestly indecent and disorderly. Not that they should henceforth make occasion to bring occasion into the Christian church and worship anything that they would think might make ornamental to it, and would help to set it off. Such indecencies and disorders, as he had remarked upon, were especially to be shunned. They must do nothing that was manifestly childish, (v. 20.) or that would give occasion to say they were mad; (v. 22.) not must they act so as to breed confusion, v. 33. This would be utterly indecent; it would make a tumult and confusion of a Christian assembly. But they were to do things in order; they were to speak one after another, and not all at once; take their turns, and not interrupt one another. To do otherwise, was to destroy the end of a Christian ministry, and all assemblies for Christian worship.

Note, Manifest indecencies and disorders are to be carefully kept out of all Christian churches, and every part of divine worship. They should have no nothing in them that is mirthful, or worldly, or ridiculous, or wild, or tumultuous; but all parts of divine worship should be carried on in a manly, grave, rational, composed, and orderly manner. God is not to be dishonoured, nor his worship disgraced, by our unbecoming and disorderly performance of it, and attendance at it.

CHAP. XV.

In this chapter, the apostle treats of that great article of Christianity—the resurrection of the dead. I. He establishes the certainty of our Saviour's resurrection. 1. He. From this truth, sets himself to refute those who said, There is no resurrection of the dead, v. 12. 19. III. From our Saviour's resurrection he establishes the resurrection of the dead, v. 20. 23. 26. 31. And, confirming the Corinthians in the belief of it, by some other considerations, v. 20. 34. IV. He answers an objection against this truth, and takes occasion thence to shew what a vast change will be made in the bodies of the dead, v. 35. 36. 39. He informs us what a change will be made in them who shall be living at the sound of the last trumpet, and the complete conquest the just shall then obtain over death and sin, v. 50. 54. 56. And, v. 57. Moreover, brethren, I declare unto you the gospel which I preached unto you, which also ye have received, and wherein ye stand: 2. By which also ye are saved, if ye keep in memory what I preached unto you, unless ye have believed in vain. 3. For I delivered unto you first of all that which I also received, how that Christ died for our sins, according to the scriptures; 4. And that he was buried, and that he rose again the third day, according to the scriptures: 5. And that he was seen of Cephas, then of the twelve: 6. After that, he was seen of above five hundred brethren at once; of whom the greater part remain unto this present, but some are fallen asleep. 7. After that, he was seen of James; then of all the apostles. 8. And last of all he was seen of me also, as of one born out of due time. 9. For I am the least of all the apostles, that am not meet to be called an apostle, because I persecuted the church of God. 10. But by the grace of God I am what I am: and his grace which was bestowed upon me was not in vain; but I laboured more abundantly than they all: yet not I, but the grace of God which was with me. 11. Therefore whether it were I or they, so we preach, and so ye believe.

It is the apostle's business in this chapter, to assert and establish the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead, which some of the Corinthians flatly denied, v. 10. Whether they turned this doctrine into allegory, as did Hymenæus and Philetus, by saying it was already past, (2 Tim. 2. 17, 18.) and several of the ancient heretics, by making it mean no more than a changing their course of life; or whether they rejected it as absurd, upon principles of reason and science; it seems they denied it in the proper sense. And they disowned a future state of recompenses, by denying the resurrection of the dead. Now that Heathens and infidels should deny this truth, does not seem so strange; but that Christians, who had their religion by revelation, should deny a truth so plainly discovered, is surprising, especially when it is a truth of such importance. It was time for the apostle to confirm them in this truth, when the staggering of their faith in this point was likely to shake their Christianity; and they were yet in great danger of having their faith staggered.

He begins with an epitome or summary of the gospel, what he had preached among them, namely, the death and resurrection of Christ. Upon this foundation the whole of the resurrection of the dead is built. Note, Divine truths appear with greatest evidence, when they are looked upon in their mutual connexion. The foundation may be strengthened, that the superstructure may be secured. Now concerning the gospel, observe, 1. What a stress he lays upon it; (v. 1, 2.) Moreover, brethren, I declare unto you the gospel I preached unto you. 1. It was what he constantly preached. His word was not yea and nay; he always preached the same gospel, and taught the same truth. He could appeal to his hearers for this. Truth is in its own nature invariable; and the infallible teachers of divine truth could never be at variance with themselves, or one another. The doctrine which Paul had heretofore taught, he still taught. 2. It was what he had received; they had been convinced of the faith, believed it in their hearts, or at least made profession of doing so with their mouths. It was no strange doctrine. It was that very gospel in which, or by which, they had hitherto stood, and must continue to stand. If they gave up this truth, they left themselves no ground to stand upon, no footing in religion. Note, The doctrine of Christ's death and resurrection is at the foundation of Christianity; it is the foundation, and the whole falls; all our hopes for eternity rest upon it at once. And it is by holding this truth firm, that Christians are made to stand in a day of trial, and kept faithful to God. 3. It was that alone by which they could hope for salvation; (v. 2.) for there is no salvation in any other name; no name given under heaven, by which we may be saved, but by the name of Christ. And there is no salvation in his name, but by the hope that is of him. These are the saving truths of our holy religion. The crucifixion of our Redeemer, and his conquest over death, are the very source of our spiritual life and hopes. Now concerning these saving truths, observe, (1.) They must be retained in mind, they must be held fast; (so the word is translated, Heb. 10. 23.) Let us hold fast the profession of our faith. Note, The saving truths of the gospel must be fixed in our minds, and firmly maintained and held fast to the end, if we would be saved. They will not save us, if we do not attend to them, and yield to their power, and continue to do so to the end. He only that endureth to the end, shall be saved, Matt. 10. 22. (2.) We believe in vain, unless we continue and persevere in the faith of the gospel; we shall be neither the better for a temporary faith; nay, we shall aggravate our guilt by relapsing into infidelity. And in vain is it to profess Christianity, or our faith in Christ, if we deny the resurrection; for this must imply and involve the denial of his resurrection: and take away this, you make nothing of Christianity, you leave nothing for faith or hope to fix upon.

II. Observe what this gospel is, on which the apostle lays such stress. It was that doctrine which he had received, and delivered to them, παντιστι, among the first, the principal. It was a doctrine of the first rank, a most necessary truth, That Christ died for our sins, and was buried, and rose again: or, in other words, that he was delivered for our offences, and rose again for our justification; (Rom. 4. 25.) that he was offered in sacrifice for our sins, and rose again, to shew that he had procured forgiveness for them, and was accepted of God in this offering. Note, Christ's death and resurrection are the very sum and substance of evangelical truth. Hence we derive our spiritual life now, and here we must found our hopes of everlasting life hereafter.

III. Observe how this truth is confirmed, 1. By Old-Testament predictions. He died for our sins, according to the scriptures; he was buried, and rose from the dead, according to the scriptures; according to the scripture-prophecies, and scripture-types. Such predictions are Ps. 16. 10. Isa. 53. 4—6. Deut. 9. 26, 27. Hos. 6. 2. Such scripture-types as Jonah, (Matt. 12. 42.) as Isaac, who is expressly said by the apostle to have been received from the dead in a figure, Heb. 11. 19. Note, It is a great confirmation of our faith of the gospel, to see how it corresponds with ancient types and prophecies. 2. By the testimony of many eye-witnesses, who saw Christ after he was risen from the dead. He must have seen himself; he must have seen that to himself. He was seen of Cephas, or Peter, then of the twelve, called so, though Judas was no longer among them, because this was their usual number; then he was seen of above five hundred brethren at once; many of whom were living when the apostle wrote this epistle, though some were fallen asleep. This was in Galilee, Matt. 28. 10. After that, he was seen of James singly, and then by all the apostles, when he was taken up into heaven. This was on mount Olives, Luke 24. 50. Compare Acts 1. 3—7. Note, How inconceivably evil was Christ's resurrection to the dead, when so many eyes saw him at so many several times alive, and when he indulged the weakness of one disciple so far as to let him handle him, to put his resurrection out of doubt! And what reason have we to believe them who were so steady in maintaining this truth, though they hazard ed all that was dear to them in this world, by de neavouring to assert and propagate it? It was last called and dealt with our sight of him. It was one of the peculiar offices of an apostle, to be a witness of our Saviour's resurrection; (Luke 24. 48.) and when Paul was called to the apostolical office, he was made an evidence of this sort; the Lord Jesus appeared to him by the way to Damascus, Acts 9. 17.

Having mentioned this favour, he takes occasion from it, to last a humble digression concerning himself. He was highly favoured of God, but he always endeavoured to keep up a mean opinion of himself, and to express it. So he does here, by observing, (1.) That he was one born out of due time, (v. 8.) an abortive, an accursed, a child dead born, and out of time. Paul resembled such a birth, in the suddenness of his new birth, in that he was not matured for the apostolical function, as the others were, who were born at a personal command with our Lord, and called to the office when such conversation was not to be had, he was out of time for it. He had not known or followed the Lord, nor been formed in his family, as the others were, for this high and honour able function. This was, in Paul's account, a very humiliating circumstance. (2.) By owning himself inferior to the other apostles; not meet to be called an apostle. The least, because the last of them; called last, because he was not worthy to make them, the apostle, to have either the office or the title, because he had been a persecutor of the church of God, v. 9. Indeed, he tells us elsewhere, that he was not a whit behind the very chiefest apostles; (2 Cor. 11. 5.) for gifts, graces, service, and sufferings, inferior to none of them. Yet some circumstances in his case made him think more meanly of himself than any of them. Note, A humble spirit, in the midst of high attainments, is a great ornament to any man; it sets his good qualities off to much greater advantage. What kept Paul low in an especial manner, was, the remembrance of his former wickedness, his raging and destructive zeal against Christ and his members. Note, How easily God can bring a good out of the greatest evil! When sinners are by divine grace turned into saints, he makes the remembrance of their former sins very serviceable, to make them humble, and diligent, and faithful. (3.) By ascribing all that was valuable in him to divine grace; But by the grace of God I am what I am, v. 10. It is God's prerogative to say, I am that I am; it is our privilege to be able to say, "By God's grace we are what we are." We are nothing but what God makes us; nothing in religion but what his grace makes us. All that is good in us, is drawn from this fountain. Paul was sensible of this, and kept humble and thankful by this conviction; so should we. Nay, though he was conscious of his own diligence, and zeal, and service, so that he could say of himself, the grace of God was not given him in vain, but he laboured more abundantly than they all; he thought himself so much more the debtor to divine grace. Yet not I, but the grace of God which was with me. Note, Those who have the grace of God bestowed on them, should take care that it be not in vain. They should cherish, and exercise, and exert, this heavenly principle. So did Paul, and therefore laboured with so much heart, and so much success. And yet the more he laboured, and the more good he did, the more humble was he in his opinion of himself, and the more disposed to own and magnify the favour of God toward him, his free and unei rited favour. Note, A humble spirit will be very apt to own and magnify the grace of God. A humble spirit is commonly a gracious one. Where pride is subdued, there it is reasonable to believe grace reigns.

After this digression, the apostle returns to his argument, and tells them (v. 11.) that he not only preached the same gospel himself at all times, and in all places, but that all the apostles preached the same; Whether it were they or I, so we preached, and so ye believed. Whether Peter, or Paul, or any other apostle, had converted them to Christianity, all maintained the same truth, told the same story, preached the same doctrine, and confirmed it by the same evidence. All agreed in this, that Jesus Christ, and him crucified, and slain, and then rising from the dead, was the very sum and substance of Christianity; and this all true Christians believe. All the apostles agreed in this testimony; all Christians agree in the belief of it; by this faith they live, in this faith they die.

12. Now if Christ be preached, that he rose from the dead, how say some among you, that there is no resurrection of the dead? 13. But if there he no resurrection of the dead, then is Christ not risen: 14. And if Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain, and your faith is also vain. 15. Yea, and we are found false witnesses of God; because we have testified of God that he raised up Christ; whom he raised not up, if so be that the dead rise not. 16. For if the dead rise not, then is not Christ raised: 17. And if Christ be not raised, your faith is vain; ye are yet in your sins. 18. Then they also who are fallen asleep in Christ, are perished. 19. If in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable.

Having confirmed the truth of our Saviour's resurrection, the apostle goes on to refute those among the Corinthians, who said there would be none; If Christ be preached, that he rose from the dead, how say some among you, that there is no resurrection of the dead? v. 12. It seems from this passage, and the course of the argument, there were some amongst the Corinthians, who thought the resurrection an impossibility. This was a common sentiment among the heathens. But against this the apostle produces an incontestable fact, that is, the resurrection of Christ; and goes on to argue against them from the absurdities that must follow from their principle.

As, If there be, can be, no resurrection of the dead, then Christ is not risen; (v. 13.) and again, "If the dead rise not, cannot be raised or recovered to life, then is not Christ raised, v. 16. And yet it was foretold in ancient prophecies, that he should rise; and it has been proved by multitudes of eye-witnesses, that he is risen. And will you say, will any among you dare to say, that is not, cannot be, which God long ago said shall be, and is now undoubted matter of fact?"

II. It would follow hereupon, that the preaching and faith of the gospel would be vain; If Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain, and your faith vain, v. 14. This supposition admitted, would destroy the principal evidence of Christianity; and
so. 1. Make preaching vain. "We apostles should be found false witnesses of God; we pretend to be God's witnesses for this truth, and to work miracles by his power in confirmation of it, and are all the while deceivers, liars for God, if in his name, and by power received from him, we wrought, and pub-lished, and set up living false fact, and impossible to be true. And does not this make us the vainest men in the world, and our office and ministry the vainest and most useless thing in the world? What end could we propose to ourselves, in undertaking this hard and hazardous service, if we knew our religion stood on no better foundation, nay if we were not well assured of the contrary? What should we pretend to, for God, and what do we the worth of any vain? We can have no favourable expectations in this life; and we could have none beyond it. If Christ be not risen, the gospel is a jest; it is chaff and emptiness." 2. This supposition would make the faith of Christians vain, as well as the labours of ministers; If Christ be not raised, your faith is vain; ye are yet in your sins, (v. 16.) yet under the guilt and condemnation of sin, because it is through this one action that our present and eternal salvation is to be had. We have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins, Eph. 1. 7. No re- mission of sins is to be had, but through the shed- ing of his blood. And had his blood been shed, and his life taken away, without ever being restored, what evidence could we have had, that through him we should have justification and eternal life? Had he remained under the power of death, how should we have power? And how vain a thing is faith in him, upon this supposi-tion! He must rise for our justification, who was delivered for our sins, or in vain we look for any such benefit by him. There had been no justification, or salvation, if Christ had not risen. And must not faith in Christ be vain, and of no signification, if he be still among the dead? III. Another abeyance follows from this supposi-tion, is, that those who are fallen asleep in Christ, are perished. If there be no resurrection, they cannot rise, and therefore are lost, even those who have died in the Christian faith, and for it. It is plain from this, that those among the Corinthians, who denied the resurrection, meant thereby a state of future retribution, and not merely the revival of the flesh; they took death to be the destruction and extinction of the man, and not the life; for otherwise the apostle could not infer the utter loss of those who slept in Jesus, from the supposi-tion they would never rise more, or that they had no hopes in Christ after life; for they might have hope of happiness for their minds, if these sur-vived their bodies; and this would prevent the limiting their hopes in Christ to this life only. Upon supposition there is no resurrection in your sense, no after life, then dead Christians are quite lost. How vain a thing were our faith and religion upon this supposition! And this, IV. Would infer, that Christ's ministers and serv-ants were of all men most miserable, as having hope in him in this life only, (v. 19.) which is another absurdity that would follow from asserting no resurrection. Their condition who hope in Christ will be in the same as that of other men, who hope in Christ. Note. All who believe in him as a Redeemer, hope for redemption and salvation by him; but if there be no resurrection, or state of future re-compense, (which was intended by those who de-nied the resurrection at Corinth,) their hope in him must be limited to this life: and if all their hopes in Christ lie within the compass of this life, they are in a much worse condition than the rest of mankind, especially at that time, and under those cir-cumstances, in which the apostles wrote; for then they had no countenance or protection from the rulers of the world, but were hated and persecuted by all men. Preachers and private Christians there-fore had a hard lot, if in this life only they had hope in Christ. Better be any thing than a Christian under these terms; for in this world they are hated, and hunted, and abused, stripped of all worldly com-forts, and exposed to all manner of sufferings; they fare much harder than other men in this life, and yet have no further or better hopes. And is it not absurd for one who believes in Christ, to admit a principle that involves so absurd an inference? Can that man have faith in Christ, who can believe con-tingencies that Christ's ministers, whether ministers or others, in a worse state than his enemies? Note, It is a gross absurdity in a Christian, to admit the supposition of no resurrection or future state. It leaves him no hopes beyond the world; and this would often make his condition the worse. Indeed, the Christian is by his religion crucified to this world, and taught to live upon the hope of another. Carnal pleasures are insipid to him, and carnal objects; and spiritual and heavenly pleasures are those which he affects and ponders after. How sad is his case indeed, if he must be dead to worldly pleasures, and yet never hope for any better! 20. But now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the first-fruits of them that slept. 21. For since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead. 22. For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive. 23. But every man in his own order: Christ the first-fruits; afterwards they that are Christ's, at his coming. 24. Then cometh the end, when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father; when he shall have put down all rule, and all authority and power. 25. For he must reign, till he hath put all enemies under his feet. 26. The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death. 27. For he hath put all things under his feet. But when he saith, All things are put under him, it is manifest, that he is excepted, who did put all things under him. 28. And when all things shall be subdued unto him, then shall the Son also himself be subject unto him that put all things under him, that God may be all in all. 29. Else what shall they do, who are baptized for the dead, if the dead rise not at all? Why are they then baptized for the dead? 30. And why stand we in jeopardy every hour? 31. I protest by your rejoicing which I have in Christ Jesus our Lord, I die daily. 32. If after the manner of men I have fought with beasts at Ephesus, what advantage had I, if the dead rise not at all? Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die. 33. Be not deceived: evil communications corrupt good manners. 34. Awake to righteousness, and sin not; for some have not the knowledge of God: I speak this to your shame.
In this passage the apostle establishes the truth of the resurrection of the dead, the holy dead, the dead in Christ.

I. On the resurrection of Christ: 1. Because he is indeed the first-fruits of them that slept, v. 20. He is truly risen himself, and he is risen in this very quality and character, as the first-fruits of them who sleep in him. As he is assuredly risen, so in his resurrection there is as much an earnest given, that the dead in him shall rise, as there was, to the Jews, a harvest in general should be accepted, and blessed by the offering and acceptance of the first-fruits. The whole lump was made holy by the consecration of the first-fruits, (Rom. 11. 16.) and the whole body of Christ; all that are by faith united to him, are by his resurrection ascernated of their own. As he is risen, they shall rise; just as the lump is holy, because the first-fruits are so. He is not risen, that, as the first had no life before his inheritance in the body of the church; and those that sleep in him, God will bring with him, 1 Thess. 4. 14. Note, Christ's resurrection is a pledge and earnest of our's, if we are true believers in him: because he is risen, we shall rise. We are a part of the consecrated lump, and shall partake of the acceptance and favour. Vouchsafe the first-fruits. This is the first argument used by the apostle in confirmation of the truth of Christ's resurrection, and for a parallel between the first and second Adam. For since by man came death, it was every way proper that by man should come deliverance from it, or, which is all one, a resurrection, v. 21. And so, as in Adam all die, in Christ shall all be made alive; as through the sin of the first Adam all men became mortal, because all derived from him the same sinful nature, so through the merit and resurrection of Christ shall all those who are under the power of corruption, and the spiritual nature, revive, and become immortal. All who die, die through the sin of Adam, all who are raised, in the sense of the apostle, rise through the merit and power of Christ. But the meaning is not, that, as all men died in Adam, so all men, without exception, shall be made alive in Christ; for the scope of the apostle's argument restrains the general meaning. Christ rose as the First-fruits; and therefore they who are in Christ, (v. 23.) shall rise. From hence it will not follow, that all men without exception shall rise too: but it will fitly follow, that all who thus rise, rise in virtue of Christ's resurrection, and so that their revival is owing to the man Christ Jesus, as the mortality of all mankind was owing to the first man; and so as by man came death, by man came deliverance. Thus it seemed fit to the divine wisdom, to give a forewarning of the resurrection of the dead, that there may be no occasion of sinning after death, by sin, the second Adam should raise his seed to a glorious immortality. Before he leaves the argument, he, 3. Observes, That there will be an order observed in their resurrection. What that precisely will be, we are no where told, but in the general only here, that there will be order observed. Possibly, they may rise first, who have held the highest rank, and done the most eminent service in their days, or in their sin, and paid the highest prices or cruell deaths, for Christ's sake. It is only here said, that the first-fruits are supposed to rise first, and afterward all who are Christ's, when he shall come again. Not that Christ's resurrection must in fact go before the resurrection of any of his, but it must be laid as the foundation; as it was not necessary that they who lived remote from Jerusalem, must go thither, and offer the first-fruits, before they could account the lump holy; yet they must be set apart for this purpose, till they could be offered, which might be done at any time from Pentecost till the feast of dedication. See Bishop Patrick on Numb. 26. 2. The offering of the first-fruits was what made the lump holy; and the lump was made holy by this offering, though it was not made before the harvest was gathered in, so it were set apart for that end, and duly offered afterward. So Christ's resurrection must, in order of nature, precede that of his saints, though some of these might rise in order of time before him. It is because he is risen, that they rise. Note, They that are Christ's, must rise, because of their relation to him. He argues, That the continuance of the mediatorial kingdom till all Christ's enemies are destroyed, the last of which is death, v. 24—26. He is risen, and, upon his resurrection, was invested with sovereign empire, had all power in heaven and earth put into his hands, (Matt. 28. 18.) had a name given him above every name, that every knee might bow to him, and every tongue confess him Lord, Philip. 2. 9—11. And the administration of this kingdom must continue, till all opposing power, and rule, and authority, be put down, (v. 24.) till all enemies are put under his feet, (v. 25.) and till the last enemy is destroyed, which is death, v. 26. Now, this argument implies in it all these particulars: 1. That our Saviour rose from the dead, to have all power put into his hands, and have and administer a kingdom, as Mediator; For the end in both died, and was raised again, and lo he is in both of the dead and living, Rom. 14. 2. That this mediatorial kingdom is to have an end, at least as far as it is concerned in bringing his people safe to glory, and subduing all his and their enemies; Then cometh the end, v. 24. 3. That it is not to have an end, till all opposing power be put down, and all enemies brought to his feet, v. 25. 4. That, among other enemies, death must be destroyed, (v. 25.) or abolished; its power over his members must be disannulled. Thus far the apostle is express; but he leaves us to make the inference, that therefore the saints must rise; else death and the grave would have power over them; nor would our Saviour's kingly power prevail against the last enemy of his people, and annul its power. When saints shall live again, and die no more, then, and not till then, is death abolished, which must be brought about before our Saviour's mediatorial kingdom is delivered before our eyes, which yet must be in due time. The saints therefore shall live again, and die no more. This is the scope of the arguments; but the apostle drops several hints in the course of it, that will be properly noticed as, (1.) That our Saviour, as Man, and Mediator between God and man, has a delegated royalty, a kingdom given; All things are put under him; he exalted, the angelic nature, Rev. 1:16. All things are put under Christ, v. 27. As Man, all his authority must be delegated. And though his mediation supposes his divine nature, yet as Mediator he does not so explicitly sustain the character of God, but a middle Person between God and man, partaking of both natures, human and divine, as he was to reconcile both parties, God and man; and receiving commission and authority from God the Father, in this office. That he is the other person in the whole discharge, in the majesty, and with the authority, of God: the Son, made Man, appears as the Minister of the Father, though he is God as well as the Father. Nor is this passage to be understood of the eternal dominion over all his creatures, which belongs to him as God, but of a kingdom committed to him as Mediator and God-man, and that chiefly after his resurrection, when, having power in hand, he last went down to his Father, Rev. 14. Then was the prediction verified, I have set my King upon my holy hill of Zion, (Ps. 2. 6.) placed him on his throne. This is meant by the phrase so frequent in the writings of the New Testament, of sitting at the right hand of God; (Mark 14. 19. Rom. 8. 34. Col. 3. 1. &c.) on the right hand of power; (Mark 16. 19. Luke 22. 69.) on the right
I. It Must (Luke 0:39.)

What shall they do, who are baptized for the dead, if the dead rise not at all? Why are they baptized for the dead? What shall they do, if the dead rise not at all? Why are they baptized for the dead? Must they stand by it, and

II. It was the Lord's doing, and should be marvellous in our eyes

III. He argues for the resurrection, from the case of those who were baptized for the dead; (v. 29.) What shall they do, who are baptized for the dead, if the dead rise not at all? Why are they baptized for the dead? What shall they do, if the dead rise not at all? Must they be baptized for the dead, if the dead rise not at all? They shall be baptized for the dead, if the dead rise not at all? They shall be baptized for the dead, if the dead rise not at all?

But what is this baptism for the dead? It is necessary to be known, that the apostle's argument may mean; whether it be only argumentum ad hominem, or ad rem; that is, whether it conclude for the thing in dispute universally, or only for the particular case. If so, they shall interpret this very obscure passage, which, though it consists of no more than three words, besides the article, has had more than three senses put on it by interpreters. It being not agreed, what is meant by baptism; whether it be to be taken in a proper or figurative sense; and in a proper sense, whether it be to be understood of Christian baptism properly so called, or some other allusion.

Some understand the dead, of our Saviour himself; wide Whiting in loco. Why are persons baptized in name of a dead Saviour, a Saviour who remains among the dead, if the dead rise not at all? But it is, I believe, an instance perfectly singular, for it is not more universal. And the αἱ ἄρτες τοῦ ζῶντος (the baptized) seem plainly to mean some particular persons, not Christians in general; which yet must be the signification, if the αἱ νεκροι τῶν νεκρῶν (the dead) be understood of our Saviour. Some understand the passage of the martyrs; Why do they suffer martyrdom for their religion? This is sometimes called the baptism of blood by the ancients; and, by our Saviour himself, baptism indefinitely, Matt. 20:22. Luke 12:20. How vain is the notion that die martyrs, for the sake of their religion, be said to be baptized, that is, die martyrs for the dead? Some understand it of a custom that was observed, as some of the ancients tell us, among many who professed the Christian name in the first ages, of baptizing some in the name and stead of catechumens dying without baptism. But this savoured of such superstition, that, if the custom had prevailed, the world would have no where else be baptized for the dead, and still to the redemption of his people, and the utter ruin of their enemies effected. (4.) When this is done, and all things are put under his feet, then shall the Son be come subject to him that put all things under him, that God may be all in all, v. 28. The meaning of which is, that he shall then reign, and reign till the time is come, when the whole administration of this kingdom, shall appear, upon the giving it up, to be a Subject of the Father. Things are in scripture many times said to be, when they are manifested and made to appear; and this delivering up the kingdom will make it manifest, that he who appeared in the majesty of the sovereign King, was, during this administration, a subject of God. The glorified humanity of our Lord Jesus Christ, with all the dignity and power con-the constancy and firmness which the martyrs discovered. Not to observe, that εἰμι κομνικός seems to be too general an expression, to mean only the martyred dead. It is as easy an explication of the phrase, as any I have met with, and as pertinent to the grammar, to suppose the εἰμι κομνικός to mean some among the Corinthians, who had been taken off by the hand of death; and when he says εἰμι κομνικός, and says τῆς νεκρῶν, and many σφήκας, (ch. 11. 38.) because of their disorderly behaviour at the Lord’s table. These exeutes might terrify some into Christianity; as the miraculous earthquake did the jailer, Acts 16.
29, 30, &c. Persons baptized on such an occasion, might be properly said to be baptized for the dead, that is, on their account. And the εἰκόνιστα ἤγειραν (the baptized) and the εἰμι κομνικός (the dead) answer to one another. If indeed the Christian Corinthians could not mistake the apostle’s meaning, “Now,” says he, “what shall they do, and why were they baptized, if the dead rise not? You have a general persuasion that these men have done right, and acted wisely, and as they ought, on this occasion; but why, if the dead rise not, seeing they may perhaps hasten their death, by provoking a jealous God, why shall we then walk? But whether this be the meaning, or whatever else a, death, the apostle’s argument was good, and intelligible to the Corinthians. And his next is as plain to us.

IV. He argues from the absurdity of his own and other Christians’ conduct, upon this supposition:
1. It would be a foolish thing for them to run so much hazards; (v. 30.) “Why stand we in jeopardy every hour? Why do we expose ourselves to continual peril: we Christians, especially we apostles?”

“Every one knows that it was dangerous being Christian, and much more a preacher and apostle, at that time; “Now,” says the apostle, “what fools are we, to run these hazards, if we have no better hopes beyond death; if, when we die, we die wholly, and revive no more?” Note, Christianity were a foolish profession, if it proposed no hopes beyond this life, at least in such hazardous times as attended the first profession of it. It required men to risk all the blessings and comforts of this life, and to face and endure all the evils of it, without any future prospects. And is this a character of his religion, fit for a Christian to endure? And must he not fix this character on it, if he gives up his future hopes, and denies the resurrection of the dead? This argument the apostle brings home to himself; “I protest,” says he, “by your rejoicing in Christ Jesus, but Christ is made for me an occasion of provoking peculiar succours and supports of our holy faith, that I die daily,” v. 31. He was in continual danger of death, and carried his life, as we say, in his hand. And why should he thus expose himself, if he had no hopes after life? To live in daily view and expectation of death, and yet have no prospect beyond it, must be very heartless and uncomfortable; and his case, upon this account, a very melancholy one. He had no hope of a better state of existence beyond the dead, or he was guilty of extreme weakness, in hazarding all that was dear to him in this world, and his life into the bargain. He had encountered very great difficulties, and fierce enemies; he had fought with beasts at Ephesus, (v. 32.) and was in danger of being pulled to pieces by an enraged multitude, stirred up by Demetrius and the other craftsmen; (Acts 19. 38.) though some understand this literally of Paul’s being cast headlong out of the upper seat of the amphitheatre, at a Roman show in that city.
And Nicephorus tells a formal story to this purport, and of the miraculous complaisance of the lions to him when they came near him. But so remarkable a trial and circumstance of his life, methinks, would not have been passed over by Luke, and much less by himself, when he gives us so large and particular

V. The apostle closes his argument with a caution, exhortation, and reproof.

1. A caution against the dangerous conversation of bad men, men of loose lives and principles; Be not deceived, says he; evil communications corrupt goods, v. 33. Possibly, some of those who said that there was no resurrection of the dead,
I. CORINTHIANS, XV.

were men of loose lives, and endeavoured to counte nance their vicious practices by so corrupt a principle; and had that speech often in their mouths,

Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die. Now, the apostle grants that the talk was to the purpose,

if there were no future state. But having confuted their pretexts, he now tells the Corinthians how dangerous such men's conversation must prove.

He tells them that they would, probably, be corrupted by them, and fall in with their course of life, it they gave into their evil principles. Note, Bad company and conversation are likely to make bad men. Those who would keep their innocence, must keep good company. Error and vice are infections; and if we would avoid the contagion, we must keep clear of them who have taken it. He that walketh with wise men, shall be wise; but a companion of fools shall be destroyed, Prov. 13. 20.

2. Here is an exhortation to break off their sins, and rouse themselves, and lead a more holy and righteous life, v. 34. Awake to righteousness, or awake righteously, if ye will venture, and sin not, or sin no more. Rouse yourselves, break off your sin by righteousness, and sin not, or sin no more; if you would correct whatever is amiss, and do not, by stupidity, be led away into such conversation and principles as will sap your Christian hopes, and corrupt your practice. The disbelief of a future state destroys all virtue and piety. But the improvement to be made of the truth, is, to cease from sin, and set ourselves to the business of religion, and that in good earnest. If there will be a resurrection and a future life, we should live and act as those who believe it; and should not give into such senseless and sottish notions as will debauch our morals, and render us loose and sensual in our lives.

3. Here is a reproof, and a sharp one, to some at least, among them; Some of you have not the knowldedge of God; I speak this to your shame. Note,

It is a shame in Christians, not to have the knowledge of God. The Christian religion gives us the best information that can be had about God, his nature, and grace, and government. They who profess this religion, reproach themselves, by remaining without the knowledge of God: for it must be owing to their own sloth, and slight of God, that they are ignorant of him. And it is not a horrid shame for a Christian to slight God, and be so wretchedly ignorant in matters that so nearly and highly concern him? Note also, It is the ignorance of God, that leads men, into the disbelief of a resurrection and future life.

Those who know God, know that he will not abandon his faithful servants, leave them exposed to such hardships and sufferings, without any recompense or reward. They know he is not unfaithful or unkind, to forget their labour and patience, their faithful services and cheerful sufferings, or let their labour be in vain. But I am apt to think that the expression is more meant to mean, that there were atheistical people among them, who, hardly owned a God, or one who had any concern with, or took cognizance of, human affairs. These were indeed a scandal and shame to any Christian church. Note, Real atheism lies at the bottom of men's disbelief of a future state. They who own a God and a providence, and observe how unequal the distributions of their present life are, and how frequently the just men fare worst, can hardly doubt an after state, where every thing will be set to rights.

35. But some man will say, How are the dead raised up? And with what body do they come? 36.

Thou fool! that which thou sowest, is not quickened, except it die: 37. And that which thou sowest, thou sow-est not that body which shall be, but bare grain, it may chance of wheat, or of some other grain: 38. But God giveth it a body as it hath pleased him, and to every seed its own body. 39.

All flesh is not the same flesh: but there is one kind of flesh of men, another flesh of beasts, another of fishes, and another of birds. 40. There are also celestial bodies, and bodies terrestrial: but the glory of the celestial is one, and the glory of the terrestrial is another. 41. There is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars; for one star differeth from another star in glory. 42. So also is the resurrection of the dead. It is sown in corruption; it is raised in incorruption: 43. It is sown in dishonour; it is raised in glory: it is sown in weakness; it is raised in power: 44. It is sown a natural body; it is raised a spiritual body. There is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body. 45. And so it is written. The first man Adam was made a living soul, the last Adam was made a quickening spirit. 46. Howbeit, that was not first, which is spiritual, but that which is natural; and afterward that which is spiritu-

The apostle comes now to answer a plausible and principal objection against the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead; concerning which, observe the proposition of the objection; Some man will say, How are the dead raised up? And with what body do they come? v. 35. The objection is plainly two fold. Some are they raised up? That is, "By what means? How can they be raised? What power is equal to this effect? It was an opinion that prevailed much among the heathens, and the Sadduccees seem to have been in the same sentiment, that it was not within the compass of divine power, mortales renuntiantur danae, aut revocare defunctos—to make mortal men immortal, or revive and restore dead. Such sort of men seem to have been, who among the Corinthians denied the resurrection of the dead, and object here, " How are they raised?

How should they be raised? Is it not utterly impossible?" 2. The other part of the objection is about the quality of their bodies, who shall rise;

"With what body will they come? Will it be with the same body; with like shape, and form, and stature, and members, and qualities, or will be the former objection is that of those who opposed the doctrine, the latter the inquiry of curious docturers.

(1.) To the first, the apostle answers, by telling them this was to be brought about by divine power, that very power which they had all observed to do somewhat very like it, year after year, in the death and revival of the corn; and therefore it was an argument of great weakness and stupidity, to doubt whether the resurrection of the dead might not be effectual by the same power; Thou fool! that which thou sowest is not quickened, unless it die, v. 36. It may be asked, how is it not quickened and appeareth up. It not only sprouts after it is dead, but it must die, that it may live. And why should any be so foolish as to imagine, that the man once dead cannot be made to live again, by the same power which every year brings the dead grain to life? This is the substance of what he answers to the first question.

Note, It is a foolish thing to question the divine power to raise the dead, when he raiseth him every day, by the raising and reviving things that are dead.

But he is longer in answering to the second inquiry.

He begins, [1.] By observing, that there is a change made in the grain that is sown; It is not that body which shall be that sown, but bare grain of wheat or barley, &c.; but God gives it such a body as he will, and in such way as he will, only so as to distinguish at the end each other. That every seed sown of a proper body, is constituted of such materials, and figured in such a manner, as are proper for it, proper to that kind. This is plainly in the divine power, though we no more know how it is done, than we know how a dead man is raised to life again. It is certain, the grain undergoes a great change, and is intimately in this passage; and so will the dead, when they rise again, and live again, in their bodies, after death.

[2.] He proceeds hence to observe, that there is a great deal of variety among other bodies, as there is among plants: as, First, In bodies of flesh, All flesh is not the same; that of men is of one kind, that of beasts another, another that of fishes, and that of birds another, v. 39. There is a variety in all the kinds, and somewhat peculiar in every kind, to distinguish it from the other. Secondly, In bodies celestial and terrestrial, there is also a difference; and what is for the glory of one, is not for the other; for the true glory of every being consists in its fitness for its rank and state. Earthly bodies are not adapted to the heavenly regions, nor heavenly bodies fitted to the condition of earthly beings. Nay, Thirdly, There is a variety of glory among heavenly bodies themselves; There is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars; for one star differeth from another star, in glory, v. 41. All this is to intimate to us, that the bodies of the dead, when they rise, will be so far changed, that they will be fitted for the heavenly regions; and that there will be a variety of glories among the bodies of the dead, when they shall be raised, as there is among the sun, and moon, and stars, nay, among the stars themselves. All this carries the doctrine as our Lord and Saviour proposeth it, as easy to divine power to raise the dead, and recover their moulder bodies, as out of the same materials, form so many kinds of flesh and plants, and, for aught we know, celestial bodies as well as terrestrial ones. The sun and stars may, for aught we know, be composed of the same materials as the earth we tread on, though so much refined and changed by the divine skill and power. And can he, out of the same materials, form such various beings, and yet not be able to raise the dead? Having thus prepared the way, he comes.

[3.] To speak directly to the point; So also, says he, is the resurrection of the dead; so as, the plant growing out of the putrefied grain, so as no longer to be a terrestrial but a celestial body, and varying in glory from the other dead, who are raised, as one star does from another. But he specifies some particulars; as, First, It is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption. It is sown. Burying the dead is like sowing them, it is like committing the seed to the earth, that it may spring out of it again. And our bodies, which are sown, are corruptible, liable to putrefy and moulder, and crumble to dust; but when we rise, they will be out of the power of death. The grave is putrefaction, liable to corruption. Secondly, It is sown in dishonour, it is raised in glory. Our's is at present a vile body, Philip. 3. 21. Nothing is more loathsome than a dead body; it is thrown into the grave as a despoiled and broken vessel, in which there is no pleasure. But at the resurrection a glory will be put upon it; it will be made like the glorious body of our Saviour; it will be purged from all the dregs of earth, and refined into another, and another, as a grain is from its husk, with a splendour resembling his. Thirdly, It is sown a natural body, it is raised in power. It is laid in the earth, a poor helpless thing, wholly in the power of death, deprived of all vital capacities and powers, of life and strength; it is utterly unable to move or stir. But when we rise, our bodies will have heavenly life and vigour infused into them; they shall be hale, and firm, and durable, and lively, and liable no more to any mortality, we shall be immortal beings. It is sown a natural, or animal body, it is raised a body fitted to the low condition, and sensitive pleasures and enjoyments, of this life, which are all gross in comparison of the heavenly state and enjoyments. But when we rise, it will be quite otherwise; our body will rise spiritual. Not that body will be changed into spirit: this would be a contradiction in our common conceptions; it would be as much as to say, Body changed into what is not body, matter made immaterial. The expression is to be understood comparatively. We shall at the resurrection have bodies purified and refined to the last degree, made light and agile; and though they are not changed into spirit, yet made fit to be perpetual associates of spirits made perfect. And why should it not be as much in the power of God to raise incorruptible, glorious, lively, spiritual bodies, out of the ruins of those vile, corruptible, lifeless animal ones, as first to make matter out of nothing, and then, out of the same mass of matter, produce such variety of beings, both in earth and heaven? To God all things are possible; and this cannot be impossible.

[4.] He illustrates this by a comparison of the first and second Adam; There is an natural body, says he, and his was a spiritual body; and then goes into the comparison, in several instances. First, As we have our natural body, the animal body we have in this world, from the first Adam, we expect our spiritual body from the second. This is implied in the whole comparison. Secondly, This is but consonant to the different characters these two persons bear; The first Adam was made a living soul, such a being as our Lord and Saviour propagating such beings as himself, and consecrating them to the form of a spiritual nature and animal body like his own, but none other, nor better. The second Adam is a quickening Spirit; he is the Resurrection and the Life, John 11. 25. He hath life in himself, and quickeneth whom he will, John 3. 20, 21. The first man was of the earth, made out of the earth, and was earthly; his body was fitted to the region of his abode; but the second Adam, the Lord from heaven, his body came down from heaven, and giveth life to the world; (John 6. 33.) He who came down from heaven, and was in heaven at the same time; (John 3. 13.) the Lord of heaven and earth. If the first Adam could communicate to us natural and animal bodies, cannot the second Adam make our bodies spiritual ones? If the deputed lord of this lower creation could do the one, cannot the Lord from heaven, the Lord o heaven and earth, do the other? Thirdly, We must first have natural bodies from the first Adam, before we can have spiritual bodies from the second; (v. 49.) we must bear the image of the earthy, before we can bear the image of the heavenly. Such is the established order of Providence. We must have weak, frail, mortal bodies by descent from the first Adam, before we can have lively, spiritual, and immortal ones by the quickening power of the second. We must die, before we can live to die no more. Fourthly. Yet if we are Christ's, true believers in him, (for this whole discourse relates to the resurrection of the saints,) it is as certain that we shall have spiritual bodies as it is now that we have natural or animal ones. By these we are as the first Adam, earthy, we bear his image; by those we shall be as the second Adam, have bodies like his own, heavenly, and so bear his image. And we are as certainly intended to bear the one, as we have borne the other. As sure therefore as we have had natural bodies, we shall have spiritual ones. The dead in Christ shall not only rise, but shall rise thus gloriously changed.

[5.] He sums up this argument, by assigning the reason of this change; (v. 50.) Now this I say, that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God; nor doth corruption inherit incorruption. The natural body is flesh and blood, consisting of bones, muscles, nerves, veins, arteries, and their several fluids; and as such, it is of a corruptible frame and form, liable to dissolution, to rot and moulder. But no such thing shall inherit the heavenly regions; for this were for corruption to inherit incorruption, which is little better than a contradiction in terms. The heavenly inheritance is incorruptible, and never fadeth away; 1 Pet. 1. 4. How can this be possessed by flesh and blood, which is corruptible and will fade away? It must be changed into ever-during substance, before it can be capable of possessing the heavenly inheritance. The sum is, that the bodies of the saints, when they shall rise again, will be greatly changed from what they are now, and much for the better. They are now corruptible, flesh and blood, they will be then incorruptible, glorious, and spiritual bodies, fitted to the celestial world, where they are ever afterward to dwell, and have their eternal inheritance.

51. Behold, I shew you a mystery; We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, 52. In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump; (for the trumpet shall sound;) and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed. 53. For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality. 54. So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory. 55. O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory? 56. The sting of death is sin; and the strength of sin is the law. 57. But thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ.

To confirm what he had said of this change, he here,

1. Tells them what had been concealed from, or unknown to them, till then—that all the saints should not die, but all would be changed. That they are alive at our Lord's coming, will be caught up into the clouds, without dying, 1 Thess. 4. 11. But it is plain from this passage, that it will not be without changing from corruption to incorruption. The frame of their living bodies shall be thus altered, as well as those that are dead; and this in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, v. 52. What cannot Almighty Power effect? That Power that calls the dead into life, can surely thus soon and suddenly change the living; for changed they must be as well as the dead; because flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God. This is the mystery which the apostle shews the Corinthians; Behold, I shew you a mystery; or bring into open light a truth dark and unknown before. Note, There are many mysteries shewn to us in the gospel; many truths, that before were utterly unknown, are there made known; many truths, that were hid and obscure before, are there brought into open day, and plainly revealed; and many things are in part revealed, that will never be fully known, nor perhaps clearly understood. The apostle here makes known a truth unknown before, which is, that the saints, living at our Lord's second coming, will not die, but be changed; that this change will be made in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, and at the sound of the trumpet. Thus is the fasion of the earth, as it shall come down, and the heavenly, as it shall come up, (1 Thess. 4. 16.) here, the trumpet must sound. It is the loud summons of all the living and all the dead, to come and appear at the tribunal of Christ. At this summons the graves shall open, the dead saints shall rise in an incorruptible state, v. 52.

II. He assigns the reason of this change; (v. 53.) For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality. How otherwise could the man be a fit inhabitant of the incorruptible regions, or be fitted to possess the eternal inheritance? How can that which is corruptible and mortal, enjoy what is incorruptible, permanent, and immortal? This corruptible body must be made incorruptible, this mortal body must be changed into immortal, that the man may be capable of enjoying the happy state of heaven. For him, who was an incorruptible that must put on incorruption; the demolished fabric that must be reared again. What is sown must be quickened. Saints will come in their own bodies, (v. 38.) not in other bodies.

III. He lets us know what will follow upon this: The living and dead in Christ; Then shall be brought to pass that saying, Death is swallowed up in victory; or, He shall be exalted in victory, Isa. 25. 8. For mortality shall be then swallowed up in life, (2 Cor. 5. 4.) and death perfectly subdued and conquered, and saints for ever delivered from its power. Such a conquest shall be obtained over it, that it shall for ever disappear in those regions to which our Lord will bear his risen saints, and therefore will the saints hereupon sing their invicta, their song of triumph. Then, when the more they shall have put on immortality, when they shall be swallowed up, for ever swallowed up, in victory, Christ hinders it from swallowing his saints when they die; but when they are risen again, death shall, as to them, be swallowed for ever. And upon this destruction of death will they break out into a song of triumph.

1. They will glorify over death as a vanquished enemy, and extol this great and terrible destroyer: "O death, where is thy sting? Where is now thy power to hurt? What mischief hast thou done us? We are dead; but behold, we live again, and shall die no more. Thou art vanquished and disarmed, and we are out of the reach of thy deadly dart. Where now is thy fatal artillery, thy stores of death? We fear no further mischiefs from thee, nor heed thy weapons, but defy thy power, and despise thy wrath. And, O grave, where is thy victory? Where is now thy victory? What is become of it? Where are the spoils and trophies of it? Once we were thy prisoners, but the prison-doors are burst open, the locks and bolts have been forced to give way, and our shackles are knocked off; and we are for ever released; captivity is taken captive: the imaginary victor is conquered, and forced to resign his conquest, and release his captives: thy triumphs, grave, are at an end: the bonds of death are loosed, and we are at liberty, and are never more to be hurt by death, or imprisoned in the grave. In a moment, the power of death, and the conquests and spoils of the grave, are gone; and, as to the saints, the very signs of them will not remain. Where are they? Thus will they raise themselves, when they become immortal, to the honour of their Saviour, and the praise of divine grace: they shall glory over vanquished death.

2. The foundation for this triumph is here intimated, (1.) In the account given whence death had its power to hurt; The sting of death is sin, which gives vent to itself, which puts into the power of death to hurt and kill. Sin unbounded, and nothing else, can keep any under his power. And the strength of sin is the law; it is the divine threatening against the transgressors of the law, the curse there denounced, that gives power to sin. Note, Sin is the parent of death, and gives it all its hurtful power. By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin, Rom. 5. 12. It is its cursed progeny and offspring. (2.) In the account given of the victory saints obtain over it through Jesus Christ, v. 57. The sting of death is sin; but Christ, by dying, has taken out this sting; he has made atonement for sin, he has obtained remission of it. It may miss therefore, but it cannot hurt. The strength of sin is the law; but the curse of the law is removed by our Redeemer's becoming a Curse for us. So that sin is deprived of its strength and sting, through Christ, that is, by his incarnation, suffering, and death. Death may seize a believer, but cannot sting him, cannot hold him in his power. There is a day coming, when the grave shall open, the bands of death be loosed, the dead saints revive, and become incorruptible and immortal, and put out of the reach of death for ever. And then will it plainly appear, that, as to them, death will have lost its strength and sting. It is the end of the power of death and the death of Christ by his dying in their room. By dying, he conquered death, and spoiled the grave; and, through faith in him, believers become sharers in his conquests. They often rejoice before-hand, in the hope of his victory; and when they rise glorious from the grave, will boldly triumph over death. Note, It is altogether owing to the grace of God in Christ, that sin is pardoned, and death disarmed. The law puts arms into the hand of the devil, to destroy the children of God; but grace takes away this power from the law, and deprives death of its strength and sting. It is by the grace of God, through the redemption which is in Christ Jesus, that we are freely justified, Rom. 3. 24. It is no wonder, therefore, (3.) If this triumph of the saints over death should issue in thanksgiving to God; Thanks be to God, which giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ. Are they not then rejoice in the Lord, and be glad in the God of their salvation? Shall not their souls magnify the Lord? When he shews such wonders to the dead, shall they not arise and praise him? Ps. 88. 10. Those who remain under the power of death, can have no heart to praise; but such conquests and triumphs will certainly tune the tongues of the saints to thankfulness and praise; praise for the victory, and it is greatly and gloriously in itself, and for the means whereby it is obtained—it is given of God through Christ Jesus; a victory obtained not by our power, but the power of God; not given because we are worthy, but because Christ is so, and has by dying obtained this conquest for us. Must not this circumstance endear the victory to us, and heighten our praise to God? Note, How many springs of joy to the saints, and thanksgiving to God, are opened by the death and resurrection, the sufferings and conquests, of our Redeemer! With what acclamations will saints rising from the dead applaud him! How will the heaven of heavens resound his praises for ever! Thanks be to God, will be the burchten of their song; and angels will join the chorus, and declare their consent with a loud Amen, Hallelujah.

58. Therefore, my beloved brethren, be ye steadfast, unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labour is not in vain in the Lord.

In this verse we have the improvement of the whole argument, in an exhortation, enforced by a motive resulting plainly from it.

1. An exhortation, and this threefold. 1. That they should be steadfast—steadfast, firm, fixed in the faith of the gospel, that gospel which he had preached, and they had received, That Christ died for our sins, and rose again the third day, according to the scriptures, (v. 3, 4.) and fixed in the faith of the glorious resurrection of the sanctified dead, which, as he had shewn, had so near and necessary a connexion with the former. "Do not let your belief of these truths be shaken or staggered. They are most certain, and of the last importance." Note, Christians should be steadfast believers of this great article of the resurrection of the dead. It is evidently founded on the death of Christ. Because he lives, his servants shall live also, John 14. 19. And it is of the last importance; a disbelief of a future life will operate a way to all manner of licentiousness, and corrupt men's morals to the last degree. It will be easy and natural from hence to infer, that we may live like beasts, and eat and drink, for to-morrow we die. 2. He exhorts them to be unmoveable, in their hope and expectation of this great privilege, of being raised incorruptible and immortal. Christians should be unmoved away from this hope of the future, (Col. 1. 23.) most especially where they are called on to differ from the world, and to suffer for their Lord and Master. They should not renounce or resign their comfortable expectations. They are not vain, but solid hopes, built upon sure foundations, the purchase and power of their risen Saviour, and the promise of God, to whom it is impossible to lie; hopes that shall be their most powerful supports under all the pressures of life, the most effectual antidotes against the fears of death, the most inspiring motives to diligence and perseverance in Christian duty. Should they part with these hopes? Should they suffer them to be shaken? Note, Christians should live in the most firm expectation of a blessed resurrection. This hope should be an anchor to their souls, firm and sure, Heb. 6. 19. 3. He exhorts them to abound in the work of the Lord, and that always, in the Lord's service, in obeying the Lord's commands. They should be diligent and persevering herein,

and going ever on toward perfection; they should be continually making advances in true piety, and ready and apt for every good work. The most cheerful duty, the greatest diligence, the most constant perseverance, become those who have such glorious hopes. Can we too much abound in zeal and diligence in the Lord's work, when we are secured of such abundant recompenses in a future life? What vigour and resolution, what constancy and patience, should those hopes inspire! Note, Christians should not stint themselves as to their growth in holiness, but be always improving in sound religion, and abounding in the work of the Lord.

II. The method of proceeding, under the former discharge, was, that their labour shall not be in vain in the Lord; nay, they know it shall not. They have the best grounds in the world to build upon; they have all the assurance that can rationally be expected: as sure as Christ is risen, they shall rise; and Christ is as surely risen as the Scriptures are true, and the word of God. The apostles saw him after his death, testified this truth to the world in the face of a thousand deaths and dangers, and confirmed it by miraculous powers received from him. Is there any room to doubt a fact so well attested? Note, True Christians have undoubted evidence that their labour will not be vain in the Lord; not their most diligent services, nor their most painful sufferings; they will not be in vain, not be vain and unprofitable. Note, The labour of Christians will not be lost labour; they may lose for God, but they shall lose nothing by him; nay, there is more implied than is expressed in this phrase. It means, that they shall be abundantly rewarded. He will never be found unjust to forget their labour of love, Heb. 6. 10. Nay, he will do exceeding abundantly above what they can now ask or think. Neither the services they do for him, nor the sufferings they endure for him here, are worthy to be compared with the joy hereafter to be revealed in them, Rom. 8. 18. Note, They who serve God, and tell how good wages they cannot do too much, nor suffer too much, for so good a Master. If they serve him now, they shall see him hereafter; if they suffer for him on earth, they shall reign with him in heaven; if they die for his sake, they shall rise again from the dead, be crowned with glory, honour, and immortality, and inherit eternal life.

CHAP. XVI.

In this chapter, the apostle, I. Gives directions about some charitable collection to be made in this church, for the afflicted and impoverished churches in Judea, v. 1. 4. II. He talks of making them a visit, v. 5. 9. III. He com- mends Timothy to them, and tells them of the seasons to come to them, v. 10. 13. IV. He presses them to watchfulness, constancy, charity, and to pay a due regard to all who helped him and his fellow-labourers in their work, v. 14. 18. V. He observes, that he, as he did in his own, closed the epistle with a solemn admonition to them, and his good wishes for them, v. 20, to the end.

1. NOW concerning the collection for the saints, as I have given order to the churches of Galatia, even so do ye. 2. Upon the first day of the week, let every one of you lay him in store, as God hath prospered him, that there be no gatherings when I come. 3. And when I come, whosoever you shall approve by your letters, them will I send to bring your liberality unto Jerusalem. 4. And if it be meet that I go also, they shall go with me.

In this chapter, Paul closes this long epistle with some particular matters of less moment; but as all was written by divine inspiration, it is all profitable for our instruction. He begins with directing them about a charitable collection on a particular occasion, the distresses and poverty of Christians in Judea, who were in his time extraordinary part- ly through the general calamities of that nation, and partly through the particular sufferings to which they were exposed. Now concerning this, observe, I. How he introduces his direction. It was not a peculiar service which he required of them; he had given the like orders to the churches of Galatia, v. 1. He desired them only to conform themselves to the same rules which he had given to other churches under the like occasion. He did not say they should be eased, and they burredthen, 2 Cor. 8. 13. He also prudently mentions these orders of his to the churches of Galatia, to excite emulation, and stir them up to be liberal, according to their circumstances, and the occasion. They who exceeded most churches in spiritual gifts, and, as it is probable, in worldly wealth, (see the argument,) surely would not suffer themselves to come behind any in their bounty to their afflicted brethren. Note, The good examples of other Christians and churches should stir us in a holy emulation. It is becoming a Christian, not to bear to be outdone by a fellow-Christian in any thing virtuous and praise-worthy, provided this consideration only makes him exert himself, not envy others: and the more advantages we have above others, the more should we endeavour to exceed them in the performance of the duties of religion. We are not to be outdone in this service of love by the churches of Galatia, who do not appear to have been enriched with equal spiritual gifts, or outward ability.

II. The direction itself. Concerning which, observe, 1. The manner in which the collection was to be made; Every one was to lay by in store, (v. 2.) have a treasury, or fund, with himself, for this purpose. The meaning is, that he should lay by as he could spare from time to time, and by that means make up a sum for this charitable purpose. Note, It is a good thing to lay up in store for good uses. They who are rich in this world, should be rich in good works, 2 Tim. 6. 17, 18. The best way to be so, is, to appropriate of their income, and have a treasury for this purpose; a stock for the poor, as well as for themselves; by this means they will be ready to every good occasion. The exhortation to this matter is given, Judea, and to every one who labour with their own hands for a livelihood, should so work, that they may have to give to him that needeth, Eph. 4. 28. Indeed their treasury for good works can never be very large; (though, according to circumstances, it may considerably vary;) but the best way in the world for them to get a treasury for this purpose, is, to lay by from time to time, as they can afford. Some of the Old testatiers rightly observe here, that this advice was given for the sakes of the poorer among them. They were to lay by from week to week, and not bring in to the common treasury, that by this means their contributions might be easy to themselves, and yet grow into a fund for the relief of their brethren. "Every little," as the proverb says, "would make a mickle." Indeed all our charity and benevolence should be such, that, what seems made as easy to ourselves as may be. And what more likely way to make us easy in this matter, than thus to lay by? We may cheerfully give when we know that we can spare, and that we have been laying by in store, that we may.

2. Here is the measure in which they are to lay by, as God hath prospered them; 2 Cor. 9. 10. As he has been prospered by Divine Providence; as God has been pleased to bless and succeed his labours and business. Note, All our business and labour are that to us, which God is pleased to make them.
It is not the diligent hand that will make rich by itself, without the divine blessing, Prov. 10. 4, 22. Our prosperity and success are from God, and not from ourselves; and he is to be owned in all, and honoured with all. It is his bounty and blessing to which we owe all we have; and whatever we have, is to be used, and employed, and improved, for him. His right to ourselves and all that is our's, is to be owned and yielded to him. And what argument more proper to excite us to charity to the people and children of God, than to consider all we receive as his gift, as coming from him? Note, When God blesses and prospers us, we should be ready to relieve and comfort his needy servants; when his bounty flows forth upon us, we should not confine it to ourselves, but let it stream out to others. The good we receive from him, should stir us up to do good to others, to resemble him in our beneficence; and therefore the more good we receive, the more should we give. It is our duty to give; that we should give more than others who are less able; that we should give more than ourselves when we were less able. And on the other hand, from him to whom God gives less, he expects less. He is no tyrant or cruel taskmaster, to exact brick without straw, or expect men shall do more good than he gives them ability to. Note, Where there is a willing mind, he accepts according to what a man hath, 2 Cor. 8. 12; but as he prospers and blesses us, and puts us in a capacity to do good, he expects we should. The greater ability he gives, the more enlarged should our hearts be, and the more open our hands; but where the ability is less, the hands cannot be as open, however willing the mind be, and large the heart; nor does God expect it.

6. In the time when this is to be done; the first day of the week, 1 Cor. 16. 1, the Lord's day, the Christian holiday; when public assemblies were held, and public worship was celebrated, and the Christian institutions and mysteries, (as the ancients called them,) were attended upon; then let every one lay by him. It is a day of holy rest; and the more vacation the mind has from worldly cares and toils, the more disposition has it to show what we receive from him. Other duties of the day do more good to others. They were to lay by as God had blessed them; in that proportion. The more they had, through God's blessing, gained by their business or labour, their traffic or work, the more they were to lay by. Note, God expects that our beneficence to others should hold some proportion to his bounty to us. All we have is from God; the more he gives, (circumstances being considered,) the more he expects, and requires, to our use. If he should give more than others, who are less able; that we should give more than ourselves when we were less able. And on the other hand, from him to whom God gives less, he expects less. He is no tyrant or cruel taskmaster, to exact brick without straw, or expect men shall do more good than he gives them ability to. Note, Where there is a willing mind, he accepts according to what a man hath, 2 Cor. 8. 12; but as he prospers and blesses us, and puts us in a capacity to do good, he expects we should. The greater ability he gives, the more enlarged should our hearts be, and the more open our hands; but where the ability is less, the hands cannot be as open, however willing the mind be, and large the heart; nor does God expect it.

9. Now I will come unto you, when shall pass through Macedonia: (for I co pass through Macedonia.) 6. And it may be that I will abide, yea, and winter with you, that ye may bring me on my journey, whithersoever I go. 7. For I will not see you now by the way: but I trust to tarry a while with you, if the Lord permit. 8. But I will tarry at Ephesus until Pentecost. 9. For a great door and effectual is opened unto me, and there are many adversaries.

In this passage the apostle notifies and explains his purpose of coming to visit them; concerning which, observe,

1. His purpose; he intended to pass out of Asia, where he now was, (v. 8—19,) and to go through Macedonia into Achaia, where Corinth was, and to stay some time with them, and perhaps the winter, v. 5, 6. He had long laboured in this church, and done much good among them, and had his heart set upon doing much more, (if God saw fit,) and therefore he had it in his thoughts to see them, and stay with them. Note, The heart of a truly Christian minister must be much toward the people among whom he has laboured long, and with remarkable success. No wonder that Paul was willing to see Corinth, and stay with them as long as the other duties of his office would permit. Though some among this people despised him, and made a faction against him, doubtless there were many who loved him tenderly, and very likely had paid him all the respect due to an apostle and their spiritual father. And is it any wonder that he should be willing to visit them, and stay with them? And as to the rest, who now shewed disrespect, he might hope to reduce them to a better temper, and thereby rectify what was out of order in the church, by staying among them for some time. It is plain that he hoped for some good effect, because he says, he intended to stay, "that they might bring home a full account of his journey, whitherover he went;" (v. 6,) not barely bring him, going, as we say, accompanying him a little way on the road, but expedites and furnish him for his journey, help and encourage him to it, and provide him for it. He is to be understood of being brought forward in his journey after a godly sort, as (it is expressed, 3 John v. 6,) so that nothing might be wanting to him, as himself speaks, Tit. 3. 13. His stay and that of them, he hoped, would cure the factious humour, and reconcile him to himself and their duty. Note, It was a just reason for an apostle to make his abode in a place, that he had a prospect of doing good.

II. His excuse for not seeing them now—because it would be only by the way, (v. 7,) in transitu—en passant—it would only be a transient visit. He would not see them, because he could not stay with them. Such a visitation and them, he thought, nor them any satisfaction or advantage; it would rather raise the appetite than regale it, rather heighten their desires of being together than satisfy them. He loved them so, that he longed for an opportunity to stay with them, take up his abode among them for some length of time. This would be more pleasing to himself, and more serviceable to them, than a cursory visit in his way; and therefore he would not see them now, but another time, when he could have longer length of time.

III. We have the limitation of this purpose; I trust to tarry a while with you, if the Lord permit, v. 7. Though the apostles wrote under inspiration, they did not know thereby how God would dispose of themselves. Paul had a purpose of coming to Corinth, and staying there, and hoped to do good thereby. This was not a purpose proceeding from any extraordinary move or impulse of the Spirit of God; it was not the effect of inspiration; for had it been such, he could not have spoken of it in this manner. A purpose formed thus in him, must have been the purpose of God, signified to him by his Spirit; and could he say that he would come to Corinth upon this view only, if God permit, that is, that he would execute God's own purpose concerning himself, with God's permission? It is to be expected and hoped that of a common purpose, forming and determined by his own spirit. And concerning these purposes, it is fit we should say, "We will execute them, if the Lord permit." Note, All our purposes must be made with submission to the Divine Providence. We should say, If the Lord will, we shall live, and do this and that, James 4. 15. It is not in us to effect our own designs, without the divine leave. It is by God's power and permission, and under his direction and conduct, we must do everything. Heathens have concurred in acknowledging this concern of Providence in all our actions and concerns; surely we should readily own it, and frequently and seriously attend to it.

IV. We have his purpose expressed, of staying at Ephesus for the present. He says, he would stay there till Pentecost, v. 8. It is very probable that he was, at the time of writing this epistle, in Ephesus, from this passage, compared with v. 19, where he says, The churches of Asia salute you. A proper salutation from Ephesus, but hardly so proper had he been at Philippi, as the subscription to this epistle in our common copies has it. "The churches of Macedonia salute you," had been much more properly inserted in the close of a letter from Philippi, than the other. But, We have the reason given for his staying at Ephesus for the present; Because a great door, and an effectual, was opened to him, and there were many adversaries, v. 9. A great door, and effectual, was opened to him; many were prepared to receive the gospel at Ephesus, and God gave him great success among them; he had brought over many to Christ, and had great hope of bringing over many more. For this reason, he determined to stay a while at Ephesus. Note, Success, and a fair prospect of more, was a just reason to determine an apostle to stay and labour in a particular place. And there are many adversaries, because a great door, and an effectual, was opened. Note, Great success in the work of the gospel commonly creates many enemies. The Devil opposes those most, and makes them most trouble, who most heartily and successfully set themselves to destroy his kingdom. There were many adversaries; and therefore the apostle determined to stay. Some think he alludes in this passage to the custom of the Roman Circus, and the doors of it, at which the charioteers were to enter, as their antagonists did at the opposite doors. True course is whett d by opposition; and it is no wonder that the Christian courage of the apostle should be animated by the zeal of his adversaries. They were bent to ruin him, and prevent the effect of his ministry at Ephesus and should he at this time desert his station, and dis grace his character and doctrine? No, the opposition of adversaries only animated his zeal. He was greater worked by his adversaries; but the more they raged and opposed, the more he excited himself. Should such a man as he flee? Note, Adversaries and oppositions do not break the spirits of faithful and well-beloved ministers, nor deter them from their zeal, and inspire them with fresh courage. Indeed, to labour in vain is heartless and discouraging. This damps the spirits, and breaks the heart. But success will give life and vigour to a minister, though enemies rage, and blaspheme, and persecute. It is not the opposition of enemies, but the hardness and obstinacy of his hearers, and the backslidings and revolt of professors, that damp a faithful minister, and break his heart.

10. Now if Timotheus come, see that he may be with you without fear: for he worketh the work of the Lord, as I also do. 11. Let no man therefore despise him: but conduct him forth in peace, that he may come unto me; for I look for him with the brethren. 12. As touching our brother Apollus, I greatly desired him to come unto you, with the brethren: but his will was not at all to come at this time; but he will come when he shall have convenient time.

In this passage, I. He recommends Timothy to them, in several particulars. As, 1. He bids them take care that he should be among them without fear, v. 10. Timothy was sent by the apostle to correct the abuses crept in among them; and not only to direct, but to blame, and censure, and reprove, those who were culpable. They were all in factions, and no doubt the mutual strife and hatred ran very high among them. The apostle recommends some very serious reprobations; and many very proud, upon account both of their outward wealth and spiritual gifts. Proud spirits cannot easily bear reproof. It was reasonable therefore to think young Timothy might be roughly used; hence the apostle warns them against using him ill. Not but that he was prepared for the worst; but, whatever his firmness and prudence might be, it was their duty to believe themselves responsible to him; and not discourage and dishearten him in his Lord's work. They should not fly out into resentment at his reproof. Note, Christians should bear faithful reproof from their ministers, and not terrify and discourage them from doing their duty. 2. He warns them against despising him, v.
11. He was but a young man, and, alone, as ευμνιους observes. He had no one to back him, and his own youthful face and years commanded but little reverence; and therefore the great pretenders to wisdom among them might be apt to entertain contentious thoughts of him. "Now," says the apostle, "guard against this." Not that he distrusted Timothy; he knew that himself would do nothing to bring contempt on his character; but he would do nothing to make his youth despisable. And perhaps such a singling out of the Corinthians by which a caution was but too necessary. Note, Christians should be very careful not to pour contempt on any, but especially on ministers, the faithful ministers of Christ. These, whether young or old, are to be had in high esteem for their work's sake. 3. He tells them they should give him all due encouragement, use him well while he was with them; and, as an evidence and respect thereof, should send him back, and well prepared for his journey back again to Paul. This, as I have above observed, is the meaning of bringing him on his journey in peace, v. 11. Note, Faithful ministers are not only to be well received by a people among whom they may for a season minister, but are to be sent away with due respect.

II. He assigns the reasons why they should behave thus toward Timothy. 1. Because he was employed and sent as the same man as Paul, in the same authority, v. 10. He did not come on Paul's errand among them, nor to do his work, but the work of the Lord. Though he was not an apostle, he was assistant to one, and was sent upon this very business by a divine commission. And therefore to vex his spirit, would be to grieve the Holy Spirit; to despise him, would be to despise him that sent him, not Paul, but Paul's Lord and their's. Note, They who work in the work of the Lord, shall be esteemed of the Lord. Nor either terrified nor despised, but treated with all tenderness and respect. Such are all the faithful ministers of the word, though not all in the same rank and degree. Pastors and teachers, as well as apostles and evangelists, while they are doing their duty, are to be treated with honour and respect. 2. Another reason is implied; as they were to esteem him for his work's sake, so also for Paul's sake, who had sent him to them in such a case. Nor either terrified nor despised, but treated with all tenderness and respect. Conduct him forth in peace, that he may come to me, for I look for him with the brethren: (v. 11.) or, I with the brethren look for him, (the original will bear either,) ἐκκαθαρίζω σε ἀνεμετράτως ἕως ἔως ἡμᾶς; "I am expecting his return, and his report concerning you; and shall judge by your conduct toward him, what your regard and respect should be. Look to cherish him, and therefore do not use him ill, but respect him, regard his message, and let him return in peace."

III. He informs them of Apollos's purpose to see them. 1. He himself had greatly desired him to come to them, v. 12. Though one party among them had declared for Apollos against Paul, (if that passage be to be understood literally. vide ch. 4. 6.) yet Paul did not blame Apollos; for going to Corinth in his own absence, many might have pressed him to go thither. He had no suspicions of Apollos, as if he would lessen Paul's interest and respect among them, to the advancement of his own. Note, Faithful ministers are not apt to entertain jealousies of each other, or suspect of such self-designs. True charity and brotherly love think no evil. And where should these reign, if not in the breasts of the ministers of Christ? 2. Apollos could not be prevailed on for the present to come, but would at a more convenient season. Perhaps their feuds and factions might render the present season improper. He would not go to be set at the head of a party, and contemnance the dividing and contentious humour. When this was subsided, by Paul's epistle to them, and Timothy's assurances to them, he might think it a season where it would be most proper. Apollos did not vie with each other, but consulted each other's comfort and usefulness. Paul signifies his great regard to the church of Corinth, when they had used him ill, by entreating Apollos to go to them; and Apollos shows his respect to Paul, and his concern to keep up his character and authority, by declining the journey till the Corinthians were in better temper. Note, It is not becoming the ministers of the gospel, to have and manifest a concern for each other's reputation and usefulness.

13. Watch ye, stand fast in the faith, quit you like men, be strong. 14. Let all your things be done with charity. 15. I beseech you, brethren, (ye know the house of Stephanas, that it is the first fruits of Achaia, and that they have addicted themselves to the ministry of the saints,) 16. That ye submit yourselves unto such, and to every one that helpeth with us, and laboureth. 17. I am glad of the coming of Stephanas and Fortunatus and Achaicus; for that which was lacking on your part they have supplied. 18. For they have refreshed my spirit and your's: therefore acknowledge ye them that are such.

In this passage, 1. The apostle gives some general advices; as, 1. That they should watch, (v. 12.) be watchful and upon their guard. A Christian is always under danger, and therefore should ever be on the watch; but the danger is greater at some times, and under some circumstances. The Corinthians were in manifest danger upon many accounts: their feuds ran high, the irregularities among them were very great, there were deceivers got among them, who endeavoured to corrupt their faith in the most important articles, those, without which the practice of virtue and piety could never be consistent. And surely in such danger, and in such circumstances it was their concern to watch. Note, If a Christian would be secure, he must be on his guard; and the more his danger, the greater vigilance is needful for his security. 2. He advises them to stand fast in the faith, to keep their ground, adhere to the revelation of God, and not give it up for the wisdom of the world, nor suffer it to be corrupted by it, stand for the faith of the gospel, and maintain it even to death; and stand in it, so as to abide in the profession of it, and feel and yield to its influence. Note, A Christian should be fixed in the faith of the gospel, and never desert or renounce it. It is by this faith alone that he will be able to keep his ground in an hour of temptation; it is by faith that we stand; (2 Cor. 1. 24.) It is by this that we must overcome the world, (1 John 3. 4.) both when it fawns and when it browns, when it tempts and when it terrifies. We must stand therefore in the faith of the gospel, if we would maintain our integrity. 3. He advises them to act like men, and be strong; "Act the manly, firm, and resolute part; behave strenuously, in opposition to the bad men who would divide and corrupt you; those who would split you into factions, or seduce you from the faith: be not terrified or inveigled by them; but shew yourselves men in Christ, by your steadiness, by your sound judgment, and firm resolution." Note, Christians should be manly and firm in all their contests with their enemies, defending their faith, and maintaining their integrity. They should, in an especial manner, be so in those points of faith that lie at the foundation of sound and practical religion, such as were attacked among the Corinthians: these must be maintained with solid judgment, and strong resolution.

4. He advises them to do every thing in charity, v. 14. Our zeal and constancy must be consistent with charity. Though it be lawful, and may be serviceable to our faith and religion, he puts in a caution against playing the devil for it. We may defend our faith, but we must, at the same time, maintain our innocence, and not devour and destroy, and think with ourselves that the wrath of man will work the righteousness of God, James 1. 21. Note, Christians should be careful that charity not only reign in their hearts, but shine out in their lives, may, in their most manly defences of the gospel.

II. He gives some particular directions how they should behave toward some that had been eminently serviceable to the cause of Christ among them.

1. He gives us their character. (1.) The household of Stephanas is mentioned by him, and their character is, that they were the first-fruits of Achaia, the first converts to Christianity in that region of Greece in which Corinth was. Note, It is an honourable character to any man to be early a Christian, betimes in Christ. But they had moreover addicted themselves to the ministry of the saints, to serve the saints. They have disposed and devoted themselves, ἐπέστρεψαν ἑαυτοὺς, to serve the saints, to do service to the saints. It is not meant of the ministry of the word properly, but of serving them in other respects, supplying their wants, helping and assisting them upon all occasions, both by word and deed, and spiritual offices. The family of Stephanas seems to have been a family of rank and importance in those parts, and yet they willingly offered themselves to this service. Note, It is an honour to persons of the highest rank to devote themselves to the service of the saints. I do not mean, to change ranks, and become proper servants to their inferiors, but freely and voluntarily to help them, and do the like kind of service with them; as is done by the associations Stephanas, and Fortunatus, and Achaicus, as coming to him from the church of Corinth. The account he gives of them, is, that they supplied the deficiencies of the church toward him, and by so doing refreshed his spirits and theirs, v. 17, 18. They gave him a more perfect state of the account of the church by word of mouth than he could acquire by books or writing, and by that means quieted his mind much, and upon their leave, he would quiet the minds of the Corinthians. Report had made their cause much worse than it was in fact, and their letters had not explained it enough to give the apostle satisfaction; but he had been made more easy by converse with them. It was a very good office they did, by truly stating facts, and removing the ill opinion Paul had received by common fame. They came to him with a truly Christian intention, to set the apostle right, and give him as favourable sentiments of the church, as they could, as peace-makers. Note, It is a great refreshment to the spirit of a faithful minister, to hear better of a people by wise and good men of their own body, than by common report; to find himself misinformed concerning them; that matters are not so bad as they had been represented. It is a grief to him, to hear ill of those he loves; it glads his heart to hear the report thereof is false. And the greater value he has for those who give him this information, and the more he can depend upon their truth, the greater is his joy.

2. Upon this account of the men, he directs how they should behave toward them; and, (1.) He exhorts them to acknowledge, (v. 18.) that is, owned and respected. The'v are to be peaceably submitted to for their good offices. Those who serve the sain'ts, those who consult the honour and good esteem of the churches, and are concerned to wipe off reproaches from them, and take off from the ill opinion fame had propagated, are to be valued, and esteemed, and loved. They who discover so good a spirit, cannot easily be over-valued. (2.) He advises, that they should submit themselves to such, and to all who helped with the apostles, and laboured, v. 16. That word is to be understood of subjection to proper superiors, but of a voluntary acknowledgment of their worth. They were persons to whom they owed peculiar respect, and whom they should have in veneration. Note, It is a venerable character they bear, who serve the saints, and labour hard to help the success of the gospel; who countenance and encourage the faithful ministers of Christ, and endeavour to promote their usefulness. Such should be held in honourable esteem.

19. The churches of Asia salute you. Aquila and Priscilla salute you much in the Lord, with the church that is in their house. 20. All the brethren greet you. Greet ye one another with a holy kiss. 21. The salutation of me Paul, with mine own hand. 22. If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be Anathema, Maran-tha. 23. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you. 24. My love be with you all in Christ Jesus. Amen.

The apostle closes his epistle.

I. With salutations to the church of Corinth; first, from those of Asia, from Priscilla and Aquila, (who seem to have been at this time inhabitants of Ephesus, vid. Acts 17. 26.) with the church in their house, (v. 19.) and from all the brethren, (v. 20.) at Ephesus, where, it highly probable at least, he then was. All these saluted the church at Corinth, by Paul. Note, Christianity does by no means destroy civility and good manners. Paul could find room in any place, and in all circumstances, to send the salutations of friends. Religion should promote a courteous and obliging temper towards all. They misrepresent and reproach it, who would take any encouragement from it, to be sour and morose. Some of these saluted them much in the Lord. Note, Christian salutations are not empty compliments; they carry in them real expressions of Christian love; and Paul gave the church the most hearty recommendations to the divine grace and blessing. They who salute in the Lord, wish their brethren all good from the Lord, and breathe out their good wishes in fervent prayers. We read also of a church in a private family, v. 19. It is very probable that the family itself is called the church in their house. Note, Every Christian family should in some respects be a Christian church. In some cases, (as, for instance, were they cast away on a foreign shore, where there are no other Christians,) they be should be a church themselves, if large enough, and live in the use of all ordinances; but in common cases they should live under the direction of Christian rules, and daily offer up Christian prayers and supplications. Wherever two or three are gathered together, and Christ is among them, there is a church. To these salutations he subjoins, 1. An advice, that they should greet one another with a holy kiss (v. 20.) or with sincere good-will; a tacit reproof of their faults and factions. When the churches of Asia, and the Christian brethren so remote, did so heartily salute them in the Lord, and own and love them as brethren, without so much grace and affection, it would be a shame for them not to own and love one another as brethren. Note, The love of the brethren should be a powerful incentive to mutual love. When the other churches of Christ love us all, we are very culpable, if we do not love one another. 2. He subjoins his own salutation; The salutation of me Paul, with mine own hand, v. 21. His amanuensis, it is reasonable to think, wrote the rest of his epistle from his mouth, but at the close it was fit that himself should sign it, that they might know it to be genuine; and therefore it is, added, (2 Thess. 3. 17.) Which is my token in every epistle; the mark of its being genuine; so he wrote in every epistle which he did not wholly pen, as he did that to the Galatians, Gal. 6. 11. Note, Those churches to whom apostolical letters were sent, were duly certified of their being authentic and divine. Nor would it have been very well fulfilled the up to their faith and holy living. And how much reason have Christians to fear falling under this doom! If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be Anathema, Maran-atha, v. 22. We sometimes need words of threatening, that we may fear. Bless ed be he, says the wise man, who feareth always. Holy fear is very good if it be to the fear of God, and holy living. And how much reason have Christians to fear falling under this doom! If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be Anathema, Maran-atha. Where observe, 1. The person described, who is liable to this doom; he that loveth not the Lord Christ. A μισείς, as some think; he who blasphemes Christ, disowns his doctrine, slights and contemptis his institutions, or, through pride of learning, invents new ones, different from Christ's doctrines. It stands here as a warning to the Corinthians, and a rebuke of their criminal behaviour. It is an admonition to them, not to be led away from the simplicity of the gospel, or those principles of it, which were the great motives to purity of life, by pretenders to science, by the wisdom of the world, which would call their religion folly, and its most important doctrines absurd and ridiculous. Those men had a spite at Christ; and if the Corinthians gave ear to their seducing speeches, they were in danger of apostatizing from him. Against this he gives them here a very solemn caution. "Do not give into such conduct, if you would escape the severest vengeance." Note, Professed Christians will, by contempt of Christ, and revolt from him, bring upon themselves the most dreadful destruction; they should be afraid of the wrath that is to come. In their plain and obvious meaning, for such as are without holy and sincere affection for the Lord Jesus Christ. Many who have his name much in their mouths, have no true love to him in their hearts, will not have him to rule over them, (Luke 19. 27.) and, not though they have very towering hopes of being saved by him. And none love him in truth, who do not obey his word, as they be commanded. Note, There are many Christians in name who do not love Christ Jesus the Lord in sincerity. But can any thing be more criminal or provoking? What, not love the most glorious Lover in the world! Him who loved us, and gave himself for us. He shed his blood for us, to testify his love to us, and that after heinas wrong and persecution! We should have had our own to bear with, if we are moved with such love as this, and without affection to such a Saviour? But, 2. We have here the doom of the person described; "Let him be Anathema, Maran-atha, lie under the heaviest and most dreadful curse. Let him be separated from the people of God, from the favour of God, and delivered up to his final, irrecoverable, and inexorable vengeance." Maran-atha is a Syriac phrase, and signifies The one who cometh! Maran-atha is the title of the Lord who, we may suppose, doth love, to whom they are inwardly and really disagreed, whatever outward profession they make, he is coming to execute judgment. And to be exposed to his wrath, to be divided to his left hand, to be condemned by him, how dreadful! If he will destroy, who can save? Those who fall under his condemning sentence, must perish, and that for ever. Note, They who love not the Lord Jesus Christ must perish without remedy. The wrath of God abideth on every one who believeth not on the Son, John 3. 36. And true faith in Christ will evermore be productive of sincere love to him. They love him not, who cannot believe in him.

III. The apostle closes all with his good wishes for them, and expressions of good-will to them. 1. With his good wishes; The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you, v. 23. As most of the other epistles say, "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, the most affecting his loving-kindness, I heartily wish you an interest in his dearest love, and his eternal favour." The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ comprehends in it all that is good, for time or eternity. To wish our friends may have this grace with them, is wishing them the utmost good. And this we should wish all our friends and brethren in Christ. We can wish them nothing more, power of loving and with them nothing less. We should heartily pray, that they may value, and seek, and obtain, and secure, the grace and good-will of their Lord and Judge. Note, The most solemn warnings are the result of the tenderest affection and the greatest good-will. We may tell our brethren and friends with great plainness and pathos, that, if they love not the Lord Jesus Christ, they must perish, while we heartily wish the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ with them as a glorious thing. We may give them this warning, that they may prize and lay hold of this grace. Note also, How much true Christianity enlarges our hearts; it makes us wish those whom we love, the blessings of both worlds; for this is implied in wishing the grace of Christ to be with them. And therefore it is no wonder that he adds, 2. The declaration of his love to them in Christ Jesus; My love be with you all, in Christ Jesus, Amen. And observe, 1st. We are heartily desired to be and dear to all, specially with them in this epistle, and told them of their faults with just severity; but to shew that he was not transported with passion, he parts with them in love, makes solemn profession of his love to them, nay, to them all in Christ Jesus, that is, for Christ's sake. He tells them, that his heart was with them, that he truly loved them; but lest this, after all, should seem too high and exalted, he adds, that his affection was the result of his religion, and would be guided by the rules of it. His heart would be with them, and he would bear them dear affection as long as their hearts were with Christ, and they bore true affection to his cause and interest. Note, We should be cordial lovers of all who are in Christ, and who love him in sincerity. Not but we should love all men, and wish them what good is in our power; but they must have our dearest affection, who are dear to Christ, and lovers of him. May our love be with all them who are in Christ Jesus! Amen.
AN EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, OF THE SECOND EPISTLE OF ST. PAUL TO THE CORINTHIANS.

Completed by Mr. D. Mayo.

In his former epistle, the apostle had signified his intentions of coming to Corinth, as he passed through Macedonia, (ch. 16. 6.) but being providentially hindered for some time, he writes his second epistle to them about a year after the former; and there seem to be these two great urgent occasions: 1. The case of the incestuous person, who lay under censure, required that with all speed he should be restored and received again into communion. This therefore he gives directions about; (ch. 2.) and afterward, (ch. 7.) he declares the satisfaction he had upon the intelligence he received of their good behaviour in that affair. 2. There was a contribution now making for the poor saints at Jerusalem, which he exhorts the Corinthians to join in, ch. 8, 9.

There are divers other things very observable in this epistle:

I. The account the apostle gives of his labours and success in preaching the gospel in several places, ch. 2.

II. The comparison he makes between the Old and New Testament dispensation, ch. 3.

III. The manifold sufferings that he and his fellow-labourers met with, and the motives and encouragements for their diligence and patience, ch. 4, 5.

IV. The caution he gives the Corinthians against mingling themselves with unbelievers, ch. 6.

V. The way and manner in which he justifies himself and his apostleship from the opprobrious insinuations and accusations of false teachers, who endeavoured to ruin his reputation at Corinth, (ch. 10—12.) and throughout the whole epistle.

II. CORINTHIANS, 1.

CHAP. I.

After the introduction, (v. 1, 2.) the apostle begins with the narrative of his troubles and God's goodness, which he had met with in Asia, by way of thanksgiving to God, (v. 3—6.) and for the edification of the Corinthians, v. 7—11. Then he attests his and his fellow-labourers' integrity, (v. 12—14.) and afterwards vindicates himself from the imputation of levity and inconstancy, v. 15—24.

1. PAUL, an apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God, and Timothy our brother, unto the church of God which is at Corinth, with all the saints which are in all Achaia; 2. Grace be to you, and peace, from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ.

This is the introduction to this epistle; in which we have,

1. The inscription; and therein, (1.) The person from whom it was sent, that is, Paul, who calls himself an apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God.

The apostleship itself was ordained by Jesus Christ, according to the will of God; and Paul was called to it by Jesus Christ, according to the will of God. He joins Timotheus with himself, in writing this epistle; not because he needed his assistance, but that out of the mouth of two witnesses the word might be established; and his dignifying Timothy with the title of brother, (either in the common faith, or in the work of the ministry,) shews the humility of this great apostle, and his desiring to recommend Timothy (though he was then a young man) to the esteem of the Corinthians, and give him a reputation among the churches. (2.) The persons to whom this epistle was sent, that is, the church of God at Corinth; and not only to them, but also to all the saints in all Achaia, that is, to all the Christians who lived in the region round about. Note, In Christ Jesus no distinction is made between the inhabitants of city or country; all Achaia stands upon a level, in his account.

2. The salutation, or apostolical benediction, which is the same as in his former epistle; and their in the apostle desires the two great and comprehensive blessings, grace and peace, for those Corinthians. These two benefits are fitly joined together, because there is no good and lasting peace without true grace; and both of them come: from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ, who is the Procuer and Dispenser of these benefits to fallen man, and is prayed to as God.

3. Blessed be God, even the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of mercies, and the God of all comfort; 4. Who comforteth us in all our tribulations, that we may be able to comfort them who are in any trouble, by the comfort wherewith we ourselves are comforted of God. 5. For as the sufferings of Christ abound in us, so our consolation also aboundeth by Christ. 6. And whether we be afflicted, it is for your consolation and salvation, which is effectual in the enduring of the same sufferings which we also suffer: or whether we be comforted, it is for your consolation and salvation.

After the foregoing preface, the apostle begins with the narrative of God's goodness to him and his fellow-labourers in their manifold tribulations; which he speaks of, by way of thanksgiving to God, and to advance the divine glory; (v. 3—6.) and it is fit that in all things, and in the first place, God be glorified. Observe,

1. The Object of the apostle's thanksgiving, to whom he offers up blessing and praise, namely, the blessed God, who only is to be praised, whom he describes by several glorious and amiable titles. (1.) The God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ; (2.) The God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ; (3.) The God of all comfort; (4.) The Father of mercies. There are a multitude of tender mercies in God essentially, and all mercies are from God originally: mercy is his genuine offspring, and his delight. He delighteth in mercy, Mic. 7. 18. (3.) The God of all comfort; from him proceedeth the COMFORTER, John 15. 26. He giveth the earnest of the Spirit in our hearts, v. 20. All our comforts come from God, and our sweetest comforts are in him.

2. The reasons of the apostle's thanksgivings, which are these two:

(1.) The benefits that he himself and his companions had received from God; for God had comforted them in all their tribulations, v. 4. In the world they had trouble, but in Christ they had peace. The apostles met with many tribulations, but they found comfort in them all: their sufferings (which are called the sufferings of Christ, v. 5.) because Christ sympathized with his members when suffering for his sake) did abound, but their consolation by Christ did abound also. Note, [1.] Then are we qualified to receive the comfort of God's mercies, when we set ourselves to give him the glory of them. [2.] Then we speak best of God and his goodness, when we speak from our own experience, and, in telling others, tell God also what he has done for us.

(2.) The advantage which others might receive; for God intended that they should be able to comfort others in trouble, (v. 4.) by communicating to them their experiences of the divine goodness and mercy; and the sufferings of good men have a tendency to this good end, (v. 6.) when they are ended with faith and patience. Note, [1.] What favours God bestows on us, are intended not only to make us cheerful ourselves, but also that we may be useful to others. [2.] If we do imitate the faith and patience of good men in their afflictions, we may hope to partake of their consolations here, and their salvation hereafter.

7. And our hope of you is steadfast, knowing, that as ye are partakers of the sufferings, so shall ye be also of the consolation. 8. For we would not, brethren, have you ignorant of our trouble which came to us in Asia, that we were pressed out of measure, above strength, insomuch that we despaired even of life: 9. But we had the sentence of death in ourselves, that we should not trust in ourselves, but in God, who raiseth the dead: 10. Who delivered us from so great a death, and doth deliver: in whom we trust that he will yet deliver us: 11. Ye also helping together by prayer for us, that for the gift bestowed upon us by the means of many persons, thanks may be given by many on our behalf.

In these verses the apostle speaks for the encouragement and edification of the Corinthians; and tells them (v. 7.) of his persuasion, or steadfast hope, that they should receive benefit by the troubles he and his companions in labour and travel had met with; that their faith should not be weakened, but their consolations increased. In order to this, he tells them,

1. What their sufferings had been; (v. 8.) We would not have you ignorant of our trouble. It was convenient for the churches to know what were the sufferings of their ministers. It is not certain what particular troubles in Asia are here referred to; whether the tumult raised by Demetrius at Ephesus, mentioned Acts 19. or the fight with beasts at Ephesus, mentioned in the former epistle, (ch. 15.) or some other trouble; for the apostle was in deaths often. This however is evident—they were great tribulations. They were pushed out of measure, to a very extraordinary degree, above the common strength of men, or of ordinary Christians, to bear up under them, insomuch that they despaired even of life, (v. 8.) and thought they should have been killed, or had fainted away and had died. 2. What they did in their distress; They trusted in God. And therefore they were brought to that extremity, that they should not trust in themselves, but in God, v. 9. Note, God often brings his people into great straits, that they may apprehend their own insufficiency to help themselves, and may be induced to place their trust and hope in his all-sufficiency. Our extremity is God's opportunity. In the mount will the Lord be seen; and we may safely trust in God, who raiseth the dead, v. 9. God's raising the dead is a proof of his almighty power. He that can do that, can do any thing, can do all things, and is worthy to be trusted in at all times.
Abraham’s faith fastened upon this instance of the divine power; He believed God, who quickeneth the dead, Rom. 4. 17. If we should be brought so low as to despair even of life, yet we may then trust in God, who can bring back not only from the gates, but from the jaws of death.

3. What the deliverance was, that they had obtained; and this was reasonable and continued. Their hope and trust were not in vain, nor shall any who trust in him be ashamed. God had delivered them, and did still deliver them, v. 16. Having obtained help of God, they continued to that day, Acts 26. 22.

4. What use they made of this deliverance; We trust that he will yet deliver us; (v. 16.) that God will deliver to the end, and preserv[e] to his heavenly kingdom. Note, Past experiences are great encouragements to faith and hope, and they lay great obligations to trust in God for time to come. We reproach our experiences, if we distrust God in future straits, who hath delivered us in former troubles. David, even when a young man, and when he had but a small stock of experiences, argued after the manner of the apostle here, 1 Sam. 17. 57.

5. What was desired of the Corinthians upon this account; That they would help together by prayer for them, (v. 11.) by social prayer, agreeing and joining together in prayer on their behalf. Note, Our trusting in God must not supersede the use of any proper and appointed means; and prayer is one of those means. We should pray for ourselves and for one another. The apostle had himself a great interest in the throne of grace, yet he desires the help of others’ prayers. If we thus help one another by our prayers, we may hope for an occasion of giving thanks by many for answer of prayer. And it is our duty not only to help one another with prayer, but in praise and thanksgiving, and thereby to make suitable returns for benefits received.

12. For our rejoicing is this, the testimony of our conscience, that in simplicity and godly sincerity, not with fleshly wisdom, but by the grace of God, we have had our conversation in the world, and more abundantly to you-ward. 13. For we write no other things unto you, than what ye read or acknowledge; and I trust ye shall acknowledge even to the end; 14. As also ye have acknowledged us in part, that we are your rejoicing, even as ye also are our’s in the day of the Lord Jesus.

The apostle in these verses attests their integrity by the sincerity of their conversation. This he does not in any way of boasting and vain-glory, but as one good reason the more comfortably to trust in God, (Heb. 13. 18.) and for the necessary vindication of himself from the aspersions of some persons at Corinth, who reproached his person and questioned his apostleship. Here,

1. He appeals to the testimony of conscience, with rejoicing, v. 12. In which observe, The apostle appeals for simplicity, conscience, which is instead of a thousand witnesses. This is God’s deputy in the soul, and the voice of conscience is the voice of God. They rejoiced in the testimony of conscience, when their enemies reproached them, and were enraged against them. Note, The testimony of conscience for us, if that be right and upon good grounds, will be matter of rejoicing, at all times and in all conditions.

(2.) The testimony this witness gave. And here take notice, Conscience witnessed, [1.] Concerning their conversation, their constant course and tenour of life by that we may judge of ourselves, and not by this or that single act. [2.] Concerning the nature or object of their trust in God; that it was in simplicity and godly sincerity. This bless apostle was a true Israelite, a man of plain dealing; you might know where to have him. He was not a man who seemed to be one thing, and was another, but a man of sincerity. [3.] Concerning the principle they acted from in all their conversation, both in the world, and toward these Corinthians; and that was not fleshly wisdom, or carnal politics and worldly devices, but it was the grace of God, a vital gracious principle in their hearts, that came from God, and tendeth to God. Then will our conversation be well ordered, when we live and act under the influence and command of such a gracious principle in the heart.

2. He appeals to the knowledge of the Corinthians with hope and confidence, v. 13, 14.

Their conversation did in part full under the observation of the Corinthians; and these knew how they behaved themselves, how holyly, and justly, and unblameably; they never found any thing in them unbecoming an honest man. This they had acknowledged in part already, and he doubted not but they would still do so to the end, that they should never have any good reason to think or say otherwise of him, but that he was an honest man. And that there would be mutual rejoicing in one another. We are your rejoicing, even as ye also are our’s in the day of the Lord Jesus. Note, It is happy when ministers and people do rejoice in each other here; and this joy will be complete in that day when the great Shepherd of the sheep shall appear.

15. And in this confidence I was minded to come unto you before, that ye might have a second benefit; 16. And to pass by you into Macedonia, and to come again out of Macedonia unto you, and of you to be brought on my way toward Judæa. 17. When I therefore was thus minded, did I use lightness? Or the things that I purpose, do I purpose according to the flesh, that with me there should be yea yea, and nay nay? 18. But as God is true, our word toward you was not yea and nay. 19. For the Son of God, Jesus Christ, who was preached among you by us, even by me and Silvanus and Timotheus, was not yea and nay, but in him was yea. 20. For all the promises of God in him are yea, and in him Amen, unto the glory of God by us. 21. Now he who establisheth us with you in Christ, and hath anointed us, is God: 22. Who hath also sealed us, and given the earnest of the Spirit in our hearts. 23. Moreover I call God for a record upon my soul, that to spare you I came not as yet unto Corinth. 24. Not for that we have dominion over your faith, but are helpers of your joy: for by faith ye stand.

The apostle vindicates himself from the imputation of levity and inconstancy, in that he did not hold his purpose of coming to them at Corinth. His adversaries there sought all occasions to blemish his character, and reflect upon his conduct; and, it seemed, they took hold of this handle to reproach his person and discredit his ministry. Now, for his justification,
1. He avers the sincerity of his intention; (v. 15—17.) and he does this in confidence of their good opinion of him, and that they would believe him, when he assured them he was minded, or did really intend, to come to them; and with the design, not only that they might receive, as sound and beneficial, some further advantage by his ministry. He tells them that he had not herein used tightness; (v. 17.) that, as he aimed not at any secular advantage to himself, (for his purpose was not according to the flesh, that is, with carnal views and aims,) so it was not a rash and inconsiderate resolution that he had taken up, for he had had his measures thus of passing by them to Macedonia, and commencing again to them from Macedonia in his way to Judea; (v. 16.) and therefore they might conclude that it was for some weighty reasons that he had altered his purpose; and that with him there was not yea, yea, and nay, nay, v. 17. He was not to be accused of levity and inconstancy, or a contradiction between his words and intentions. Note, Good men should be careful to preserve the reputation of sincerity and constancy; they should not resolve but upon mature and serious deliberation, and will not change their resolves but for weighty reasons.

2. He would not have the Corinthians to infer that his gospel was false or uncertain, or that it was contradictory in itself, or unto truth, v. 18, 19. For if it had been so, that he had been fickle in his purposes, or even false in the promises he made of coming to them, (which he was not justly to be accused of, and so some understand this expression, v. 18.) Our word toward you was not yea and nay, but ye, v. 20. There is an invincible constancy and unquestionable sincerity and certainty in all the parts of the gospel of Christ. If in the promises that the ministers of the gospel make as common men, and about their own affairs, they see cause sometimes to vary from them, yet the promises of the gospel-covenant, which they preach, stand firm and inviolable. Bad men are false; good men are fickle; but God is true, neither fickle nor false.

The apostle, having mentioned the stability of the divine promises, makes a digression to illustrate this great and sweet truth, That all the promises of God are yea and amen. For,

1. They are the promises of the God of truth, (v. 20.) of him that cannot lie, whose truth as well as mercy commands us to believe him.

2. They are made in Christ Jesus, (v. 20.) the Amen, the true and faithful Witness; he hath purchased and ratified the covenant of promises, and is the Surety of the covenant, Heb. 7. 22.

3. They are confirmed by the Holy Spirit. He does establish Christians in the faith of the gospel; he has anointed them with his sanctifying grace, which in scripture is often compared to oil; he has sealed them, he has given his Spirit, and he has an earnest in their hearts, v. 21, 22. An earnest secures the promise, and is part of the payment. The illumination of the Spirit is an earnest of everlasting light; the quickening of the Spirit is an earnest of everlasting life; and the comforts of the Spirit are an earnest of everlasting joy. Note, The veracity of God, the mediation of Christ, and the operation of the Spirit, are all engrafted that the promises shall be sure to all the seed, and the accomplishment of them shall be to the glory of God, (v. 20.) for the glory of his rich and sovereign grace, and ever-falling truth and faithfulness.

3. The apostle gives a good reason why he did not come to Corinth, as was expected, v. 23. It was, that he might spare them. They ought therefore to own his kindness and tenderness. He knew there were things amiss among them, and such as deserved censure, but was desirous to shew tenderness. He assures them that this was the true reason, after this very solemn manner; I call God for a record upon my soul: a way of speaking not justifiable where used in trivial matters; but this was very justifiable in the apostle, for his necessary vindication, and for the credit and usefulness of his ministry, which was struck at by his opposers. He adds, to prevent mistakes, that he did not pretend the dominion over their faith, v. 24. Christ only is the Lord of our faith, he is the Author and Finisher of our faith, Heb. 12. 2. He reveals to us what we must believe. Paul and Apollos, and the rest of the apostles, were but ministers by whom they believed, (1 Cor. 3. 5.) and so the ministers of their joy, even the joy of faith. For by faith we stand firm, and live, and are comforted. Our strength and ability are owing to faith, and our comfort and joy must flow from faith.

CHAP. II.

In this chapter, the apostle proceeds in the account of the reasons why he did not come to Corinth, v. 1—4. Then he writes concerning the incestuous person who lay under censure; and gives direction for the restoring him, together with the reasons for their so doing; (v. 5—11.) and afterward informs them of his labours and success in preaching the gospel in several places, v. 12—17.

1. BUT I determined this with myself that I would not come again unto you in heaviness. 2. For if I make you sorry, who is he then that maketh me glad, but the same who is made sorry by me? 3. And I wrote this same unto you, lest, when I came, I should have sorrow from them of whom I ought to rejoice; having confidence in you all, that my joy is the joy of you all. 4. For out of much affliction and anguish of heart I wrote unto you with many tears; not that ye should be grieved, but that ye might know the love which I have more abundantly unto you.

In these verses,

1. The apostle proceeds in giving an account of the reason why he did not come to Corinth, as was expected; namely, because he was unwilling to grieve them, or be grieved by them, v. 1, 2. He had determined to come in heaviness, which yet he should have done, had he come, and found scandal among them not duly animadverted upon: this would have been cause of grief both to him and them; for their sorrow or joy at meeting would have been mutual. If he had made them sorry, that would have been a sorrow to himself, for there would have been none to have made him glad. But his desir was to have a cheerful meeting with them, and not to have it embittered by any unhappy occasion of disagreeing.

2. He tells them it was to the same intent that he wrote his former epistle, v. 3, 4. (1. That he might not have sorrow from them, of whom he ought to rejoice; and that he had written to them in confidence of their doing what was requisite, in order to their benefit and his comfort. The particular thing referred to, as appears by the following verses, was, the case of the incestuous person about whom he had written in the first epistle, ch. 5. Nor was the apostle disappointed in his expectation. (2.) He assures them that he did not design to grieve them, but to testify his love to them, and that he wrote to them with much anguish and affection in his own heart, and with great affection to them. He had written with tears, that they might know his abundant love to them. Note, [1.] Even in reproofs, admonitions, and acts of discipline, faithful ministers should their love. [2.] Needful censures, and the exercise of church-discipline towards offenders, are a grief to tender-spirited ministers, and are administered with regret.

5. But if any have caused grief, he hath not grieved me, but in part; that I may not overcharge you all. 6. Sufficient to such a man is this punishment, which was inflicted of many. 7. So that contrariwise ye ought rather to forgive him, and comfort him, lest perhaps such a one should be swallowed up with overmuch sorrow. 8. Wherefore I beseech you that ye would confirm your love toward him. 9. For to this end also did I write, that I might know the proof of you, whether ye be obedient in all things. 10. To whom ye forgive any thing, I forgive also: for if I forgive any thing, to whom I forgave it, for your sakes forgave I it, in the person of Christ: 11. Lest Satan should get an advantage of us: for we are not ignorant of his devices.

In these verses the apostle treats concerning the incestuous person who had been excommunicated, which seems to be one principal cause of his writing this epistle.

Here observe, 1. He tells them that the crime of that person had grieved him in part; and that he was grieved also with a part of them, who, notwithstanding this should and many more censures were puffed up, and had not mourned, 1 Cor. 5. 2. However, he was unwilling to lay too heavy a charge upon the whole church, especially seeing they had cleared themselves in that matter by observing the directions he had formerly given them. 2. He tells them that the punishment which had been inflicted upon this offender was sufficient, v. 6. The desired effect was obtained, for the man was humbled, and they had shown the proof of their obedience to his directions. 3. He therefore directs them, with all speed, to restore the excommunicated person, or to receive him again to their communion, v. 7, 8. This is expressed several ways; he beseeches them to forgive him, to release him from church-censures, for they could not remit the guilt or offence against God; and also to comfort him; for in many cases the comfort of penitents depends upon their reconciliation not only with God, but with men also, whom they have scandalized or injured. They must also confirm their love to him; they should shew that their reproofs and censures proceeded from love to his person, as well as hatred to his sin; and that their design was to reform, not to ruin him. Or thus: If his fault had weakened their love to him, that they could not take that satisfaction in him as formerly; yet, now that he was recovered by repentance, they must renew and confirm their love to him.

4. He used several weighty arguments to persuade them to do thus; (1.) The case of the penitent called for this; for he was in danger of being swallowed up with overmuch sorrow, v. 7. He was so sensible of his fault, and so much afflicted under his punishment, that he was in danger of falling into despair; and when sorrow is excessive, it does hurt; even sorrow for sin is too great, when it unfitts for other duties, and drives men to despair. (2.) They had shewed obedience to his directions in passing a censure upon him, and now he would have them comply with his desire to restore him, v. 9. (3.) He means this far readiness to forgive this penitent, and concure with them in this matter: "To whom ye forgive, I forgive also, v. 10. I will readily concur with you in forgiving him." And this he would do for their sakes, for love to them, and for their advantage; and for Christ's sake, or in his name, as his apostle; and in conformity to his doctrine and example, which are so full of kindness and tender mercy toward all them who truly repent. (4.) He gives another weighty reason, (v. 11.) "Lest Satan get an advantage against us. Not only was there danger lest Satan should get an advantage against the penitent, by driving him to despair; but against the churches also, and the apostles or ministers of Christ, by representing them as too rigid and severe, and so frighten people from coming among them.

In this, as in other things, wisdom is profitable to direct, so to manage according as the case may be, that the ministry may persuade the indulging sin on the one hand, or for too great severity toward sinners on the other hand. Note, Satan is a subtle enemy, and uses many stratagems to deceive us; and we should not be ignorant of his devices: he is also a watchful adversary, ready to take all advantages against us; and we should be very cautious lest we give him any occasion so to do.

12. Furthermore, when I came to Troas to preach Christ's gospel, and a door was opened unto me of the Lord, 13. I had no rest in my spirit, because I found not Titus my brother: but taking my leave of them, I went from thence unto Macedonia. 14. Now thanks be unto God, who always causeth us to triumph in Christ, and maketh manifest the savour of his knowledge by us in every place. 15. For we are unto God a sweet savour of Christ, in them that are saved, and in them that perish: 16. To the one we are the savour of death unto death; and to the other the savour of life unto life. And who is sufficient for these things? 17. For we are not as many, who corrupt the word of God: but as of sincerity, but as of God, in the sight of God, speak we in Christ.

After these directions concerning the excommunicated person, the apostle makes a long digression, to give the Corinthians an account of his travels and labours for the furtherance of the gospel, and what access he had had there; declaiming at the same time how much he was concerned for them in their affairs; how he had no rest in his spirit, when he found not Titus at Troas, (v. 13.) as he expected, from whom he hoped to have understood more perfectly how it fared with them. And we find afterward, (ch. 7. 5—7.) that when the apostle came into Macedonia, he was not comforted by the coming of Titus, and the information he gave him concerning them. So that we may look upon all that we read from this second chapter, v. 12. to ch. 7. 5. as a kind of parenthesis. Observe here
I. Paul's unwearying labour and diligence in his work, v. 12, 13. He travelled from place to place, to preach the gospel. He went to Tarsus from Philippi by sea; (Acts 20. 6.) from thence he went to Macedonia; so that he was prevented from passing by Corinth, as he designed, ch. 1. 16. But though he was prevented in his design, as to the place of working, yet he was unwearyed in his work.

II. His success in his work; A great door was opened to him of the Lord, v. 12. He had a great deal of success in his work, where none should have expected good success in his work; for God made manifest the savour of his knowledge by him in every place where he came. He had an opportunity to open the door of his mouth freely, and God opened the hearts of his hearers, as the heart of Lydia; (Acts 16. 14.) and the apostle speaks of this as a matter of thankfulness to God, and of rejoicing to his soul; Thanks be to God who always causeth us to triumph in Christ. Note, 1. A believer's triumphs are all in Christ. In ourselves we are weak, and have neither joy nor victory; but in Christ we may rejoice and triumph. 2. True believers have constant cause of triumph in Christ, for they are more than conquerors through him who hath loved them, Rom. 8. 37. 3. God causeth them to triumph in Christ. It is God who has given us matter for triumph, and he satisfieth the soul with good measure and glory of all. 4. The good success of the gospel is a good reason for a Christian's joy and rejoicing.

III. The comfort that the apostle and his companions in labour found, even when the gospel was not successful to the salvation of some who heard it, v. 15—17. Here observe, 1. The different success of the gospel, and its different effects upon several sorts of persons to whom it is preached. The success is different; for some are saved by it, while others perish under it. Nor is this to be wondered at, considering the different effects the gospel has. For, (1.) Unto some it is a savour of death unto death. Those who are willingly ignorant, and wilfully obstinate,disrelish the gospel, as men dislike an ill savour, and therefore they are blinded and hardened by it: it stirs up their corruptions, and exasperates their spirits, so that they reject it with scorn, even in this worldly and eternal death. (2.) Unto others the gospel is a savour of life unto life. To humble and gracious souls the preaching of the word is most delightful and profitable. As it is sweeter than honey to the taste, so it is more grateful than the most precious odours to the senses, and much more profitable; for as it quickened them at first when they were dead in trespasses and sins, so makes them more lively, and will end in eternal life. 2. The awful impressions this matter made upon the mind of the apostle, and should also make upon our spirits; Who is sufficient for these things? v. 16. The apostle, who is worthy to be employed in such weighty work; a work of such vast importance, because of so great consequence? Who is able to perform such a difficult work, that requires so much skill and labour? The work is great, and our strength is small; yea, of ourselves we have no strength at all; all our sufficiency is of God. Note, If men did seriously consider what great things depend upon the preaching of the gospel, and how difficult the work of the ministry is, they would be very cautious how they enter upon it, and very careful to perform it well. 3. The comfort which the apostle had under this great consideration; (1.) Because faithful ministers shall be accepted of God, whatever their success be. We are, if faithful, unto God a sweet savour of Christ, (v. 15.) in them who are saved, and in them also who perish. God will accept of sincere intentions, and honest endeavours, though with many they are not successful. Ministers shall be accepted, and recompensed, not according to their success, but according to their fidelity; Though Israel be not gathered, yet shall I be glorious in the eyes of the Lord, Isa. 49. 5. (2.) Because his conscience witnessed to his faithfulness, v. 17. Though many did corrupt the word of God, yet the apostle's conscience witnessed to his fidelity. He did not mix his own notions with the doctrines and institutions of Christ; he durst not add to, nor diminish from, the word of God; he was faithful in dispensing the gospel, as he received it from the Lord, and had no secular turn to serve; his aim was to approve himself to God, remembering that his eye was always upon him; he therefore spake and acted always in the sight of God, and therefore in sincerity. Note, What we do in religion, is not of God, does not come from God, will not reach to God, unless it be done in sincerity, as in the sight of God.

CHAP. III.

The apostle makes an apology for his seeming to commend himself, and is careful not to assume too much to himself, but to ascribe all praise unto God, v. 1—5. He then draws a comparison between the apostle and his companions, v. 6—11. He then expresses his satisfaction in being sent to the Gentiles, and his desire to see them, v. 12—17. He shews the excellency of the latter above the former, v. 18—21. He expresses his desire to see the Corinthians, and shews the excellency of the Gospel ministry over others, v. 22—24. He shews his wish to see the Corinthians, and closes his epistle, v. 25—33.

1. Do we begin again to commend ourselves? Or need we, as some others, epistles of commendation to you, or letters of commendation from you? v. 1. Ye are our epistle, written in our hearts, known and read of all men: v. 2. Forasmuch as ye are manifestly declared to be the epistle of Christ ministered by us, written not with ink, but with the Spirit of the living God; not in tables of stone, but in fleshly tables of the heart. v. 3. And such trust have we through Christ to God-ward: 5. Not that we are sufficient of ourselves to think any thing, as of ourselves; but our sufficiency is of God;

In these verses,

1. The apostle makes an apology for his seeming to commend himself. He thought it convenient to protest his sincerity to them, because there were some at Corinth who endeavoured to blast his reputation; yet he was not desirous of vain-glory. And he tells them,

(1.) They neither needed nor desired any verba commendation to them, nor letters testimonial from them, as some others did, meaning the false apostles or teachers, v. 1. Their ministry among them had, with some consistency, been truly great and honourable, how little soever their persons were in reality, or how contemptible soever some would have them thought to be.

(2.) The Corinthians themselves were their real commendation, and a good testimonial for them, that God was with them of a truth, that they were sent of God; Ye are our epistle, v. 2. This was the testimonial they most delight in, and what was most dear to them—they were written in their hearts: and this they could offer to upon occasion, for it was, or might be, known and read of all men. Note, There is nothing more delightful to faithful ministers, or more to their commendation, than the success of their ministry evidenced in the hearts and lives of them among whom they labour.

2. The apostle is careful not to assume too much of himself, but to ascribe all the praise to God. Therefore,
II. CORINTHIANS, III.

(1.) He says they were the epistle of Christ, v. 3. The apostle and others were but instruments. Christ was the Author of all the good that was in them. The law of Christ was written in their hearts, and the love of Christ shed abroad in their hearts. This epistle was not written with ink, but with the Spirit of the living God; nor was it written in tables of stone, as the law of God given to Moses, but on the heart; and that heart not a stony one, but a heart of flesh, upon the fleshly (not fleshly, as fleshliness denotes sensuality) tables of the heart, upon hearts that are softened and renewed by divine grace, according to that gracious promise, I will take away the stony heart, and I will give you a heart of flesh, Ezek. 36. 26. This was the good hope the apostle had concerning these Corinthians, (v. 4.) that their hearts were like the ark of the covenant, containing the tables of the law and the gospel, written with the finger, that is, by the Spirit, of the living God.

(2.) He utterly disclaims the taking any praise to themselves, and ascribes all the glory to God; "We are not sufficient of ourselves, v. 5. We could never have made such good impressions on your hearts, or upon our own. Such are our weakness and inability, that we cannot of ourselves think a good thought, much less raise any good thoughts or affections in other men. All our sufficiency is of God; to him therefore are owing all the praise and glory of that good which is done, and from him we must receive grace and strength to do more." This is true concerning ministers and all Christians; the best are no more than what the grace of God makes them. Our hands are not sufficient for us, but our sufficiency is of God; and his grace is sufficient for us, to furnish us for every good word and work.

6. Who also hath made us able ministers of the New Testament; not of the letter, but of the spirit: for the letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life. 7. But if the ministration of death, written and engraven in stones, was glorious, so that the children of Israel could not steadfastly behold the face of Moses for the glory of his countenance; which glory was to be done away; 8. How shall not the ministration of the Spirit be rather glorious? 9. For if the ministration of condemnation be glory, much more doth the ministration of righteousness exceed in glory. 10. For even that which was made glorious had no glory in this respect, by reason of the glory that excelleth. 11. For if that which is done away was glorious, much more that which remaineth is glorious.

Here the apostle makes a comparison between the Old Testament and the New, the law of Moses and the gospel of Jesus Christ; and values himself and his fellow-labourers by this, that they were able ministers of the New Testament, that God had made them so, v. 6. This he does in answer to the accusations of false teachers, who magnify greatly the laws of Moses. 1. He distinguishes between the letter and the spirit, even of the New Testament, v. 6. As able ministers of the New Testament, they were ministers not merely of the letter, to read the written word, or to preach the letter of the gospel only, but they were ministers of the Spirit also; the Spirit of God did accompany their ministrations. The letter killeth, this the letter of the law does, for that is the ministration of death; and if we rest only in the letter of the gospel, we shall be never the better for so doing, even for then that will be a savour of death unto death: but the Spirit of the gospel, going along with the ministry of the gospel, gives life spiritual, and life eternal. 2. He shews the difference between the Old Testament and the New, and the excellency of the gospel above the law. For,

(1.) The Old Testament dispensation was the ministration of death, (v. 7.) whereas that of the New Testament is the ministration of life. The law discovered sin, and the wrath and curse of God, that shewed us a God above us, and a God against us; but the gospel discovers grace and Emmanuel, God with us. Upon this account the gospel is more glorious than the law; and yet that had a glory in it, witness the shining of Moses's face (an indication thereof) when he came down from the mount with the tables in his hand, that reflected rays of brightness upon his countenance.

(2.) The law was the ministration of condemnation, for that condemned and cursed every one who continued doing things written therein, to do them; but the gospel is the ministration of righteousness: wherein the righteousness of God by faith is revealed: this shews us that the just shall live by his faith: this reveals the grace and mercy of God through Jesus Christ, for the obtaining the remission of sins and eternal life. The gospel therefore so much exceeds in glory, that in a manner it eclipses the glory of the legal dispensation, v. 10. As the shining of a burning lamp is lost, or not regarded, when the sun arises, and goeth forth in his strength; so there was no glory in the Old Testament, in comparison with that of the New.

(3.) The law is done away, but the gospel does and shall remain, v. 11. Not only did the glory of Moses's face go away, but the glory of Moses's law is done away also; yea, the law of Moses itself is now abolished; that dispensation was only to continue for a time, and then to vanish away; whereas the gospel shall remain to the end of the world, and is always fresh and flourishing, and remains glorious.

12. Seeing then that we have such hope, we use great plainness of speech: 13. And not as Moses, who put a veil over his face, that the children of Israel could not steadfastly behold the face of Moses for the glory of his countenance; which glory was to be done away; 14. But their minds were blinded, for until this day remaineth the same veil untaken away in the reading of the Old Testament; which veil is done away in Christ. 15. But even unto this day, when Moses is read, the veil is upon their heart. 16. Nevertheless, when it shall turn to the Lord, the veil shall be taken away. 17. Now the Lord is that Spirit: and where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty. 18. But we all, with open face beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord.

In these verses the apostle draws two inferences from what he had said about the Old and New Testament.

1. Concerning the duty of the ministers of the gospel to use great plainness or clearness of speech. They ought not, like Moses, to put a veil upon their faces, or obscure and darken those things that they should make plain. The gospel is a more clear dispensation than the law; the things of God are revealed in the New Testament, not in types and shadows; and ministers are much to blame, if they do not set spiritual things, and gospel-truth and grace, in the clearest light that is possible. Though the Israelites could not, yet we may, look steadfastly to the end of what was commanded, but is now abolished. We may see the meaning of those types and shadows by the accomplishment, seeing the veil is done away in Christ; and He is come, who was the End of the law for righteousness to all them who believe, and whom Moses and all the prophets pointed to, and wrote of.
II. CORINTHIANS, IV.

2. Concerning the privilege and advantage of those who enjoy the gospel, above those who lived under the law. For,

(1.) Those who lived under the legal dispensation, had their minds blinded, (v. 14.) and they were under a veil upon their hearts, v. 15. Thus it was formerly, and so it was especially as to those who remained in Judaism, after the coming of the Messiah, and the publication of his gospel. Nevertheless, the apostle tells us, there is a time coming, when this veil also shall be taken away, and when it [the body of that people] shall turn to the Lord, v. 16. Or, when any particular person is converted to God, then the veil of ignorance is taken away; the blindness of the mind, and the hardness of the heart, are cured.

(2.) The condition of those who enjoy and believe the gospel is much more happy. For, [1.] They have liberty; Where the Spirit of the Lord is, and where he worketh, as he does under the gospel-dispensation, there is liberty; (v. 17.) freedom from the yoke of the ceremonial law, and from the servitude of corruption; liberty of access to God, and freedom of speech in prayer. The heart is his liberty, and enlarged, to run the ways of God's commandments.

[2.] They have light; for with open face we behold the glory of the Lord, v. 18. The Israelites saw the glory of God in a cloud, which was dark and dreadful; but Christians see the glory of the Lord as in a glass, more clearly and comfortably. It was the peculiar privilege of Moses, for God to converse with him face to face, in a friendly man ner; but with all his tribes he conversed in a cloud, with open face. He sheweth them his glory. [3.] This light and liberty are transforming; we are changed into the same image, from glory to glory, (v. 18.) from one degree of glorious grace unto another, till grace here be consummated in glory for ever. How much therefore should Christians prize and improve these privileges! We should not rest contented without an experimental knowledge of the transforming power of the gospel, by the operation of the Spirit, bringing us into a conformity to the temper and tendency of the glorious gospel of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

CHAP. IV.

In this chapter, we have an account, I. Of the constancy of the apostle, and sufferings in his work, which he endured in the cause of the gospel: of which constancy is declared, (v. 1.) their sincerity is vouch'd; (v. 2.) an objection is obviated; (v. 3, 4.) and their integrity proved, v. 5., 7. II. Of their courage and patience under their sufferings, Where see what their sufferings were, together with their sufferings, their sufferings in a very particular manner; and where it was that they kept them from sinking and fainting under them, v. 13, to the end.

1. THEREFORE, seeing we have this ministry, as we have received mercy, we faint not; 2. But have renounced the hidden things of dishonesty, not walking in craftiness, nor handling the word of God deceitfully; but by manifesta-

3. But if our gospel be hid, it is hid to them that are lost: 4. In whom the god of this world hath blinded the minds of them who believe not, lest the light of the glorious gospel of Christ, who is the image of God, should shine unto them. 5. For we preach not ourselves, but Christ Jesus the Lord; and ourselves your servants for Jesus' sake. 6. For God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ. 7. But we have this treasure in earthen vessels, that the excellency of the power may be of God, and not of us.

The apostle had, in the foregoing chapter, been magnifying his office, upon the consideration of the excellency or glory of that gospel about which he did officiate; and now in this chapter his design is to vindicate their ministry from the accusation of false teachers, who charged them as deceitful workers, or endeavoured to prejudice the minds of the people against them on account of their sufferings. He tells the full force of the gospel, and how they shewed their value for their office and ministers of the gospel. They were not puffed up with pride, but spurred on to great diligence; Seeing we have this ministry, are so much distinguished and dignified, we do not take state upon ourselves, nor indulge idleness, but are excited to the better performance of our duty.

Two things in general we have an account of,

Their constancy and sincerity in their work and labour. Concerning which, observe,

I. Their constancy and perseverance in their work are declared; " We faint not, (v. 1.) under the difficulty of our work, nor do we desist from our labour."

And this their steadfastness was owing to the mercy of God. From the same mercy and grace that they received the apostleship, (Rom. 1. 5.) they received strength to persevere in the work of that office.

Now, As it is great mercy and grace to be called to be saints, and especially to be called faithful, and be put into the ministry; (1 Tim. 1. 12.) so it is owing to the mercy and grace of God, if we continue faithful, and persevere in our work with diligence.

The best men in the world would faint in their work and under their burthen, if they did not receive mercy from God. By the grace of God I am what I am, said this great apostle in his former epistle to these Corinthians, ch. 15. 10. And that mercy which has helped us out, and helped us on, hitherto, we may rely upon to help us even to the end.

II. Their sincerity in their work is avouched, (v. 2.) in several expressions; We have renounced the hidden things of dishonesty. The things of dishonesty are hidden things, that will not bear the light; and those who practise them, are, or should be, ashamed of it, even before men. Such things the apostle did not allow of, but did renounce and avoid with indignation; Not walking in craftiness, or in disguise, acting with art and cunning, but in great simplicity, and with open freedom. They had no base and wicked designs, covered with fair and specious pretences of something that was good. Nor did they in their preaching handle the word of God deceitfully; but, as he said before, they used great plainness of speech, and did not make their ministry serve a turn, or truss to base designs. They had not cheated the people with falsehood in
II. The steadfast adherence to the truths of the gospel will commend ministers and people; and sincerity or uprightness will preserve a man's reputation, and the good opinion of wise and good men concerning him.

III. An objection is obviated, which might be thus formed; "If it be thus, how then does it come to pass, that the gospel is hid, and proves ineffectual, as to some who hear it?" To which the apostle answers, by shewing that this was not the fault of the gospel, nor of the preachers thereof. But the true reasons of this were, 1. They are lost souls, to whom the gospel is hid, or is ineffectual, v. 3. Christ came to save that which was lost; (Matt. 18. 11.) and the gospel of Christ in such a manner as should do them good, and save them, they are lost for ever; they must never expect any thing else to save them, for there is no other method or means of salvation. The hiding of the gospel therefore from souls, is both an evidence and cause of their ruin. 2. The god of this world hath blinded their minds, v. 4. They are under the influence and power of the Devil, who is here called the god of this world, and elsewhere the prince of this world, because of his power he has in this world, and the homage that is paid to him by multitudes in the world, and the great sway that, by divine permission, he bears in the world, and in the hearts of his subjects, or rather slaves. And as he is the prince of darkness, and ruler of the darkness of this world, so he darkens the understandings of men, and increases their prejudices, and supports his interest by keeping them in the dark, blinding their minds, and instructing them to their own hurt. Observe, (1.) Christ's design by his gospel, is to make a glorious discovery of God to the minds of men. Thus, as the Image of God, he demonstrates the power and wisdom of God, and the grace and mercy of God for their salvation. But, (2.) The design of the Devil, is, to keep men in ignorance; and when he cannot keep the light of the gospel out of the world, he makes it his great business to keep it out of the hearts of men.

IV. A proof of their integrity is given, v. 5. They made it their business to preach Christ, and not themselves; We preach not ourselves. Self was not the matter or the end of the apostles' preaching; they did not give out their own notions and private opinions, for their passions and prejudices, for the word and will of God. They did not seek to advance their own secular interest or glory; but they preached Christ Jesus the Lord; and thus it did become them, and behave them to do, as being Christ's servants. Their business was, to make their Master known to the world as the Messiah, or the Christ of God, and as (Jesus) the only Saviour of men, and as the rightful Lord, and to advance his honour and glory. And this is, in the doctrine of Christ, the foundation of the power of Christ in the heart; and in preaching Christ, we preach all we should preach. "As to ourselves," says the apostle, "we preach, or declare, that we are your servants for Jesus' sake." This was no compliment, but a real profession of a readiness to do good to their souls, and to promote their spiritual and eternal interest, and that for Jesus' sake; not for their own sake or their own advantage, but for Christ's sake, that they might imitate his great example, and advance his glory. Note, Ministers should not be of proud spirits, lording it over God's heritage, who are servants to the souls of men; yet, at the same time, they must avoid the meanness of spirit, implied in becoming the servants of the humours or the lusts of men; if they should thus seek to please men, they would not be the servants of Christ, Gal. 1. 10. And there was good reason,

1. Why they should preach Christ. For by gospel-light we have the knowledge of the glory of God, which shines in the face of Jesus Christ, v. 6. And the light of this Sun of righteousness is more glorious than that light which God commanded to shine out of darkness. It is a pleasant thing for the eye to behold the sun in the firmament; but it is more pleasant and profitable, when the gospel shines in the heart. Note, As light was the first-born of the first creation, so it is in the new creation: the illumination of the Spirit is his first work upon the soul. The grace of God created such a light in the soul, that they who were sometimes darkness, are made light in the Lord, Eph. 5. 8.

2. Why they should not preach themselves; because they were but earthen vessels; things of little or no worth or value. Here seems to be an allusion to the lamps which Gideon's soldiers carried in earthen pitchers, Judges 7. 16. The treasure of gospel-light and grace is put into earthen vessels. The ministers of the gospel are weak and frail creatures, and subject to like passions and infirmities as other men; they are mortal, and soon broken in pieces. And God has so ordered it, that the weaker vessels are, the stronger his power may appear to be, that the treasure itself should be valued the more. Note, There is an excellency of power in the gospel of Christ, to enlighten the mind, to convince the conscience, to convert the soul, and to rejoice the heart: but all this power is from God the Author, and not from men, who are but instruments, so that God in all things must be glorified.

8. We are troubled on every side, yet not distressed; we are perplexed, but not in despair; 9. Persecuted, but not forsaken; cast down, but not destroyed; 10. Always bearing about in the body the dying of the Lord Jesus, that the life also of Jesus might be made manifest in our body. 11. For we who live are alway delivered unto death for Jesus' sake, that the life also of Jesus might be made manifest in our mortal flesh. 12. So then death worketh in us, but life in you. 13. We having the same spirit of faith, according as it is written, I believed, and therefore have I spoken: we also believe, and therefore speak; 14 Knowing that he who raised up the Lord Jesus shall raise us also by Jesus, and shall present us with you. 15. For all things are for your sakes, that the abundant grace might through the thanksgiving of many redound to the glory of God. 16. For which cause we faint not; but though our outward man perish, yet the inward man is renewed day by day. 17. For our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory,
13. While we look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen: for the things which are seen are temporal; but the things which are not seen are eternal.

In these verses the apostle gives an account of their courage and patience under all their sufferings. Where observe,
I. How their sufferings, and patience under them, are declared, v. 8–12. The apostles were great sufferers; therein they followed their Master: Christ had told them, that in the world they should have tribulation, and so they had; yet they met with wonderful support, great relief, and many allays of their sufferings. The apostles were not left to bear the burden on one side, afflicted many ways, and we meet with almost all sorts of troubles; yet not distressed, v. 8. We are not huddled in, or hoopsed up, because we can see help in God, and help from God, and have liberty of access to God.

Again, “We are perplexed, often uncertain, and in doubt what will become of us, and not always without anxiety in our mind on this account; yet not in despair” (v. 8) even in our greatest afflictions, that our God will give us such light, strength, and support, as to deliver us, and in him we always place our trust and hope.

Again, “We are persecuted by men, pursued with hatred and violence from place to place, as men not worthy to live; yet not forsaken of God,” v. 9. Good men may be sometimes forsaken of their friends, as well as persecuted by their enemies; but God will never leave them nor forsake them. Again, “We are sometimes dejected, or cast down; the enemy may in great measure prevail, and our spirits begin to fail us; there may be fears within, as well as fighting without; yet we are not destroyed,” v. 9. Still they were preserved, and kept their heads above water. Note, Whatever condition the children of God may be in, in this world, they have a ‘but not’ to comfort themselves with; their case sometimes is bad, yea very bad, but not so bad as it might be.

The apostle speaks of their sufferings as constant, and as a counterpart of the sufferings of Christ, v. 10. The sufferings of Christ were, after a sort, re-acted in the sufferings of Christians; thus did they bear about the dying of the Lord Jesus in their body, setting before the world the great example of a suffering Christ, that the life of Jesus might also be made manifest, that people might see the power of Christ’s resurrection, and the efficacy of grace in and from the living Jesus, manifested in and toward them, who did yet live, though they were always delivered to death, (v. 11.) and though death worked in them, (v. 12.) they being exposed to death, and ready to be swallowed up by death continually. Thus great were the sufferings of the apostles, that, in comparison with them, other Christians were, even at that time, in prosperous circumstances. Death worketh in us; but life also in you.

II. What it was, that kept them from sinking and fainting under their sufferings, v. 13–18. Whatever the burthens and troubles of good men may be, they have cause enough not to faint.

1. Faith kept them from fainting; We have the same spirit of faith; (v. 13.) that faith which is of the operation of the Spirit; the same faith by which the saints of old did suffer such great things. Note, A faith of this sort is an effectual antidote against fainting fits in troublesome times. The spirit of faith will go far to bear up the spirit of a man under his infirmities; and as the apostle had David’s example to imitate, who said, (Ps. 116. 10.) I have believed, and therefore have I spoken, so he leaves us his example to imitate; We also believe, says he, and therefore speak.

Note, As we receive help and encouragement from the good words and examples of others, so we should be careful to give a good example to others.

2. Hope of the resurrection kept them from sinking, v. 14. They knew that Christ was raised, and that his resurrection was an earnest and assurance of their’s. This he had treated of largely in his former epistle to these Corinthians, ch. 15. And therefore their hope was firm, being well grounded, that he who raised up Christ the Head, will also raise up all his members. Note, The hope of the resurrection will encourage us in a suffering day, and set us above the fear of death: for what reason has a good Christian to fear death, that dies in hope of a joyful resurrection?

3. The consideration of the glory of God and the benefit of the church, by means of their sufferings, kept them from fainting, v. 15. Their sufferings were weighed for the weight of the glory that should follow them, which did redound to God’s glory. For when the church is edified, then God is glorified; and we may well afford to bear sufferings patiently and cheerfully, when we see others are the better for them—if they are instructed and edified, if they are confirmed and comforted. Note, The sufferings of Christ’s ministers, as well as their preaching and conversation, are intended for the good of the church and the glory of God.

4. The thoughts of the advantage their souls would reap by the sufferings of their bodies, kept them from fainting; Though our outward man perish, our inward man is renewed day by day, v. 16. Where note, (1.) We have every one of us an outward and an inward man, a body and a soul. (2.) If the outward man perish, there is no remedy, it must and will be so, it was made to perish. (3.) It is our happiness, if the decays of the outward man do contribute to the renewing of the inward man; if afflictions outwardly are gain to us inwardly; if, when the body is sick and weak and perishing, the soul is vigorous and prosperous. The best of men have need of further renewing of the inward man, even day by day. Where the good work is begun, there is more work to be done, for the carrying it forward. Work is as in wicked men things grow every day worse and worse, so in godly men they grow better and better.

5. The prospect of eternal life and happiness kept them from fainting, and was a mighty support and comfort. As to which, observe,
(1.) The apostle and his fellow-sufferers saw their afflictions working toward heaven, and that there they would end at last; (v. 17.) whereupon, they weighed their burdens in the balance of the scales, and saw they did as it were put the heavenly glory in one scale, and their earthly sufferings in the other; and pondering things in their thought, they found afflictions to be light, and the glory of heaven to be a far more exceeding weight. That which sense was ready to pronounce heavy and long, grievous and tedious, faith perceived to be light and short, but for a moment.

On the other hand, the worth and weight of the crown of glory, as they are exceedingly great in themselves, so they are esteemed to be by the believing soul—they far exceed all his expressions and thought; and it will be a special support, in our sufferings, when we can perceive them appointed as the way, and preparing us for the enjoyment of the future glory.

(2.) The faith enabled them to make this right judgment of things; We look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen, v. 18. Its by faith that we see God, who is invisible, (Heb. 11. 27.) and by that we look to an unseen heaven and hell, and faith is the evidence of things not seen. Note, [1.] There are unseen things, as well as things that are seen. [2.] There is this vast difference bet-between them, unseen things are eternal, seen things but temporary, or temporary only. [3.] By faith we not only discern these things, and the great difference between them, but by that also we take our aim at unseen things, and chiefly regard them, and make our end and scope, not to escape present evils, and obtain present good, both of which are temporal and transitory; but to escape future evil, and obtain future good things, which, though unseen, are real, and certain, and eternal; and faith is the substance of things hoped for, as well as the evidence of things not seen, Heb. 11. 1.

CHAP. V.

The apostle proceeds in shewing the reasons why they did not faint under their afflictions, namely, their expectation, desire, and assurance of happiness after death; (v. 1–5) and makes an inference for the comfort of believers in their present state, (v. 6–8) and another to quicken them in their duty, v. 9. 11. Then he makes an apology for seeming to commend himself, and gives a good reason for his zeal and diligence; (v. 12. 16.) and mentions two things that are necessary in order to our living to Christ, regeneration and reconciliation, v. 17, to the end.

1. For we know, that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. 2. For in this we groan, earnestly desiring to be clothed upon with our house which is from heaven: 3. If so be that being clothed we shall not be found naked. 4. For we that are in this tabernacle do groan, being burthened: not for that we would be unclothed, but clothed upon, that mortality might be swallowed up of life. 5. Now he that hath wrought us for the selfsame thing, is God, who also hath given unto us the earnest of the Spirit. 6. Therefore we are always confident, knowing that, while we are at home in the body, we are absent from the Lord: 7. (For we walk by faith, not by sight:) 8. We are confident, I say, and willing rather to be absent from the body, and to be present with the Lord. 9. Wherefore we labour, that, whether present or absent, we may be accepted of him. 10. For we must all appear before the judgment-seat of Christ; that every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad. 11. Knowing therefore the terror of the Lord, we persuade men; but we are made manifest unto God, and I trust also are made manifest in your consciences.

The apostle in these verses pursues the argument of the former chapter, concerning the grounds of their courage and patience under afflictions. And, 1. He mentions their expectation, and desire, and assurance, of eternal happiness after death, v. 1–5. Observe particularly,

1. The believer's expectation of eternal happiness after death, v. 1. He does not always know, or is well assured by faith of the truth and reality of the thing itself, that there is another and a happy life after this present life is ended; but he has good hope through grace of his interest in that everlasting blessedness of the unseeen world; "We know that we have a building of God, we have a firm and well-grounded expectation of the future felicity." Let us take notice, (1.) What heaven is in the eye and hope of a believer; he looks upon it as a house, or habitation; a dwelling-place, a resting-place, a hiding place; our Father's house, where there are many mansions; and our everlasting house: it is a house in the heavens, in that high and holy place, which as far exceeds all the palaces of this earth, as the heavens are high above the earth; it is a building of God, whose Builder and Maker is God, and therefore is worthy of its Author; the happiness of the future state is what God hath prepared for them that love him: it is eternal in the heavens, everlasting habitations, not like the earthly tabernacles, the poor cottages of clay, in which our souls now dwell, that are mouldering and decaying, whose foundations are in the dust. (2.) When it is expected this happiness shall be enjoyed—immediately after death; so soon as our house of this earthly tabernacle is dissolved. Note, [1.] That the body, this earthly house, is but a tabernacle, that must be dissolved shortly; the nails or pins will be drawn, and the cords be loosed, and then the body returns to dust as it was; [2.] When this comes to pass, then the house not made with hands. The spirit returns to God who gave it, as having as much as he has walked with God here, shall dwell with God for ever.

2. The believer's earnest desire after this future blessedness, which is expressed by this word, εὐπρόσωπον—we groan: which denotes, (1.) A groaning of sorrow under a heavy load; so believers groan under the burden of life; in this, we groan earnestly, v. 2. We that are in this tabernacle, groan, being burdened, v. 4. The body of flesh is a heavy burden, and the infirmities of the flesh. (2.) The true believers groan, because burdened with a body of sin, and the many corruptions that are still remaining and raging in them. This makes them complain, O wretched man that I am! Rom. 7. 24. (2.) There is a groaning of desire after the happiness of another life; and thus believers groan, earnestly desiring to be clothed upon with our house which is from heaven, (v. 2.) to obtain a blessed immortality, in which we are not only to live, but to reign in life. (3.) The being found naked, that being found naked, we shall not be naked; (v. 3.) that, if it were the will of God, we might not sleep, but be changed; for it is not desirable in itself to be unclothed; death, considered merely as a separation of soul and body, is not to be desired, but dreaded rather; but, considered as a passage to glory, the believer is willing rather to die than live, to be absent from the body, that he may be present with the Lord. (v. 8.) to leave this body, that he may go to Christ, and to put off these rags of mortality, that he may put on the robes of glory. Note, [1.] Death will strip us of the clothing of flesh, and all the comforts of life, as well as put an end to all our troubles here below. Naked we came into this world, and naked shall we go out of it. But, [2.] Gracious souls are not found naked in the other world; no, they are clothed with garments, prepared with very rich and righteous garments. They shall be delivered out of all their troubles, and shall have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb, Rev. 7. 14.

3. The believer's assurance of his interest in this future blessedness, on a double account; (1.) From the experience of the grace of God, in preparing and making him meet for this blessedness. He that hath wrought us for the selfsame thing, is God, v. 5. Note, All who are designed for heaven hereafter, are wrought or prepared for heaven while they are here; the stones of that spiritual building and temple above are squared and fashioned here below. And he that hath wrought us for this, is God; because nothing less than a divine power can make a soul partaker of a divine nature; no hand less than the hand of God can work us for this thing. A great deal is to be done to prepare our souls for heaven, and that requires more of faith than of the heart of the Lord.

(2) The word of the Spirit gave them this assurance; for an earnest is part of payment, and secures the full payment. The present graces and comforts of the Spirit are earnest of everlasting grace and comfort.

II. The apostle makes an inference for the comfort of believers in their present state and condition in this world, v. 6–8. Where observe,

1. That the present state and condition are, they are absent from the Lord, v. 6. they are pilgrims and strangers in this world; they do but sojourn here in their earthly home, or in this tabernacle; and though God is with us here, by his Spirit, and in his ordinances, yet we are not with him as we hope to be: we cannot see his face while we live; for we walk by faith, not by sight; v. 7. We have not the vision and fruition of God, as of an object that is present with us, and as we hope for hereafter, when we shall see as we are seen. Note, Faith is for this world, and sight is reserved for the other world: and it is our duty, and will be our interest, to walk by faith, till we come to live by sight.

2. How comfortable and courageous we ought to be in all the troubles of life, and in the hour of death; Therefore we are, or ought to be, always confident; (v. 6.) and again, (v. 8.) We are confident, and willing to be separated from the body. True Christians, if they duly consider the prospect faith gives them of another world, and the good reasons of their hope of blessedness after death, would be comforted under the troubles of life, and supported in the hour of death: they should take courage, when they are encountering the last enemy; and be willing rather to die than live, when it is the will of God that they should put off this tabernacle. Note, As those who are born from above, long to be there; so it is but being absent from the body, and we shall very soon be present with the Lord; but to die, and be with Christ; but to close our eyes to all things in this world, and we shall open them in a world of glory. Faith will be turned into sight.

III. He proceeds to make an inference, to exalt and quicken himself and others to duty, v. 9–11. So observe,

1. What it was that the apostle was thus ambitious of, acceptance with God. We labour, that, living and dying, whether present in the body, or absent from the body, we may be accepted of him, the Lord; (v. 9) that we may please him who hath chosen us; that our great Lord may say to us, Well done. This they coveted, as the greatest favour, and the highest honour; it was the top of their ambition.

2. What further quickening motives they had to excite their diligence, from the consideration of the judgment to come, v. 10, 11. There are many things relating to this great matter, that should awe the best of men into the utmost care and diligence in religion; the certainty of this judgment, for we must appear; the universality of it, for we must all appear; the great Judge, before whom we must appear; not the word of Jesus Christ, who himself will appear in flaming fire; the recompense to be then received, for things done in the body; which will be very particular unto every one; and very just, according to what we have done, whether good or bad. The apostle calls this awful judgment the terror of the Lord; (v. 11.) and, by the consideration thereof, was excited to persuade men to repent, and live a holy life, that, when Christ shall appear terribly, they may appear before him and gloriously. And concerning his fidelity and diligence, he comfortably appeals unto God, and the consciences of those he wrote to; We are made manifest unto God, and I trust also are made manifest in your consciences.

12. For we commend not ourselves again unto you, but give you occasion to glory on our behalf, that ye may have somewhat to answer them who glory in appearance, and not in heart. 13. For whether we be beside ourselves, it is to God: or whether we be sober, it is for your cause. 14. For the love of Christ constraineth us; because we thus judge, that if one died for all, then were all dead: 15. And that he died for all, that they who live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto him who died for them, and rose again.

Here observe,

1. The apostle makes an apology for seeming to commend himself and his fellow-labourers; (v. 12.) and tells them, (1.) It was not to commend themselves, or for their own sakes, that he had spoken of their fidelity and diligence in the former verses; nor was he willing to suspect their good opinion of him. But, (2.) The true reason was this, to put an argument in their mouths, wherewith to answer his accusers, who made vain boastings, and gloried in appearances only; that he might give them an occasion to glory on their behalf, or to defend them against the reproaches of their adversaries. And if the people can say that the word has been manifested to their consciences, and been effectual to their conversion and edification, this is the best defence they can make for the ministry of the word, when they are vilified and reproached.

2. He gives good reasons for their great zeal and diligence. Some of Paul's adversaries had, it is likely, reproached him for his zeal and fervour, as if he had been a madman, or, in the language of our days, a fanatic; they imputed all to enthusiasm, as the Roman governor told him, Much learning has made thee mad, Acts 26. 24. But the apostle tells them,

(1.) It was for the glory of God, and the good of the church, that he was thus zealous and industrious; Whether we be beside ourselves, or whether we be sober, whether you or others do think the one or the other, it is to God, and for his glory; and it is for your cause, or to promote your good," v. 13.

If they manifested the greatest ardour and vehemency at some times, and used the greatest calmness in strong reasonings at other times, it was for the best ends; and in both methods they had good reasons for what they did. For,

(2.) The love of Christ constrained them, v. 14. They were under the sweetest and strongest constraints to do what they did. Love has a constraining virtue to excite ministers and private Christians in their duty. Our love to Christ will have this virtue; and Christ's love to us, which was manifested in this great instance of his dying for us, will have this effect upon us, if it be duly considered and rightly judged of. For observe, in the apostle argues, for the reasonableness of love's constraints; and declares,

[1] What we were before, and must have continued to be, had not Christ died for us; We were read, v. 14. If one died for all, then were all dead; dead in laws, under sentence of death; dead in sins and trespasses, spiritually dead. Note, This was the deplorable condition of all those whom Christ died for; they were lost and undone, dead and ruined, and must have remained thus miserable forever, if Christ had not died for them.

[2.] What such should do, for whom Christ died; namely, that they should live to him. This is what Christ designed, that they who live, who are made alive unto God by means of his death, should live to him that died for them, and rose again, for their sakes also, and that they should not live to themselves, v. 15. Note, We should not make ourselves, but Christ, the end of our living and actions; and it was one end of Christ's death, to cure us of this self-love, and to excite us always to act under the commanding influence of his love. A Christian's life should be consecrated to Christ; and then do we live as we ought to live, when we live to Christ, who died for us.

16. Wherefore henceforth know we no man after the flesh: yea, though we have known Christ after the flesh, yet now henceforth know we him no more. 17. Therefore if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature; old things are passed away; behold, all things are become new. 18. And all things are of God, who hath reconciled us to himself by Jesus Christ, and hath given to us the ministry of reconciliation; 19. To wit, that God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them; and hath committed unto us the word of reconciliation. 20. Now then we are ambassadors for Christ; as though God did beseech you by us, we pray you in Christ's stead, Be ye reconciled to God. 21. For he hath made him to be in sin for us, who knew no sin; that we might be made the righteousness of God in him.

In these verses the apostle mentions two things that are necessary in order to our living to Christ, both of which are the consequences of Christ's dying for us—regeneration, and reconciliation.

I. Regeneration, which consists in two things, namely;

1. Weakness from the world; "Henceforth we know no man after the flesh, v. 16. We do not own or affect any person or thing in this world for carnal ends and outward advantage: we are enabled, by divine grace, not to mind or regard this world, or the things of the world, but to live above it. The love of Christ is in our hearts, and the world is under our feet. Note, Good Christians must enjoy the comforts of this life, and their relations in this world, with a holy indifference; Yea, though we have known Christ after the flesh, yet, says the apostle, we know him no more. It is questioned whether Paul had seen Christ in the flesh. However, the rest of the apostles had, and so might some among those he was now writing to. However, he would not have them value themselves upon that account; for even the bodily presence of Christ is not to be desired or coveted upon by his disciples. We must live upon his spiritual presence, and the comfort it affords. Note, Those who make images of Christ, and use them in their worship, do not take the way that God has appointed for strengthening their faith and quickening their affections; for it is the will of God that we should not know Christ any more after the flesh.

2. A thorough change of the heart. For any man be in Christ, if any man be a Christian indeed, and will approve himself such, he is, or he must be, a new creature, v. 17. Some read it, Let him be a new creature. This ought to be the care of all who profess the Christian faith, that they be new creatures; not only that they have a new name, and wear a newivery, but that they have a new heart and new nature. And so great is the grace of God makes in the soul, that, as it follows, old things are passed away, old thoughts, old principles, and old practices, are passed away; and all these things must become new. Note, Regenerating grace creates a new world in the soul; all things are new. The renewed man acts from new principles, by new rules, with new ends, and in new company.

II. Reconciliation; which is here spoken of under a double notion.

1. As an unquestionable privilege, v. 18, 19. Reconciliation supposes a quarrel, or breach of friendship; and sin has made a breach, it has broken the friendship between God and man. The heart of the sinner is filled with enmity against God, and God is justly offended with the sinner. Yet, beyond, there may be a reconciliation; the offended Majesty of heaven is willing to be reconciled. And observe,

(1.) He has appointed the Mediator of reconciliation—Jesus Christ. He has reconciled us to himself by Jesus Christ, v. 18. God is to be owned from first to last in the undertaking and performance of the Mediator. All things relating to our reconciliation by Jesus Christ, are of God, who by the mediation of Jesus Christ has reconciled the world to himself, and put himself into a capacity of being actually reconciled to offenders, without any wrong or injury to his justice or holiness; and does not inffute to men their trespasses, but recedes from the rigour of the first covenant, which was broken, and does not insist upon the advantage he might justly take against us for the breach of that covenant, but is willing to enter into a new treaty, and into a new covenant, or grace, and to forgive us therein, freely to forgive us all our sins, and justly freely by his grace all those who do believe.

(2.) He has appointed the ministry of reconciliation, v. 18. By the inspiration of God the scriptures were written, which contain the word of reconciliation; shewing us that peace was made by the blood of the cross, that reconciliation is wrought, and directing us how we may be interested therein. And observe, God has appointed the office of the ministry, which is a ministry of reconciliation: ministers are to open and proclaim to sinners the terms of mercy and reconciliation, and persuade them to comply therewith. For,

2. Reconciliation is here spoken of as our indispensable duty, v. 20. As God is willing to be reconciled to us, we ought to be reconciled to God. And it is the supreme end and design of the gospel, that word of reconciliation, to prevail upon sinners to lay aside their enmity against God. Faithful ministers are Christ's ambassadors, sent to treat with sinners on peace and reconciliation; they come in God's name, with his entreaties, and act in Christ's stead, doing the very thing he did when he was upon this earth, and what he wills to be done, now he is in heaven. Wonderful, condescending! Though God can be no loser by the quarrel, nor gainer by the peace, yet by his ministers he beseechs sinners to lay aside their enmity, and accept of the terms he offers, that they would be reconciled to him, to all his attributes, to all his laws, and to all his provin-atone ment, and comply with his gospel, in all the parts of it, and in the whole design of it. And for our encouragement so to do, the apostle subjoins what should be well known and duly considered by us, (v. 21.) namely, (1.) The purity of the Mediator; that he knew no sin. (2.) The sacrifice he offered; He was made sin, not a sinner, but Sin, a Sin-offering, a Sacrifice for sin. (3.) The end and design of all this; that we might be made the righteousness of God in him, might be justified freely by the grace of God through the redemption which is in Christ Jesus. Note, [1.] As Christ, who knew no sin of his own, was made Sin for us, so we, who have no righteousness of our own, are made the righteousness of God, through him. Our justification to God is only through Jesus Christ, and for the sake of his merit: on him therefore we must rely, and make mention of his righteousness, and his only.

CHAP. VI.

In this chapter, the apostle gives an account of his general errand and exhortation to all whom he preached to; with the several arguments and methods he used, v. 1–10. Then he addresses himself particularly to the Corinthians, giving them good cautions with great affection and strong arguments, v. 11–18.

1. We then, as workers together with him, beseech you also that ye receive not the grace of God in vain. 2. (For so saith, I have heard thee in a time accepted, and in the day of salvation have I succoured thee: behold, now is the accepted time; behold, now is the day of salvation.) 3. Giving no offence in any thing, that the ministry be not blamed: 4. But in all things approving ourselves as the ministers of God, in much patience, in afflictions, in necessities, in distresses, 5. In stripes, in imprisonments, in tumults, in labours, in watchings, in fastings: 6. By pureness, by knowledge, by long-suffering, by kindness, by the Holy Ghost, by love unfeigned, 7. By the word of truth, by the power of God, by the armour of righteousness on the right hand and on the left, 8. By honour and dishonour, by evil report and good report: as deceivers, and yet true; 9. As unknown, and yet well known; as dying, and, behold, we live; as chastened, and not killed; 10. As sorrowful, yet always rejoicing; as poor, yet making many rich; as having nothing, and yet possessing all things.

In these verses we have an account of the apostle's general errand and exhortation to all whom he preached to, in every place where he came, with the several arguments and methods he used. Observe—

1. The errand or exhortation itself, namely, to comply with the gospel-offers of reconciliation; that, being favoured with the gospel, they would not receive this grace of God in vain, v. 1. The gospel is a word of grace sounding in our ears; but it will be in vain for us to hear it, unless we believe it, and comply with the end and design of it. And as it is the duty of the ministers of the gospel to exhort and persuade their hearers to accept of grace and mercy that are offered to them, so they are how noured with this high title, of co-workers with God. Note, 1. They must work; and must work for God, and his glory; for souls, and their good: and they are workers with God, yet under him, as instruments only; however, if they are faithful, they may hope to find God working with them, and their labour will be successful. Observe the language and way of the spirit of the gospel: it is not with meekness and severity, but with all mildness and gentleness, to beseech and entreat, to use exhortations and arguments, in order to prevail with sinners, and overcome their natural unwillingness to be reconciled to God, and to be happy for ever.

II. The arguments and method which the apostle used. And here he tells them,

1. The present time is the only proper season to accept of grace that is offered, and improve that grace which is afforded; NOW is the accepted time, NOW is the day of salvation, v. 2. The gospel-day is a day of salvation, the means of grace the means of salvation, the offers of the gospel the offers of salvation, and the present time the proper time to accept of these offers; To-day, while it is called to-day. The morrow is none of our's: we know not what we will do on the morrow, nor what we shall be; and we should remember that present seasons of grace are short and uncertain, and cannot be recalled when they are past. It is therefore our duty and interest to improve them while we enjoy them, and no less than our salvation depends upon our so doing.

2. What caution they used not to give offence might hinder the success of their preaching; Giving no offence in any thing, v. 3. The apostle had great difficulty to behave prudently and insensibly toward the Jews and Gentiles, for many of both sorts watched for his halting, and sought occasion to blame him and his ministry, or his conversation; therefore he was very cautious not to give offence to them who were so apt to take offence, that he might not offend the Jews by unnecessary zeal against the law, nor the Gentiles by unnecessary compliances with such as were zealous for the law. He was careful, in all his words and actions, not to give offence, or occasion of guilt or grief. Note, When others are too apt to take offence, we should be cautious lest we give offence; and ministers especially should be careful lest they do any thing that may bring blame on their ministry, or render that unsuccessful.

3. Their constant aim and endowment in all things to approve themselves faithful, as became the ministers of God, v. 4. We see how much stress the apostle upon all occasions lays on fidelity in our work, because much of our success depends upon that. His eye was single, and his heart upright, in all his ministrations; and his great desire was to be the servant of God, and to approve himself so. Note, Ministers of the gospel should look upon themselves as God's servants or ministers, and act in every thing suitable to that character. So did the apostle,

(I.) By much patience in afflictions. He was a great sufferer, and met with many afflictions, often in necessities, and wanting the conveniences, if not the necessities of life; in distresses, being straitened on every side, hardly knowing what to do; in stripes often, (ch. 11. 24.) in imprisonments, in tumults raised by the Jews and Gentiles, in imprisonments; in labours, not only in preaching the gospel, but in travelling from place to place for that end, and working with his hands to supply his necessities; in watchings and in fastings, either voluntary upon a religious account, or involuntary for the sake of religion; but he exercised much patience in all, v. 4, 5. Note, [1.] It is the lot of faithful ministers often to be reduced to great difficulties, and to stand in need of much patience. [2.] Those who would appropriate themselves to God, must approve themselves faithful in trouble as well as in peace, not only in doing the work of God diligently, but also in bearing the will of God patiently.

(2.) By acting from good principles. The apostle went by a good principle in all he did, and tells them what his principles were; [v. 6, 7.] Purity; and there is no pity without purity. A care to keep ourselves unspotted from the world is necessary, or else our acceptance with God. Knowledge was another principle; and zeal without this is but madness. He also acted with long-suffering and kindness; being not easily provoked, but bearing with the hardness of men’s hearts, and hard treatment from their hands, to whom he kindly endeavoured to do good. He acted under the influence of the Holy Ghost, from the noble principle of unspotted love and adoration, “Ye live, the word of truth, under the supports and assistance of the flower of God, having on the armour of righteousness, a consciousness of universal righteousness andholiness; which is the best defence against the temptations of prosperity on the right hand, and of adversity on the left.

(3.) By a due temper and behaviour under all the variety of conditions in this world, v. 8—10. We must expect to meet with many alterations of our circumstances and conditions in this world; and it will be a great evidence of our integrity, if we preserve a right temper of mind, and duly behave ourselves, under them all. The apostles met with honour and dishonour, good report and bad report: good men in this world must expect to meet with some dishonour and reproaches, to balance their honour and esteem; and we stand in need of the grace of God, as against us, against the temptations of honour on the one hand, so as to bear good report without pride; and of dishonour on the other hand, so as to bear reproaches without impatience or re- crimination. It should seem that persons differently represented the apostles in their reports; that some represented them as the best, and others as the worst, of men: by some they were counted deceivers, and by some they were true, by reviling the gospel of truth, and men who were true to the trust reposed in them. They were slighted by the men of the world as unknown, men of no figure or account, not worth taking notice of; yet in all the churches of Christ they were well known, and of great account; they were looked upon as dying, being killed all the day long, and their interest was thought to be a dying interest; “And yet beholdest thou the apostle, “Ye live, and live comfortably, and bear up cheerfully under all our hardships, and go on conquering and to conquer.” They were chastened, and often fell under the lash of the law, yet not killed: and though it was thought that they were sorrowful, a company of moish and melancholy men, always sighing and mourning; yet they were always rejoicing in God, and had the greatest reason to be so. They were despised as floor, upon the account of their poverty in this world; and yet they made many rich, by preaching the unsearchable riches of Christ. They were thought to have nothing, and silver and gold they had none, houses and lands they had none; yet they possessed all things; they had nothing in this world, but they had a treasure in heaven. ’Their effects lay in another country, in another world. They had nothing in themselves, but possessed all things in Christ. Such a paradox is a Christian’s life, and through such a variety of conditions and reports lies our way to heaven; and we should be careful in all these things to approve ourselves to God.

11. O ye Corinthians, our mouth is open unto you, our heart is enlarged. 12. Ye are not straitened in us, but ye are straitened in your own bowels. 13. Now for a recompense in the same, (I speak as unto my children,) be ye also enlarged. 14. Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers: for what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness? And what communion hath light with darkness? 15. And what concord hath the temple of God with idols? For ye are the temple of the living God; as God hath said, I will dwell in them, and walk in them, and I will be their God, and they shall be my people. 17. Wherefore come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing; and I will receive you. 18. And will be a Father unto you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty.

The apostle proceeds to address himself more particularly to the Corinthians, and cautions them against mingling themselves with unbelievers.

Where observe,

I. How the caution is introduced with a profession, in a very pathetic manner, of the most tender affection to them, even like that of a father to his children, v. 11—13. Though the apostle was happy in a great fluency of expressions, yet he seemed to want words how to signifie the warm affections he had for these Corinthians. "O ye Corinthians, to whom I am now writing, I would fain convince you how well I love you; we are desirous to promote the spiritual and eternal welfare of all whom we preach unto, yet our mouth is open unto you, and our heart is enlarged unto you, in a special manner." And because his heart was thus enlarged with love to them, therefore he opened his mouth so freely to them in kind admonitions and exhortations; "Ye are not," says he, "straitened in us; we would gladly do you all the service we can, and promote your comfort, as helpers of your faith and your joy; and if it be otherwise, the fault is in yourselves; it is because ye are straitened in yourselves, and fail in suitable returns to us, through some misapprehensions concerning us; and all we desire, as a recompense, is only that ye would be proportionably affected to us, as children should love their father." Note, It is desirable that there should be a mutual goodwill and affection between ministers and their people, and this would greatly tend to their mutual comfort and advantage.

II. The caution or exhortation itself, not to mingle themselves with unbelievers, not to be unequally yoked with them, v. 14. Either,

1. In stated relations. It is wrong for good people to join in affinity with the wicked and profane; these will draw different conclusions; and that will gull and deceive us. Those relations who are our choice, must be chosen by rule; and it is good for those who are themselves the children of God, to join with those who are so likewise; for there is more danger that the bad will damage the good, than hope that the good will benefit the bad.

2. In common conversation. We should not yoke ourselves in friendship and acquaintance with wicked men and unbelievers. Though we cannot wholly avoid seeing and hearing, and being with, such, yet we should never choose them for our bosom-friends.

3. Much less should we join in religious communion with them; we must not join with them in their idolatrous services, nor concur with them in their false worship, nor any abominations; we must not confound together the table of the Lord and the table of devils; the house of God, and the house of Rimmon. The apostle gives several good reasons against this corrupt mixture.

(1.) It is a very great absurdity, v. 14, 15. It is an unequal yoking of things together, that will not agree together; as bad as for the Jews to have ploughed with an ox and an ass, or to have sown divers sorts of grain intermixed. What an absurdity is it to think of joining righteous and unrighteous, or mingling light and darkness, fire and water, together! Believers are, and should be, righteous; but unbelievers are unrighteous. Believers are made light in the Lord, but unbelievers are in darkness; and what comfortable communion can these have together? Christ and Belial are contrary one to the other; they have opposite interests and designs, so that it is impossible there should be any concord or agreement between them, therefore there is no probability of enlisting under both; and if the believer has part with an infidel, he does what in him lies to bring Christ and Belial together.

(2.) It is a dishonour to the Christian’s profession; v. 16. For Christians are by profession, and should be in reality, the temples of the living God; dedicated to, and employed for, the service of God, who has promised to reside in them, to dwell and walk in them, to stand in a special relation to them, and take a special care of them, that he will be their God, and they shall be his people. Now there can be no agreement between the temple of God and idol’s. Idols are rivals with God for his honour, and God is a jealous God, and will not give his glory to another.

(3.) There is a great deal of danger in communicating with unbelievers and idolaters; danger of being defiled, and of being rejected: therefore the exhortation is, v. 17; to come out from among them, and keep at a due distance; to separate, as one would avoid the society of those who have the leprosy or the plague, for fear of taking infection, and not to touch the unclean thing, lest we are defiled. Who can touch pitch, and not be defiled by it? We must take care not to defile ourselves by converse with those who defile themselves with sin; so the will of God, as we ever hope to be received, and not rejected, by him.

(4.) It is base ingratitude to God for all the favours he has bestowed upon believers, and promised to them, v. 18. God has promised to be a Father to them, and that they shall be his sons and his daughters; and is there a greater honour or happiness than this? But there is a thing more excellent than this, to be such as have this dignity and felicity, should degrade and debase themselves by mingling with unbelievers! Do we thus requite the Lord, O foolish and unwise?

CHAPTER VII

This chapter begins with an exhortation to progressive holiness, and a due regard to the ministers of the gospel, v. 1, 4. Then the apostle returns from a long digression, to speak further of the affair concerning the incestuous person, and tells them what comfort he received in his distress about that affair, upon his meeting with Titus, v. 5, 7. And how he rejoiced in their repentance, with the evidences thereof, v. 8, 11. And lastly, he concludes with endeavouring to comfort the Corinthians, upon whom his admonitions had had so good an effect, v. 12, 16.

HAVING therefore these promises, dearly beloved, let us cleanse our-
of affection to him, v. 3, 4. So tenderly and carefully did the apostle deal with the Corinthians, among whom there were some who would be glad of any occasion to reproach him, and prejudice the minds of others against him. To prevent any insinuations against him on account of what he had said, as if he intended to charge them with wronging him, or unjust accusations of him for having wronged them, he assures them again of his great affection to them, insomuch that he could spend his last breath at Corinth, and live and die with them, if his business with other churches, and his work as an apostle, (which was not to be confined to one place only,) would permit him to do so. And he adds, it was his great affection to them, that made him use such boldness or freedom of speech toward them, and caused him to glory, or make his boasts of them, in all places, and upon all occasions, being filled with comfort, and exceeding joyful in all their tribulations.

5. For, when we were come into Macedonia, our flesh had no rest, but we were troubled on every side; without were fightings, within were fears. 6. Nevertheless God, that comforted those that are cast down, comforted us by the coming of Titus; 7. And not by his coming only, but by the consolation wherewith he was comforted in you, when he told us your earnest desire, your mourning, your fervent mind toward me; so that I rejoiced the more. 8. For though I made you sorry with a letter, I do not repent, though I did repent: for I perceive that the same epistle hath made you sorry, though it were but for a season. 9. Now I rejoice, not that ye were made sorry, but that ye sorrowed to repentance: for ye were made sorry, after a godly manner, that ye might receive damage by us in nothing. 10. For godly sorrow worketh repentance to salvation not to be repented of: but the sorrow of the world worketh death. 11. For behold this selfsame thing, that ye sorrowed after a godly sort, what carefulness it wrought in you, yea, what clearing of yourselves, yea, what indignation, yea, what fear, yea, what vehement desire, yea, what zeal, yea, what revenge! In all things ye have approved yourselves to be clear in this matter.

There seems to be a connexion between ch. 2. 13. (where the apostle said he had no rest in his spirit when he found not Titus at Troas) and the fifth verse of this chapter: and so great was his affection to the Corinthians, and his concern about their behaviour in relation to the incestuous person, that, in his further travels, he still had no rest till he heard from them. And now he tells them, How he was distressed, v. 12. He was troubled when he did not meet with Titus at Troas, and afterward when for some time he did not meet with him in Macedonia: this was a grief to him, because he could not hear what reception he met with at Corinth, or how their affairs went forward. And beside this, they met with other troubles, with incessant storms of persecutions; there were fightings without, or continual contentions with, and opposition from, Jews and Gentiles; and there were fears within, and great concern for such as had embraced the Christian faith, lest they should be corrupted or seduced, and give scandal to others, or be scandalized.

II. How he was comforted, v. 6, 7. Where observe, 1. The very coming of Titus was some comfort to him. It was matter of joy to see him, whom he long desired and expected to meet with. The very coming of Titus, and his company, was clear to him as his own son in the common faith, (Tit. 1. 4.) was a great comfort to the apostle in his travels and troubles. But, 2. The good news which Titus brought concerning the Corinthians, was matter of greater consolation. He found Titus to be comforted in them; and this filled the apostle with comfort, especially when he acquainted him with their earnest desire to give good satisfaction in the things about. The offender had great sorrow, he was and of their mourning for the scandal that was found among them, and the great grief they had caused to others; and their fervent mind or great affection toward the apostle, who had dealt so faithfully with them in reproving their faults. So true is the observation of Solomon, (Prov. 28. 23.) He that rebuketh a man, afterward shall find more favour than he that flattereth with his tongue. 3. He confesses all his labour and toil to be nothing, to God who comforted him by the coming of Titus, even the God of all comfort; God, who comforteth them that are cast down, v. 6. Note, We should look above and beyond all means and instruments, unto God, as the Author of all the consolation and the good that we enjoy.

III. How greatly he was rejoiced at their repentance, and the evidences thereof. The apostle was so happy that he had grieved them, that some pious persons among them laid to heart very greatly what he said in his former epistle, or that it was needful he should make them sorry, whom he had rather have made glad, v. 8. But now he rejoiced, when he found they had sorrowed to repentance, v. 9. Their sorrow in itself was not the cause of his rejoicing; but the nature of it, and the effect of it, (repentance unto salvation, v. 10.) made him rejoice; for now it appeared that they had received damage by him in nothing; their sorrow was but for a season; it was turned into joy, and that joy was durable. Observe here, 1. The antecedent of true repentance is godly sorrow, that worketh repentance. It is not repentance itself, but it is a good preparation to repentance, and in some sense the cause that produces repentance; and proper effect of it, (repentance unto salvation, v. 10.) 2. Godly sorrow is, because a sorrow for sin, as an offence against God, an instance of ingratitude, and a forfeiture of God's favour. There is a great difference between this sorrow of a godly sort, and the sorrow of this world. Godly sorrow produces repentance and reformation, and will end in salvation; but worldly sorrow worketh death. The sorrows of worldly men for worldly things, will bring down grey hairs the sooner to the grave; and such a sorrow even for sin as Judas, will have fatal consequences. 3. Humiliation and godly sorrow are previously necessary in order to repentance, and both of them are from God, the Giver of all grace.

2. The happy fruits and consequences of true repentance are mentioned; (v. 11.) and those fruits that are meet for repentance, are the best evidences of it; where the heart is changed, the life and actions are changed too. The Corinthians made it evident that their sorrow was a godly sorrow, and such as wrought repentance, because it wrought in them great carefulness about their souls, and to avoid sin, and please God; it wrought also a clearing of themselves, not by insisting upon their own justification before God, especially while they persisted in their sin, but by endeavours to put away the accursed thing, and so free themselves from the just imputation of approving the evil that had been done. It wrought indignation at sin, at themselves, at the tempter and his instruments; it wrought fear, a fear of reversion, a fear of watchfulness, and a fear of distrust; not a distrust of God, but of themselves; an awful fear of God, a cautious fear of sin, and a jealous fear of themselves. It wrought vehement desire after a thorough reformation of what had been amiss, and of reconciliation with God whom they had offended. It wrought zeal, a mixture of love and anger, a zeal for duty, and against sin. It wrought, lastly, revenge against sin and their own folly, by endeavours to make all due satisfaction for injuries that might be done thereby. And thus in all things had they approved themselves to be clear in that matter. Not that they were innocent, but that they were penitent, and therefore clear of guilt before God, who would pardon and not punish them; and they ought no longer to be reproved, much less to be reproved, by men, for what they had truly repented of.

12. Wherefore, though I wrote unto you, I did it not for his cause that had done the wrong, nor for his cause that suffered wrong, but that our care for you in the sight of God might appear unto you. 13. Therefore we were comforted in your comfort: yea, and exceedingly the more joyful we were for the joy of Titus, because his spirit was refreshed by you all. 14. For if I have boasted any thing to him of you, I am not ashamed; but as we spake all things to you in truth, even so our boasting, which I made before Titus, is found a truth. 15. And his inward affection is more abundant toward you, while he remembereth the obedience of you all, how with fear and trembling ye received him. 16. I rejoice, therefore, that I have confidence in you in all things.

In these verses the apostle endeavours to comfort the Corinthians, upon whom his admonitions had so good an effect. And in order thereto.

1. He tells them, he had a good design in his former epistle, which might be thought severe, v. 12. It was not chiefly for his cause that did the wrong, nor for his cause that suffered wrong, namely, the injured father, and that he might have what satisfaction could be given him; but it was also to manifest his great and sincere concern and care for them, the whole church, lest that should suffer by letting such a crime, and the scandal thereof, remain among them without due remark and resentment.

2. He acquaints them with the joy of Titus as well as of himself, upon the account of their repentance and good behaviour. Titus was rejoiced, and his spirit refreshed, with their comfort, and this comforted and rejoiced the apostle also; (v. 13.) and as Titus was comforted while he was with them, so when he remembered his reception among them, expressing their liberal kindness, and their bold and direct directions, and their fear and trembling at the reproofs that were given them, the thoughts of these things inflamed and increased his affections to them, v. 15. Note, Great comfort and joy follow upon godly sorry. As sin occasions general grief, so repentance and reformation occasion general joy. Paul was glad, and Titus was glad, and the Corinthians were glad; and the rented ought to be comforted; and well may all the joy be out of earth, when there is joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth.

3. He concludes this whole matter with expressing the entire confidence he had in them; He was not ashamed of his boasting concerning them to Titus: (v. 14.) for he was not disappointed in his expectation concerning them, which he signified to Titus; and he could now with great joy declare what confidence he still had in them, as to their work, that he did not doubt of their good behaviour for the time to come. Note, It is a great comfort and joy to a faithful minister, to have to do with a people whom he can confide in, and whom he has reason to hope will comply with every thing he proposes to them, that is for the glory of God, the credit of the gospel, and their advantage.

CHAP. VIII.

In this and the following chapter, Paul is exhorting and directing the Corinthians about a particular work of charity—to relieve the necessities of the poor saints at Jerusalem and in Judæa, according to the good example of the churches in Macedonia, Rom. 15. 26. The Christians at Jerusalem, through war, famine, and persecution, were grown poor, many of them fallen into decay, and perhaps most of them were but poor when they first embraced Christianity; for Christ said, The poor receive the gospel. Now Paul, though he was the apostle of the Gentiles, had a tender regard, and kind concern, for those among the Jews, whom he converted in his mission-field; and though many of them had not so much affection to the Gentiles converts as they ought to have, yet the apostle would have the Gentiles to be kind to them, and stirred them up to contribute liberally for their relief. Upon this subject he is very large and copious, and writes very affectingly. In this eighth chapter he acquaints the Corinthians with, and commends, the good example of the Macedonians in this work of charity, and that Titus was sent to Corinth to collect their bounty, v. 1. &c. He then proceeds to urge this duty with several cogent arguments, (v. 7. &c.) and commends the persons who were employed in this affair, v. 16. &c.

1. Moreover, brethren, we do you to wit of the grace of God bestowed on the churches of Macedonia; 2. How that, in a great trial of affliction, the abundance of their joy and their deep poverty abounded unto the riches of their liberality. 3. For to their power, I bear record, yea, and beyond their power, they were willing of themselves; 4. Praying us with much entreaty that we would receive the gift, and take upon us the fellowship of the ministering to the saints. 5. And this they did, not as we hoped, but first gave their own selves to the Lord, and unto us by the will of God. 6. Insomuch that we desired Titus, that as he had begun, so he would also finish it you the same grace also.
II. CORINTHIANS, VIII.

Observe here,
I. The apostle takes occasion from the good example of the churches of Macedonia, that is, of Philippi, Thessalonica, Berea, and others in the region of Macedonia, to exhort the Corinthians and the Christians in Achaia to the good work of charity.

And,
1. He acquaints them with their great liberality, which he calls the grace of God bestowed on the church, v. 1. Some think the words should be rendered, the gift of God given in or by the churches. He certainly means the charitable gifts of these churches, which are called the grace or gifts of God either because they were very large, or rather because their charity to the poor saints did proceed from God as the Author, and was accompanied with true love to God, which, in this way, the grace of God must be owned as the root and fountain of all the good that is in us, or done by us at any time; and it is great grace and favour from God and bestowed on us, if we are made useful to others, and are forward to any good work.

2. He commends the charity of the Macedonians, and sets it forth with good advantage. He tells them, (1.) They were but in a low condition, and themselves in distress; yet they contributed more than the rich of Thessalonica, and other places in the region of Macedonia, and Greece. The grace of God must be owned as the root and fountain of all the good that is in us, or done by us at any time; and it is great grace and favour from God and bestowed on us, if we are made useful to others, and are forward to any good work.

(2.) They gave very largely, with the riches of liberality, (v. 2.) that is, as liberally as if they had been rich. It was a large contribution they made, all things considered; it was according to, yea beyond, their power, (v. 3.) as much, if not more than could well be expected from them. Note, Though men may condemn the indigence, yet God will accept the pious zeal of those, who in real works of piety and charity do rather beyond their power.

(3.) They were very ready and forward to this good work. They were willing of themselves, (v. 3.) and were so far from needing that Paul should urge and press them with many arguments, that they prayed him with much entreaty to receive the gift, v. 4. It seems Paul was backward to undertake this trust, for he would give himself to the word and prayer; or, it may be, he was apprehensive how ready his enemies would be to reproach and blacken him upon all occasions, and might take a hand against him upon account of so large a sum deposited in his hands, to suspect or accuse him of indigence and partiality in the distribution, if not of some injustice. Note, How cautious ministers should be, especially in money-matters, not to give occasion to them who seek occasion to speak reproachfully!

(4.) Their charity was founded in true piety, and the exhortation of the apostle, that is, their mind to it, they forming this good work in a right method; first they gave themselves to the Lord, and then they gave unto us their contributions, by the will of God, (v. 5.) that is, according as it was the will of God they should do, or to be disposed of as the will of God should be, and for his glory. This, it seems, exceeded the expectation of the apostle; it was more than he hoped for, to see such warm and pious affection shining in these Macedonians, and this good work performed with so much devotion and solemnity. They solemnly, jointly, and unanimously, made a fresh surrender of themselves, and all they had, unto the Lord Jesus Christ. They had done this before, and now they do it again upon this occasion; sanctifying their contributions to do God honour, by first giving themselves to the Lord.

II. The apostle tells them that Titus was desired to go and make a collection among them; (v. 6.) and Titus, he knew, would be an acceptable person to them. He had met with a kind reception among them formerly; they had shown good affection to him, and he had a great love for them. Besides, Titus had already begun this work among them, therefore he was desired to finish it. So that he was, on all accounts, a proper person to be employed; and when so good a work had already prospered in so good a hand, it would be pity if it should not proceed and be finished. Note, It is an instance of wisdom, to use proper instruments in a work we desire to do well; and the work of charity will often succeed the best, when the most proper persons are employed to ask for it, and dispose of it.

7. Therefore, as ye abound in every thing, in faith, and utterance, and knowledge, and in all diligence, and in your love to us, see that ye abound in this grace also. 8. I speak not by commandment, but by occasion of the forwardness of others, and to prove the sincerity of your love. 9. For ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that, though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor, that ye through his poverty might be rich. 10. And herein I give my advice: for this is expedient for you, who have begun before, not only to do, but also to be forward a year ago. 11. Now therefore perform the doing of it; that as there was a readiness to will, so there may be a performance also out of that which ye have. 12. For if there be first a willing mind, it is accepted according to that a man hath, and not according to that he hath not. 13. For I mean not that other men be eased, and you be burdened: 14. But by an equality, that now at this time your abundance may be a supply for their want, that their abundance also may be a supply for your want; that there may be equality: 15. As it is written, He that had gathered much had nothing over; and he that had gathered little had no lack.

In these verses the apostle uses several cogent arguments to stir up the Corinthians to this good work of charity.

1. He urges upon them the consideration of their example in other gifts and graces, and would have them excel in this of charity also, v. 7. Great address and much holy art are here used by the apostle, when he would persuade the Corinthians to this good thing. He commends them for other good things that were found in them. Most people love to be accosted kindly, especially when we ask a gift of them for ourselves, or others; and it is a justice
II. CORINTHIANS, VIII. 495

we owe to those in whom God’s grace shines, to give them their due commendation. Observe here, what it was that the Corinthians abounded in. Faith is mentioned first, for that is the root; and as without faith it is impossible to please God, (Heb. 11. 6.) so they who do abound in faith, will abound in other graces and good works also; and this will work and shew itself by love. To their faith was added utterance, which is an excellent gift, and redounds much to the glory of God, and the good of the church. Many have faith, but not utterance. But these Corinthians excelled most churches in spiritual gifts, and particularly in utterance; and yet this was not in them, as in too many, both the effect and evidence of ignorance; for with their utterance there appeared knowledge, abundance of knowledge. They had a treasury of things new and old, and in their utterance they brought out of this treasury. They abounded also in all diligence. Often, these who have grace, but not utterance, and who have good performances, are not the most diligent Christians. Great talkers are not always the best doers; but these Corinthians were diligent to do, as well as know, and talk well. And further, they had abundant love to their ministers; and were not like too many, who, having gifts of their own, are but too apt to slight their ministers, and neglect them. Now to all these good things the apostle desires them to add the love of brotherly kindness; for this was found in charity to the poor: that, where so much good was found, there should be found yet more good.

Before the apostle proceeds to another argument, he takes care to prevent any misapprehensions of his design to impose on them, or to bind heavy burdens upon them by his authority; and tells them, (v. 8.) he did not speak by commandment, or in a way of authority; I give my advice, v. 10. He took occasion of the abundance of gifts which was in them, to shew what would be expedient for them, and would prove the sincerity of their love, or be the genuine effect and evidence thereof. Note, A great difference should be made between plain and positive duty, and the improvement of a present opportunity of doing or getting good. Many a thing which is good for us to do, yet cannot be said to be, by express and indispensable commandment, our duty at this or that time of year.

II. Another argument is taken from the consideration of the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ. The best arguments for Christian duties are those that are taken from the love of Christ, that constraineth us. The example of the churches of Macedonia was such as the Corinthians should imitate: but the example of our Lord Jesus Christ should have much greater weight with them. This was the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ; (v. 9.) that, though he was rich, as being God, equal in power and glory with the Father, rich in all the glory and blessedness of the upper world, yet for your sakes he became poor; not only did become Man for us, but he became poor also. He was born in poor circumstances, lived a poor life, and died in poverty; and this was for our sakes, that we thereby might be made rich; rich in the love and favour of God; rich in the blessings and promises of the new covenant; rich in the hopes of eternal life, being heirs of the kingdom. This is a good reason why we should be charitable to the poor out of what we have, because we ourselves live upon the charity of the Lord Jesus Christ.

III. Another argument is taken from their good purposes, and their forwardness to begin this good work. As to this he tells them,

1. It was expedient for them to perform what they purposed, and finish what they had begun, v. 10, 11. What else did their good purposes and good beginnings signify? Good purposes, indeed, are good things; they are like buds and blossoms, pleasant to behold, and give hopes of good fruit; but they are lost, and signify nothing, without performances. So good beginnings are amiable; but we shall lose the benefit, unless there be perseverance, and we bring forth fruit to perfection. Seeing therefore the Corinthians had shewed a readiness to will, he would have them be careful also in the performance, according to their ability. For,

2. This would be acceptable to God. This willing mind is accepted, (v. 12.) when accompanied with sincere endeavours. When men purpose that which is good, and endeavour, according to their ability, to perform also, God will accept of what they have, or can do, and not reject them for what they have not, and is not in their power to do: and this is true as to other things, beside the work of charity. But let us note here, that this scripture will by no means justify those who think good meanings are enough, or are able to excuse each and the professors of a good mind, are sufficient to save them. It is accepted, indeed, where there is a performance as far as we are able, and when Providence hinders the performance, as in David’s case, concerning building a house for the Lord, 2 Sam. 7.

IV. Another argument is taken from the discrimination which Divine Providence makes, in the distribution of the things of this world, and the multitude of persons, to quarrel here, v. 13, 14. The substance of the arguing seems to be this; Providence gives to some more of the good things of this world, and to some less, and that with this design; that those who have a greater abundance, might supply those who are in want, that there might be room for charity. And further, considering the mutability of human affairs, and how soon there may be an alteration, so that those who now have an abundance may stand in need of others supplied to them in their want, this should induce them to be charitable while they are able. It is the will of God, by our mutual supplying one another, that there should be some sort of equality; not an absolute equality indeed, or such a levelling as would destroy property, for in such a case there could be no exercise of charity. But, as in works of charity there should be an equitable proportion observed, that the burlthen should not lie too heavily on some, or others wholly eased; so all should think themselves concerned to supply those who are in want. This is illustrated by the instance of gathering and distributing manna in the wilderness, concerning which (as we may read, Exod. 16.) it was the duty of every family, and all in the family, to gather what they could; which, when it was gathered, was put into some common receptacle, and communicated to each family, hence the members of the family distributed to every one as he had occasion; to some, more than they were able, through age and infirmity, to gather up; to others, less than they gathered, because they did not need so much: and thus he that gathered much, (more than he had occasion for,) had nothing over, when a communication was made to him that had gathered little, who by this method had no lack. Note, Such is the exhibition of God’s providence in this world, that we mutually depend on one another, and should help one another; those who have ever so much of this world, have no more than food and raiment; and those who have but a little of this world, seldom want those; nor, indeed, should those who have abundance suffer others to want, but be ready to afford supply.

16. But thanks be to God, who put the same earnest care into the heart of Titus for you. 17. For indeed he accepted the exhortation; but being more forward, of his own accord he went unto you. 18. And we have sent with him the brother, whose praise is in the gospel throughout all the churches; 19. And not that only, but who was also chosen of the churches to travel with us with this grace, which is administered by us to the glory of the same Lord, and declaration of your ready mind: 20. Avoiding this, that no man should blame us in the abundance which is administered by us: 21. Providing for honest things, not only in the sight of the Lord, but also in the sight of men. 22. And we have sent with them our brother, whom we have oftentimes proved diligent in many things, but now much more diligent, upon the great confidence which I have in you. 23. Whether any do inquire of Titus, he is my partner and fellow-helper concerning you: or our brethren be inquired of, they are the messengers of the churches, and the glory of Christ. 24. Wherefore shew ye to them, and before the churches, the proof of your love, and of our boasting on your behalf.

In these verses the apostle commends the brethren who were sent to them to collect their charity; and, as it were, gives them letters credential, that, if they were inquired after, (v. 23.) if any should be injudicious or suspicious concerning them, it might be known who they were, and how safely they might be trusted.

1. He commends Titus, (1.) For his earnest care and great concern of heart for them, and desire in all things to promote their welfare. This is mentioned with thankfulness to God; (v. 16.) and it is cause of thankfulness, if God hath put into the hearts of any to do us or others any good. (2.) For his readiness to this present service. He accepted of the office, and was forward to go upon this good errand, v. 17. Asking of charity for the relief of others, is by many looked upon as a thankless office; yet it is a good office, and what we should not shy of when we are called to it.

2. He commends another brother, who was sent with Titus. It is generally thought that this was Luke. He is commended, (1.) As a man whose praise was in the gospel throughout all the churches, v. 18. His ministerial services of several kinds were well known, and he had approved himself: raise-worthy in what he had done. (2.) As one chosen of the churches, (v. 19.) and joined with the apostle in his ministration. This was done, it is most likely, at the motion and request of Paul himself; for this reason, that no man might blame him in that about which he had written, as it might be administered by him, v. 20. So cautious was the apostle to avoid all occasions that evil-minded men might lay hold on to blacken him. He would not give occasion to any to accuse him of injustice or partiality in this affair: and thought it to be his duty, as it is the duty of all Christians, to provide for things honest, not only in the sight of the Lord, but also in the sight of men; to act so prudently as to prevent, as far as we can, all that might suspiciously concerning us, and all occasions of scandalous imputations. Note, We live in a censorious world, and should cut off occasion from them who seek occasion to speak reproachfully. It is the crime of others, if they reproach or censure us without occasion; and it is our imprudence at least, if we give them any occasion, when there may not be a just cause for them so to do.

3. He commends also another brother who was joined with the two former in this affair. This brother is thought to be Apollos. Whoever he was, he had approved himself diligent in many things; and therefore was fit to be employed in this affair. Moreover, he had a great desire to this work, because of the confidence or good opinion he bad of the Corinthians; (v. 22.) and it is a great comfort to see those employed in good works, who have formerly approved themselves diligent.

4. He concludes this point with a general good character of them all, (v. 23.) as fellow-labourers with him for their welfare; as the messengers of the churches; as the glory of Christ, who were to him for a name and a praise, who brought glory to Christ in their instruments, and had obtained honor to be counted faithful, and employed in his service. Wherefore, upon the whole, he exhorts them to shew their liberality, answerable to the great expectation others had concerning them at this time; that these messengers of the churches, and the churches themselves, might see a full proof of their love to God, and to their afflicted brethren; and that it was not a good thing for the apostle had even boasted on their behalf, v. 24. Note, The good opinion others entertain of us, should be an argument with us to do well.

CHAP. IX.

In this chapter, the apostle seems to excuse his earnestness in pressing the Corinthians to the duty of charity; (v. 1. 5.) and proceeds to give directions about the acceptable way and manner of performing it, that is, bountifully, deliberately, and freely; and gives good encouragement for so doing, v. 6, to the end.

1. For as touching the ministering to the saints, it is superfluous for me to write to you. 2. For I know the forwardness of your mind, for which I boast of you to them of Macedonia, that Achaia was ready a year ago; and your zeal hath provoked very many. 3. Yet have I sent the brethren, lest our boasting of you should be in vain in this behalf; that, as I said, ye may be ready: 4. Lest haply if they of Macedonia come with me, and find you unprepared, we (that we say not, ye) should be ashamed in this same confident boasting. 5. Therefore I thought it necessary to exhort the brethren, that they would go before unto you, and make up beforehand your bounty, whereof ye had notice before, that the same might be ready, as a matter of bounty, and not as of covetousness.

In these verses the apostle speaks very respectfully to the Corinthians, and with great skill; and, while he seems to excuse his urging them so earnestly to charity, still presses them thereto, and shews how much his heart was set upon this matter. 1. He tells them it was not without imputation to press them with further exhortations to afford relief to their poor brethren, (v. 1.) being satisfied he had said enough already to prevail with them, of whom he had so good an opinion. For, (1.) He knew their forwardness to every good work, and how they had begun this good work a year ago. Insomuch, that, (2.) He had boasted of their zeal to the Macedonians, and this had provoked many of them to do as they had done. Wherefore he was persuaded, that, as they had begun well, they would go on well; and so, con-

mending them for what they had done, he lays an obligation on them to proceed and persevere.

2. He seems to apologize for sending Titus and the other brethren to them. He is unwilling they should be offended at him for this, as if he was too earnest, and pressed too hard upon them; and tells the true reasons why he sent them, namely,

(1.) That, having this timely notice, they might be fully ready, (v. 3.) and not surprised with hasty demands, when he should come to them. When we would have other men to do that which is good, we must act toward them prudently and tenderly, and give them time.
(2.) That he might not be ashamed of his boasting concerning them, if they should be found unready, v. 3, 4. He intimates that some from Macedonia might hastily come with him: and if the collection should not then be made, this would make him, not to say them, ashamed, considering the boasting of the apostle concerning them. Thus careful was he to preserve their reputation and his own. Note, Christians should consult the reputation of their profession, and endeavour to adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour.

6. But this I say, He who soweth sparingly shall reap also sparingly; and he who soweth bountifully shall reap also bountifully. 7. Every man according as he purposed in his heart, so let him give; not grudgingly, or of necessity: for God loveth a cheerful giver. 8. And God is able to make all grace abound toward you; that ye, always having all sufficiency in all things, may abound to every good work:
9. (As it is written, He hath dispersed abroad: he hath given to the poor: his righteousness remaineth for ever. 10. Now he that ministereth seed to the sower, both minister bread for your food, and multiply your seed sown, and increase the fruits of your righteousness:)
11. Being enriched in every thing to all bountifulness, which causeth through us thanksgiving to God.
12. For the administration of this service not only supplieth the want of the saints, but is abundant also by many thanksgivings unto God; 13. While by the experiment of this administration they glory God for your professed subjection unto the gospel of Christ, and for your liberal distribution unto them, and unto all men; 14. And by their prayer for you, which long after you for the exceeding grace of God in you. 15. Thanks be unto God for his unspeakable gift.

Here we have,

I. Proper directions to be observed about the right and acceptable manner of bestowing charity; and it is of great concernment, that we do what is required, as is commanded. Now, as to the manner in which the apostle would have the Corinthians give, observe,

1. It should be bountifully; this was intimated, v. 5. that a liberal contribution was expected, a manifesting bountifulness. 2. It should be cheerfully, not what savoured of covetousness; and he offers to their consideration, that men who expect a good return at harvest, are not wont to pinch and spare in sowing their seed, for the return usually is proportionable to what they sow, v. 6.
2. It should be deliberately; Every man, according as he purposeth in his heart, v. 7. Works of charity, like other good works, require forethought and design; whereas, some do good only by accident; they comply, it may be hastily, with the importunity of others, without any good design, and give more than they intended, and then repent of it afterward; or possibly, had they duly considered all things, they would have given more. Due deliberation, as to this matter of our own circumstances, and of those of them we are about to relieve, will be very helpful to others that do, or shall, take us in their contributions for charitable uses.
3. It should be freely, whatever we give, be it more or less: not grudgingly, or of necessity, but cheerfully, v. 7. Persons sometimes will give merely to satisfy the importunity of those who ask their charity, and what they give is in a manner squeezed or forced from them, and this unwillingness spoils all they do. We ought to give more freely than the modesty of some necessitous persons will allow them to ask: we should not only deal handsomely, but draw out our souls to the hungry, Isa. 33. v. 10. We should give liberally, with an open hand, and cheerfully, with an open countenance; being glad we have ability, and an opportunity, to be charitable.

II. Good encouragement to perform this work of charity in the manner thus directed to. Here the apostle tells the Corinthians,

1. They shall not be losers by what they gave in charity. This may serve to obviate a secret objection in the minds of many against this good work, who are ready to think they may want what they give away: but such should consider that what is given to the poor in a right manner, is far from being lost; as the precious seed, which is cast into the ground, is not lost, though it is buried there for a time; for it will spring up, and bear fruit; the fruit it shall bring in, and a hundred-fold increase, v. 6. Such good returns may they expect, who give freely and liberally in charity. For,

(1.) God loveth a cheerful giver; (v. 7.) and what may not they hope to receive, who are the objects of the divine love? Can a man be a loser by doing that with which God is pleased? May not such a one be sure that he shall some way or other be a gainer? Nay, are not the love and favour of God better than all things on earth? And shall he not increase in all that he doeth, v. 7. and 9. Hence it follows,

(2.) God is able to make our charity redound to our advantage, v. 8. We have no reason to distrust the goodness of God, and surely we have no reason to question his power; he is able to make all grace abound towards us, and to abound in us; to give a large increase of spiritual and temporal good things. He can make us to have a sufficiency in all things; to be content with what we have; to make up what we lack; to make us able to give yet more: as it is written, (Ps. 112. 9.) concerning the charitable man, He hath dispersed abroad. He hath given to the poor. His righteousness, that is, his almsgiving, endureth for ever. The honour of it is lasting, the reward of it eternal, and he is still able to live comfortably himself, and to give liberally to others.

(3.) The apostle puts up a prayer to God in their behalf, that they might be gainers, and not losers, v. 10, 11. Wherever an overseer is made, to God, who ministereth seed to the sower, who by his providence giveth such an increase of the fruits of the earth, that we have not only bread sufficient to eat for one year, but enough to sow again for a future supply: or thus, It is God who giveth us not only a competency for ourselves, but that also wherewith we may supply the wants of others, and so should be as seed to be sown. [2.] For what he praveth there are several things which he desires for them, namely, that they may have bread for their food; always a good competency for themselves, food convenient; that God would multiply their seed own, that they might still be able to do more good; and that there might be an increase of the fruits of righteousness, that they might reap plentifully, and have the best and most ample returns of their charity. And God gave them every thing to all blessings, (v. 11.) that upon the whole they may find it true that they shall be no losers, but great gainers. Note, Works of charity are so far from impoverishing us, that they are the proper means truly to enrich us, and make us truly rich.
2. The poor distrest saints would be gainers, and they would be no losers: for this service would supply their wants, v. 12. If we have reason to think that God will, and does, answer their prayers, we may say it, of the household of faith, whose wants are great; how ready should we be to do them good! Our goodness cannot extend unto God, but we should freely extend it to these excellent ones of the earth, and thus shew that we delight in them.
3. This would redound to the praise and glory of God. Many thanksgivings would be given to God on this account to the apostle, and by them who were employed in this ministration, v. 11. These would bless God, who made them happy instruments in so good a work, and made them successful in it. Beside these, others also would be thankful; the poor, who were supplied in their wants, would not fail to be very thankful to God, and bless God for them; and all who wished well to the gospel would glorify God for this experiment, or proof of subjection to the gospel of Christ, and true love to all men,
v. 12.
Note, (1.) True Christianity is a subjection to the gospel, a yielding ourselves to the commanding influence of its truths and laws.
(2.) We must evidence the sincerity of our subjection to the gospel, by works of charity.
(3.) This will be for the credit of our profession, and to the praise and glory of God.
(4.) The while we were supplied, we should make the best returns they were able, by sending up many prayers to God for those who had relieved them, v. 14. And thus should we recompense the kindnesses we receive, when we are not in a capacity of recompensing them any other way; and as this is the only recompense the poor can make, so it is often greatly for the advantage of the rich.
Lastly, The apostle concludes this whole matter with this exhortation, In sincerity of heart, thanks be to God for his unspeakable gift, v. 15. Some think, by this unspeakable gift he means the gift of grace bestowed on the churches, in making them able and willing to supply the necessities of the saints, which would be attended with unspeakable benefit both to the givers and receivers. It should seem rather, that he means Jesus Christ, who is indeed the unspeakable Gift of God unto this world; a gift we have all reason to be very thankful for.

CHAP. X.

There was no place in which the apostle Paul met with more opposition from false apostles than at Corinth; he had many enemies there. Let not any of the ministers of Christ think strange, if they meet with perils, not only from eneemies, but from false brethren; for blessed Paul himself did so. Though he was so blameless and innocent in all his caracter, yet his enemies, being persecuting and seducing yet there were those who bore him ill-will, who envied him, and did tall they could to undermine him, and lessen his interest and reputation. Therefore he vindicates himself from their imputations, and sets forth his apostleship against their institutions. In this chapter, the apostle, in a mild and humble manner, asserts the power of his preaching, and to punish offenders, v. 1...6. He then proceeds to reason the case with the Corinthians, asserting his relation to Christ, and his authority as an apostle of Christ; (v. 7...11.) and refuses to justify himself, or to act by such rules, as the false teachers did, but according to the better rules he had fixed for himself, v. 12, to the end.

1. Now I Paul myself beseech you by the meekness and gentleness of Christ, who in presence am base among you, but being absent am bold toward you:
2. But I beseech you, that I may not be bold when I am present with that confidence wherewith I think to be bold against some, who think of us as if we walked according to the flesh. 3. For though we walk in the flesh, we do not war after the flesh: 4. (For the weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty through God to the pulling down of strong-holds;) 5. Cast-ning down imaginations, and every high thing that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God, and bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ: 6. And having in a readiness to revenge all disobedience, when your obedience is fulfilled.

Here we may observe,
1. The mild and humble manner in which the blessed apostle addresses the Corinthians, and how desires he is that no occasion might be given him to use severity.
2. He addresses himself in a very mild and humbble manner; I Paul myself beseech you, v. 1. We find, in the introduction to this epistle, he joined himself with himself; but now he speaks only for himself, against whom the false apostles had particularly levelled their reproaches; yet in the midst of the greatest provocations he shewed humility and mildness, from the consideration of the meekness and gentleness of Christ, and desires this great example might have the same influence on the Corinthians.
Note, When we find ourselves tempted or inclined to be rough and severe towards any body, we should think of the meekness and gentleness of Christ, that appeared in him in the days of his flesh, in the design of his undertaking, and in all the acts of his grace toward poor souls. How humbly also does this great apostle speak of himself, as one in presence base among them! So his enemies spake of him with contempt, and this he seems to acknowledge; while others thought meanly, and spoke scornfully of him, he had thoughts of himself, and spoke humbly of himself. Note. We should be sensible of our own infirmities, and think humbly of ourselves, even when men reproach us for them.
3. He is desirous that no occasion might be given to use severity, v. 2. He beseeches them to give no occasion for him to be bold, or to exercise his authority against them in general, as he had resolved to do against some who unjustly charged him as making war against the flesh, that is, regulating his conduct, even in his ministerial actions, according to carnal policy, or with worldly views. This was what the apostle had renounced, and this is contrary to the spirit and design of the gospel, and was far from being the aim and design of the apostle. Hereupon, II. He asserts the power of his preaching, and to punish offenders.
1. The power of his preaching, v. 3—5. Where observe, (1.) The work of the ministry is a warfare, not after the flesh indeed, for it is a spiritual warfare with spiritual enemies, and for spiritual purposes.
And though ministers walk in the flesh, or live in the body, and in the common affairs of life act (is other men, yet in their work and warfare they must not go by the maxims of the flesh, nor should they design to please the flesh; that must be crucified with its affections and lusts; it must be mortified and kept under. (2.) The doctrines of the gospel and discipline of the church are the weapons of this warfare; and these are not carnal: outward force, therefore, is not the method of the gospel, but strong persuasions, by the power of truth, and the meekness of wisdom. A good argument this against persecution for conscience sake: conscience is accountable to God only; and people must be persuaded to God and his ways, not drawn by force of arms. And so the weapons of our warfare are mighty, or very powerful; the evidence of truth is convincing and cogent; this indeed is through God, or owing to him, because they are his institutions, and accompanied with his blessing, which makes all opposition to fall before his victorious gospel. Where we may observe, [1.] What opposition is made against the gospel, by the powers of sin and Satan in the hearts of men: ignorance, prejudices, beloved iniquity, are Satan's strong-holds in the souls of some; vain imaginations, carnal reasonings, and high thoughts, or proud conceits, in others, exalt themselves against the knowledge of God: by these ways the Devil endeavours to keep men from faith and obedience to the gospel, and secures his possession of the hearts of men, as his own house or property. But then observe, [2.] The conquest which the word of God gains. These strong-holds are hulled down by the gospel as the means, through the grace and power of God accompanying it as the principal efficient cause. Note, The conversion of the soul is the conquest of Satan in that soul.

2. The apostle's power to punish offenders (and that in an extraordinary manner) is asserted in v. 6. The apostle was a prime-minister in the kingdom of Christ, and chief officer in his army, and had in readiness, he had power and authority at hand, to revenge all disobedience, to punish offenders in a most exemplary and extraordinary manner. The apostle speaks not of personal revenge, but of punishing disobedience to the gospel, and disorderly walking among church-members, by inflicting church-censures. Note, Though the apostle shewed meekness and gentleness, yet he would not betray his authority; and therefore intimates, that when he would commend them whose obedience was fulfilled, others would fall under severe censures.

7. Do ye look on things after the outward appearance? If any man trust to himself that he is Christ's, let him of himself think this again, that, as he is Christ's, even so are we Christ's. 3. For though I should boast somewhat more of our authority, which the Lord hath given us for edification, and not for your destruction, I should not be ashamed: 9. That I may not seem as if I would terrify you by letters. 10. For his letters, say they, are weighty and powerful; but his bodily presence is weak, and his speech contemptible. 11. Let such a one think this, that, such as we are in word by letters, so we are also in deed, as we shall be also in deed when we are present.

In these verses the apostle proceeds to reason the case with the Corinthians, in opposition to those who despised him, judged him, and spake hardly of him. "Do ye," says he, "think on things after the outward appearance? Is this a rule to make an estimate of things or persons by, and to judge between me and my adversaries?" In outward appearance, Paul was mean and despicable with some; he did not make a figure, as perhaps some of his competitors might do: but this was a false rule to make a judgment by. It should seem, that some boasted mighty things of themselves, and made a fair show; but there are often false appearances: a man may seem to be learned, who has not learned Christ, and appear virtuous, who has not a principle of grace in his heart. However, the apostle asserts two things of himself: 1. His relation to Christ; If any man trust to himself that he is Christ's, even so are we Christ's, v. 7. It should seem by this, that Paul's adversaries boasted of their relation to Christ, as his ministers and servants. Now the apostle reasons thus with the Corinthians; "Suppose it to be so, allowing what they say to be true, (and let us observe, that in fair arguing, we should allow all that may be reasonably granted; and should not think it impossible but those who differ from us very much, may yet belong to Christ, as well as we,) allowing them, "might the apostle say, "what if they boasted, yet they might also to allow this to us, that we also are Christ's." Note, (1.) We must not, by the most charitable allowances we make to others who differ from us, cut ourselves off from Christ, or deny our relation to him. For, (2.) There is room in Christ for many; and those who differ much from one another, may yet be one in him. It would help to heal differences that are among Christians, if they would remember that how confident soever we may be that we belong to Christ, yet, at the same time, we must allow that they who differ from us, may belong to Christ too, and therefore should be treated accordingly. We must not think that we are the people, and that none belong to Christ but we. This we may plead for ourselves, against those who judge us and despise us, that, how weak soever we are, yet, as they are Christ's, so are we: we profess the same faith, we walk by the same rule, we build upon the same foundation, and hope for the same inheritance.

2. His authority from Christ as an apostle. This he had mentioned before; (v. 6.) and now he tells them that he might speak of it again, and that with some sort of boasting, seeing it was a truth, that the Lord had given it to him, and it was more than his adversaries could justly pretend to. It was certainly what he should not be ashamed of, v. 8. Concerning which observe, (1.) The nature of his authority; it was for edification, and not for destruction. This indeed is the end of all authority, civil and ecclesiastical, and was the end of that extraordinary authority which the apostles had, and of all church-discipline. (2.) The caution with which he speaks of his authority, probably his design was to put a period to what foolish people have a fondness to do, with big words, nor by angry letters, v. 9. Thus he seems to obviate an objection that might have been formed against him, v. 10. But the apostle declares he did not intend to frighten them who were obedient, nor did he write any thing in his letters, that he was not able to make good by deeds, against the disobedient; and he would have his adversaries know this, (v. 11.) that he would, by the exercise of his apostolical power committed to him, make it appear to have a real efficacy.

2. For we dare not make ourselves of the number, or compare ourselves with some that commend themselves: but they, measuring themselves by themselves, and comparing themselves among themselves, are not wise. 13. But we will not boast of things without our measure, but according to the measure of the rule which God hath distributed to us, a measure to reach even unto you. 14. For we stretch not ourselves beyond our measure, as though we reached not unto you: for we are come as far as to you also in preaching the gospel of Christ: 15. Not boasting of things without our measure, that is, of other men's labours; but having hope, when your faith is increased, that we shall be enlarged by you according to our rule abundantly, 16. To preach the gospel in the regions beyond you, and not to boast in another man’s line of things made ready to our hand. 17. But he that glorifieth, let him glory in the Lord. 18. For not he that commendeth himself is approved, but whom the Lord commendeth, v. 18. Of all flattery, self-flattery is the worst; and self-applause is seldom any better than self-flattery and self-deceit: at the best, self-commendation is no praise; it is oftentimes as foolish and vain as it is proud: therefore, instead of praising or commending ourselves, we should strive to approve ourselves to God, and his approbation will be our best commendation.

In these verses, observe,

1. The apostle refuses to justify himself, or to act by such rules as the false apostles did, v. 12. He only intimates that they took a wrong method to commend themselves, in measuring themselves by themselves, and comparing themselves among themselves, which was not wise. They were pleased, and did pride themselves, in their own attainments, and never considered those who far exceeded them in gifts and graces, in power and authority; and this made them haughty and insolent. Note, If we would compare ourselves with others who excel us, this would be rather a motive to keep us humble, we should be pleased and thankful for what we have of gifts or graces, but never pride ourselves therein, as if there were none to be compared with us, or that do excel us. The apostle would not be of the number of such vain men; let us resolve that we will not make ourselves of that number.

2. He fixes a better rule for his conduct; namely, not to boast of things without his measure; what was the measure God had distributed to him, v. 13. His meaning is, either that he would not boast of more gifts or graces, or power and authority, than God had really bestowed on him; or rather, that he would not act beyond his commission as to persons or things, nor go beyond the line prescribed to him; which he plainly intimates the false apostles did, while they boasted of other men's labours. The apostle's resolution was, to keep within his own province, and that compass of ground which God had marked out for him. His commission as an apostle was to preach the gospel everywhere, especially among the Gentiles, and he was not confined to one place; yet he observed the directions of Providence, and the Holy Spirit, as to the particular places whither he went, or where he did abide.

3. He acted according to this rule. We stretch not ourselves beyond our measure, v. 14. And particularly he acted according to this rule in preaching at Corinth, and in the exercise of his apostolical authority there; for he came thither by divine direction, and there he converted many to Christianity; and therefore, in boasting of them as his charge, he acted not contrary to his rule, he boasted not of other men's labours, v. 15.

4. He declares his success in observing this rule. If I boasted, it was my faith was increased, and that others beyond them, even in the remoter parts of Achaia, would embrace the gospel also; and in all this he exceeded not his commission, nor acted in another man's line.

5. He seems to check himself in this matter, as if he had spoken too much in his own praise. The unjust accusations and reflections of his enemies had made it needful he should justify himself; and the wrong methods they took, gave him good occasion to mention the better rule he had observed; yet he is afraid of boasting, or taking any praise to himself, and therefore he mentions two things which ought to be refused to him: (1.) He that glorifieth, should glory in the Lord, v. 17. If we are able to fix good rules for our conduct, or act by them, or have any good success in so doing, the praise and glory of all are owing unto God. Ministers in particular must be careful not to glory in their performance, but must give God the glory of their work, and the success thereof.

(2.) Not he that commendeth himself is approved, but whom the Lord commendeth, v. 18. Of all flattery, self-flattery is the worst; and self-applause is seldom any better than self-flattery and self-deceit: at the best, self-commendation is no praise; it is oftentimes as foolish and vain as it is proud: therefore, instead of praising or commending ourselves, we should strive to approve ourselves to God, and his approbation will be our best commendation.

In this chapter the apostle goes on with his discourse, in opposition to the false apostles, who were very industrious to lessen his interest and reputation among the Corinthians, and had therefore too much occasion to make apologies for going about to commend himself, and give the reason for what he did, v. 1-4. II. He mentions, in his own necessary vindication, his equality with the other apostles, and with the false apostles in this particular, of preaching the gospel to the Corinthians freely, without wages, v. 5-15. III. He makes another preference to what he was about further to say in his own justification, v. 16-21. And, IV. He gives a large account of his qualifications, labours, and sufferings, in which he exceeded the false apostles, v. 22, to the end.

1. WOULD to God ye could bear with me a little in my folly: and indeed bear with me. 2. For I am jealous over you with godly jealousy: for I have espoused you to one husband, that I may present you as a chaste virgin to Christ. 3. But I fear, lest by any means, as the serpent beguiled Eve through his subtility, so your minds should be corrupted from the simplicity that is in Christ. 4. For if he that cometh preacheth another Jesus, whom we have not preached, or if ye receive another Spirit, which ye have not received, or another gospel, which ye have not accepted, ye might well bear with him.

Here we may observe,

1. The apology the apostle makes for going about to commend himself. He is both in earnest upon this subject of self-commendation: Would to God ye could bear with me a little in my folly, v. 1. He calls this folly, because too often it is really no better; in his case it was necessary; yet, seeing others might apprehend it to be folly in him, he desires them to bear with it. Note, As much against the grain as it is with a proud man to acknowledge his infirmities, so much is it against the grain with a humble man to speak in his own praise. It is no pleasure to a good man to think well of himself, yet in some cases it is lawful, when it is for the advantage of others, or for our own necessary vindication; as thus it was here. For,

2. We have the reasons for what the apostle did; namely,

(1.) To preserve the Corinthians from being corrupted by the insinuations of the false apostles, v. 2. He tells them, he was jealous over them with godly jealousy; he was afraid lest their faith should be weakened by hearkenings to such suggestions as tended to lessen their regard to his ministry, by which they were brought to the Christian faith. He had espoused them to one husband, converted them to Christianity; (and the conversion of a soul is its marriage to the Lord Jesus;) and he was desireous to present them as a chaste virgin, pure and spotless, and faithful, not having their minds corrupted with false doctrines, by false teachers; so as Eve was beguiled by the subtlety of the serpent. This godly jealousy in the apostle was a mixture of love and fear; and faithful ministers cannot but be afraid and concerned for their people, lest they should lose that which they have received, and turn from what they have embraced, especially when deceivers are gone abroad, or have crept in among them.

(2.) To vindicate himself against the false apostles; forasmuch as they could not pretend they had another Jesus, or another Spirit, or another gospel to preach to them, v. 4. If this had been the case, there would have been some colour of reason to bear with them, or to hearken to them. But seeing there is but one Jesus, one Spirit, and one gospel, that is, or at least that ought to be, preached to them, and received by them; what reason could there be why the Corinthians should be prejudiced against him who first converted them to the faith, by the artifices of any adversary? It was a just occasion of jealousy, that such persons designed to preach another Jesus, another Spirit, and another gospel.

5. For I suppose I was not a whit behind the very chiefest of apostles. 6. But though I be rude in speech, yet not in knowledge; but we have been thoroughly made manifest among you in all things. 7. Have I committed an offence in abasing myself that ye might be exalted, because I have preached to you the gospel of God freely? 8. I robbed other churches, taking wages of them, to do you service. 9. And when I was present with you, and wanted, I was chargeable to no man: for that which was lacking to me, the brethren which came from Macedonia supplied: and in all things have I kept myself from being burdensome unto you, and so will I keep myself. 10. As the truth of Christ is in me, no man shall stop me of this boasting in the regions of Achaia. 11. Wherefore? Because I love you not? God knoweth. 12. But what I do, that I will do, that I may cut off occasion from them who desire occasion; that whereon they glory, they may be found even as we. 13. For such are false apostles, deceitful workers, transforming themselves into the apostles of Christ. 14. And no marvel; for Satan himself is transformed into an angel of light. 15. Therefore it is no great thing if his ministers also be transformed as the ministers of righteousness; whose end shall be according to their works.

After the foregoing preface to what he was about to say, the apostle in these verses mentions, 1. His equality with the other apostles—that he was not a whit behind the very chiefest of the apostles, v. 5. This he expresses very modestly; I suffice so; he might have spoken very positively. The apostleship, as an office, was equal in all the apostles; but the apostles, like other Christians, differed one from another. These stars differed one from another in glory, and Paul was indeed of the first magnitude; yet he speaks modestly of himself, and humbly owns his personal infirmity, that he was rude in speech, had not such a graceful delivery as some others might have. Some think that that verse expresses a man of a very low stature, and that his voice was proportionally small; others think that he might have had some impediment in his speech, perhaps a stammering tongue. However, he was not rude in knowledge; he was not unacquainted with the best rules of oratory and art of persuasion, much less was he ignorant of the mysteries of the kingdom of God, as had been thoroughly manifested among them.

2. His equality with the false apostles in this particular—the preaching the gospel unto them freely, without wages. This the apostle largely insists on, and shews that as they could not but own him to be a minister of Christ, so they ought to acknowledge he had been a good friend to them. For,

1.) He had preached the gospel to them freely, v. 10. He had proved, in his former epistle to them, the lawfulness of ministers receiving maintenance from the people, and the duty of the people to give them an honourable maintenance; and here he says he himself had taken wages of other churches, (v. 8.) so that he had a right to have asked and received from them; yet he waived his right, and chose rather to abuse himself, by working with his hands in the trade of tent-making to maintain himself, than to receive, lest they might be excelt or encouraged to receive the gospel, which they had so cheap; yea, he chose rather to be supplied from Macedonia than to be chargeable unto them.

2.) He informs them of the reason of this his conduct among them. And negatively, it was not because he did not love them, (v. 11.) or was unwilling to receive tokens of their love; for love and friendship he regarded as necessary prerequisites of receiving. But positively, it was to avoid offence, that he might cut off occasion from them that desired occasion. He would not give occasion for any to accuse him of worldly designs in preaching the gospel, or that he intended to make a trade of it, to enrich himself; and that others who opposed him at Corinth, might not in this respect gain an advantage against him; that wherein they gloried, as to this matter, they might be found even as he, v. 12. It is not improbable to suppose that the chief of the false teachers at Corinth, or some among them, were rich, and taught (or deceived) the people freely, and might accuse the apostle or his fellow-labourers as mercenary men, who received hire or wages, and therefore the apostle kept to his resolution not to be chargeable to any of the Corinthians.

3.) The apostles are charged as deceitful workers; (v. 13.) and that upon this account, because they would transform themselves into the likeness of the apostles of Christ, and though they were the ministers of Satan, would seem to be the ministers of righteousness. They would be as industrious and as generous in promoting error as the apostles were in preaching truth; they would endeavour as much to undermine the kingdom of Christ as the apostle did to establish it. They were counterfeit brethren under the Old Testament, who wore the garb, and learned the language, of the prophets of the Lord. So there were counterfeit apostles under the New Testament, who seemed in many respects like the true apostles of Christ. And no marvel; (says the apostle;) hypocrisy is a thing not to be much wondered at in this world, especially when we consider the great influence Satan has upon the minds of many, who rules in the hearts of the children of disobedience. As he can turn himself into any shape, and put on almost any form, and look sometimes like an angel of light, in order to promote his kingdom of darkness. He is like a merchant and ministers and instruments to do the same. But it follows, Their end is according to their works; (v. 15.) the end will discover them to be deceitful workers, and their work will end in ruin and destruction.

16. I say again, Let no man think me a fool; if otherwise, yet as a fool receive me, that I may boast myself a little. 17. That which I speak, I speak it not after the Lord, but as it were foolishly, in this confidence of boasting. 18. Seeing that many glory after the flesh, I will glory also. 19. For ye suffer fools gladly, seeing ye yourselves are wise. 20. For ye suffer, if a man bring you into bondage, if a man devour you, if a man take of you, if a man exalt himself, if a man smite you on the face. 21. I speak as concerning reproach, as though we had been weak. Howbeit, whereinsoever any is bold, (I speak foolishly,) I am bold also.

Here we have a further excuse, that the apostle makes for what he was about to say in his own vindication.

1. He would not have them think he was guilty of folly, of saying what he said to vindicate himself. Let no man think me a fool, v. 16. Ordinarily indeed, it is unbecoming a wise man to be much and often speaking in his own praise; boasting of ourselves is usually not only a sign of a proud mind, but a mark of folly also; however, says the apostle, yet as a fool receive me; if ye do count it folly in me to boast a little, yet give due regard to what I shall say.

2. He mentions a caution, to prevent the abuse of what he should say, telling them that what he spake, he did not speak after the Lord, v. 17. He would not have them think that boasting of ourselves, or glorying in what we have, is a thing commanded by the Lord in general unto Christians, nor yet that this is always necessary in our own vindication; though it may be lawful used, but not contrary to the Lord, when, strictly speaking, it is not after the Lord. It is the duty and practice of Christians, in obedience to the command and example of the Lord, rather to humble and abuse themselves; yet prudence must direct in what circumstances it is needful to do that which we may do lawfully, even speak of what God has wrought for us, and in us, and by us too.

3. He gives a good reason why they should suffer him to boast a little; namely, because they otherwise would have him to be silent. Seeing many glory after the flesh, of carnal privileges, or outward advantages and attainments, I will glory also, v. 18. But he would not glory in those things, though he had as much or more reason than others to do so. But he gloried in his infirmities, as he tells them afterward. The Corinthians thought themselves wise, and might think it an instance of wisdom, to bear with the weakness of others, and therefore suffered others to do what might seem folly; therefore the apostle would have them bear with him. Or these words, Ye suffer fools gladly, seeing ye yourselves are wise, (v. 19.) may be ironic, and then the meaning is this, "Notwithstanding all your wisdom, ye willingly suffer yourselves to be brought into bondage under the Jewish yoke, or suffer others to tyrannize over you; nay, to devour you, or make a prey of you, and take of you hire for their own advantage, and to exalt themselves above you, and lord it over you; nay, even to smite you on the face, or impose upon you to your very faces, (v. 20.) upbraiding you while they reproach me, as if I had been very weak in shewing regard to me, v. 21. Seeing this was the case, that the Corinthians, or some among them, could so easily bear all this from the false apostles, it was reasonable for the apostle to desire, and expect, they should bear with what might seem to them an indiscretion in him, seeing the circumstances of the case were such as made it needful, that whereinsoever any were bold, he should be bold also, v. 21.

22. Are they Hebrews? So am I. Are they Israelites? So am I. Are they the seed of Abraham? So am I. 23. Are they ministers of Christ? I am more; in labours more abundant, in stripes above measure, in prisons more frequent, in deaths oft. 24. Of the Jews five times received I forty stripes save one. 25. Thrice was I beaten with rods, once was I stoned, thrice I suffered shipwreck; a night and a day I have been in the deep; 26. In journeyings often, in perils of waters, in perils of robbers, in perils by mine own countrymen, in perils by the heathen, in perils in the city, in perils in the wilderness, in perils in the sea, in perils among false brethren; 27. In weariness and painfulness, in watchings often, in hunger and thirst, in fastings often, in cold and nakedness. 28. Beside those things that are without, that which cometh upon me daily, the care of all the churches. 29. Who is weak, and I am not weak? Who is offended, and I burn not? 30. If I must needs glory, I will glory of the things which concern mine infirmities. 31. The God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, which is blessed for evermore, knoweth that I lie not. 32. In Damascus the governor under Aretas the king kept the city of the Damascenes with a garrison, desirous to apprehend me: 33. And through a window in a basket was I let down by the wall, and escaped his hands.

Here the apostle gives a large account of his own qualifications, labours, and sufferings; (not out of pride or vain-glory, but to the honour of God, who had enabled him to do and suffer so much for the cause of Christ;) and wherein he excelled the false apostles, that would lessen his character and usefulness among the Corinthians. Observe,

1. He mentions the privileges of his birth, (v. 22.) which were equal to any they could pretend to; he was a Hebrew of the Hebrews, of a family among the Jews, that never intermarried with the Gentiles. He was also an Israelite, and could boast of his being descended from the beloved Jacob as well as they; and was also of the seed of Abraham, and not of the proselytes. It should seem from hence, that the false apostles were of the Jewish race, who gave disturbance to the Gentile converts.
II. He makes mention also of his apostleship; that he was more than an ordinary minister of Christ, v. 23. God had counted him faithful, and had put him into the ministry: he had been a useful minister of Christ unto them; they had found full proofs of his ministry, and were sure of the truth of his call. I Cor. 15. 9. I am more sure than those.

III. He chiefly insists upon this, that he had been an extraordinary sufferer for Christ: and this was what he gloried in, or rather he gloried in the grace of God that had enabled him to be more abundant in labours, and to endure very great sufferings, such as stripes above measure, frequent imprisonments, and often the dangers of death, v. 23. Note, When the apostle does not prove himself an extraordinary sufferer, he proves that he had been an extraordinary sufferer. Paul was the apostle of the Gentiles, and for that reason was hated of the Jews; they did all they could against him; and among the Gentiles also he met with hard usage. Bonds and imprisonments were familiar to him; never was the most notorious malefactor more frequently in the hands of public justice, than Paul was for righteousness-sake. The jail and the whipping-post, and all other hard usages of those who are accounted the worst of men, were what he was accustomed to. As to the Jews, whenever he fell into their hands, they never spared him. Five times he fell under their lash, and received forty stripes save one, v. 24. Forty stripes was the utmost their law allowed; (Deut. 25. 3.) but it was usual with them, that they might not exceed, to abate one at least of that number. And to hum the abatement of one only, was all the favour that ever Paul received from them. The Gentiles were not tied up to that moderation, and amongst them he was thrice beaten with rods, of which we may suppose once was at Philippi, Acts 16. 22. Once he was stoned in a popular tumult, and was taken up for dead, Acts 14. 19. He says, that thrice he suffered shipwreck; and we may believe him, though the sacred history gives a relation but of one. A night and a day he had been in the deep, (v. 23.) in some deep dungeon or other, shut up as a prisoner.

Thus he was all his days a constant confessor; perhaps scarcely a year of his life, after his conversion, passed without suffering some hardship or other for his religion; yet this was not all, for wherever he went, he went in perils; he was exposed to perils of all sorts. If he journeyed by land, or voyaged by sea, he was exposed to many perils. He mentions some sort of the Jews; his own countrymen, the Jews, thought him to kill him, or do him a mischief; the heathen, to whom he was sent, were not more kind to him, for among them he was in peril. If he was in the city, or in the wilderness, still he was in peril. He was in peril not only among avowed enemies, but among them also who called themselves brethren, but were false brethren, v. 26. For in this, he had great swarness and painfulness in his ministerial labours, and these are things that will come into account shortly, and people will be reckoned with for all the care and pains of their ministers concerning them. Paul was a stranger to wealth and plenty, power and pleasure, pretenment and ease; he was in watchings often, and exposed to hunger and thirst; in fastings often, it may be out of necessity; and endured cold and nakedness, v. 27. This was not all the hardships of the age, used as if he had been the burthen of the earth, and the plague of his generation. And yet this is not all; for, as an apostle, the care of all the churches lay on him, v. 28. He mentions this last, as if this lay the heaviest upon him, and as if he could better bear all the persecutions of his enemies than the scandals that were to be found in the churches he had the oversight of. Who is weak, and I am not weak? Who is offended, and I burn not? v. 29. There was not a weak Christian, whom he did not sympathize with; nor any one scandalized, but he was affected therewith. See what little reason we have to be in love with the pomp and plenty of this world, when this besotted apostle, one of the best of men that ever lived, excepting Jesus Christ, felt so much of the hardness of it. Nor was he amiss in all this, but, on the contrary, it was well alleged in his honour; and therefore, much against the grain it was with him to glory, yet, says he, if I must needs glory, if my adversaries will oblige me to it in my own necessary vindication, I will glory in these my infirmities, v. 30. Note, Sufferings for righteousness-sake will, the most of any thing, redound to our honour.

In the two last verses, he mentions one particular part of his sufferings out of its place, as if he had forgotten it before, or because the deliverance God wrought for him was most remarkable; namely, the danger he was in at Damascus, soon after he was converted, and not settled in Christianity, at least in the ministry and apostleship. This is recorded, Acts 9. 24, 25. This was his first great danger and difficulty, and the rest of his life was of a piece with that. And it is observable, that lest it should be thought he spake more than was true, the apostle confirms this narrative with a solemn oath, or appeal to the omniscience of God, v. 31. It is a great comfort to a good man, that the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who is an omniscient God, knows the truth of all he says, and knows all he does, and all he suffers for his sake.

CHAP. XII.

In this chapter, the apostle proceeds in maintaining the honour of his apostleship. He magnified his office, when there were those who vilified it. What he says in his own praise, was only in his own justification, and the necessary defence of the honour of his ministry, the preservation of which was necessary to the success thereof. First, He makes mention of the favour God had shown him, the honour done him, the methods God took to keep him humble, and the use he made of this dispensation, v. 1. 10. Then he addresses himself to the Corinthians, blaming them for what was faulty among them, and giving a large account of his behaviour, and kind intentions toward them, v. 11. to the end.

1. It is not expedient for me doubtless to glory; I will come to visions and revelations of the Lord. 2. I knew a man in Christ above fourteen years ago, (whether in the body, I cannot tell; or whether out of the body, I cannot tell, God knoweth,) such a one caught up to the third heaven. 3. And I knew such a man, (whether in the body, or out of the body, I cannot tell; God knoweth,) how that he was caught up into paradise, and heard unspeakable words, which it is not lawful for a man to utter. 5. Of such a one will I glory: yet of myself I will not glory, but in mine infirmities. 6. For though I would desire to glory, I shall not be a fool; for I will say the truth: but now I forbear, lest any man should think of me above that which he seeth me to be, or that he heareth of me. 7. And lest I should be exalted above measure through the abundance of the revelations, there was given to me a thorn in the flesh, the messenger of Satan to buffet me. 8. lest I should be exalted above measure.
II. CORINTHIANS, XII.

For this thing I besought the Lord thrice, that it might depart from me. 9. And he said unto me, My grace is sufficient for thee: for my strength is made perfect in weakness. Most gladly therefore will I rather glory in my infirmities, that the power of Christ may rest upon me. 10. Therefore I take pleasure in infirmities, in reproaches, in necessities, in persecutions, in distresses, for Christ's sake: for when I am weak, then am I strong.

Here we may observe,
I. The narrative the apostle gives of the favours God had shewn him, and the honour he had done him; for doubtless he is the man in Christ, of whom he speaks. Concerning this we may take notice.

1. Of the honour itself which was done to the apostle, he was caught up into the third heaven, v. 2. When this was, we cannot say, whether it was, before revelation God has given his and revelation at his conversion, or at some other time afterward; much less can we pretend to say how this was, whether by a separation of his soul from his body, or by an extraordinary transport in the depth of contemplation. It would be presumption for us to determine, if not also to inquire into, this matter; seeing the apostle himself says, Whether in the body or out of the body, he could not tell. It was certainly a very extraordinary honour done him: in some sense he was caught up into the third heaven, the heaven of the blessed, above the aerial heaven, in which the fowls fly; above the starry heaven, which is adorned with those glorious orbs; it was into the third heaven, where God most eminently manifests his glory. We are not capable of knowing all, nor is it fit we should know very much, of the particulars of that glorious place and state; it is our duty and interest to give diligence to make sure to ourselves a mansion there; and if that be cleared up to us, then we should long to be removed thither, to abide there for ever.

This third heaven is called paradise, (v. 4.) in allusion to the earthly paradise, out of which Adam was driven for his transgression; it is called the paradise of God, (Rev. 2. 7.) signifying to us, that by Christ we are restored to all the joys and honours we lost by sin, yea to much better. The apostle does not mention what he saw in the third heaven or paradise, but tells us, that he heard unspeakable words, such as it is not possible for a man to utter; such are the sublimity of the matter, and our unacquaintedness with the language of the upper world: nor was it lawful to utter those words, because, while we are here in this world, we have a more sure word of prophecy given to us in his word. 2 Pet. 1. 19. We read of the tongue of angels as well as of men, and Paul knew as much of that as ever any man upon earth did, and yet preferred charity, that is, the sincere love of God and our neighbour. This account which the apostle gives us of his vision, should check our curious desires after forbidden knowledge, and teach us to improve the revelation God has given us in his word. Paul himself, who had been in the third heaven, did publish to the world what he had heard there, but adhered to the doctrine of Christ: on that foundation the church is built, and on that we must build our faith and hope.

2. The modest and humble manner in which the apostle mentions this matter, is observable. One would be apt to think that one who had had such visions and revelations as these, should have boast-the first prayer, nor to the second, we must hold on, 4. and hold out, till we receive an answer. Christ himself hath enjoined this. We are sent, to teach us to pray, so they are continued, to teach us to continue in prayer.

4. We have an account of the answer given to the apostle's prayer; that, although the trouble was not removed, yet an equivalent should be granted; My grace is sufficient for thee. Note, (1.) Though God accepted the prayer of faith, yet he does not always answer it in the latter form he sometimes grants in wrath; so he sometimes denies in love. (2.) When God does not remove our troubles and temptations, yet, if he gives us grace sufficient for us, we have no reason to complain, or to say that he deals ill by us. It is a great comfort to us, whatever thorns in the flesh we are pained with, that God's grace is sufficient for us. Grace signifies two things: 1. The good-will of God towards us, and that is enough to enlighten and enliven us, sufficient to strengthen and comfort us; to support our souls, and cheer up our spirits, in all afflictions and distresses. 2. The good work of God in us, the grace we receive from the fullness that is in Christ our Head; and from him there shall be communicated that which is suitable and seasonable, and sufficient for his members. Christ Jesus understands our case, and knows our need, and will proportion the remedy to our malady; and not only strengthen us, but glorify himself. His strength is made perfect in our weakness. Thus his grace is manifested and magnified; he ordains his praise out of the mouths of babes and sucklings.

III. Here is the use which the apostle makes of this dispensation; He gloried in his infirmities, (v. 9.) and took pleasure in them, v. 10. He does not mean his sinful infirmities, (those we have reason to be ashamed of and grieved at,) but he means his afflictions, his trials, his distresses, and distresses for Christ's sake, v. 10. And the reason of his glory and joy on account of these things, was this—They were fair opportunities for Christ to manifest the power and sufficiency of his grace resting upon him, by which he had so much experience of the strength of divine grace, that he could say, When I am weak, then am I strong. This is a great paradox; and, for many, it is a mystery, that while our own strength is abased, then we are strong in the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ; when we see ourselves weak in ourselves, then we go out of ourselves to Christ, and are qualified to receive strength from him, and experience most of the supplies of divine strength and grace.

11. I am become a fool in glorying; ye have compelled me: for I ought to have been commended of you: for in nothing am I behind the very chiefest apostles, though I be nothing. 12. Truly the signs of an apostle were wrought among you in all patience, in signs, and wonders, and mighty deeds. 13. For what is it wherein ye were inferior to other churches, except it be that I myself was not burdensome to you? Forgive me this wrong. 14. Behold, the third time I am ready to come to you; and I will not be burdensome to you; for I seek not your's, but you: for the children ought not to lay up for the parents, but the parents for the children. 15. And I will very gladly spend and be spent for you; though the more abundantly I love you, the less I be loved. 16. But be it so, I did not burthen you: nevertheless, being crafty, I caught you with guile. 17. Did I make a gain of you by any of them whom I sent unto you? 18. I desired Titus, and with him I sent a brother. Did Titus make a gain of you? Walked we not in the same spirit? Walked we not in the same steps? 19. Again, think ye that we excuse ourselves unto you? We speak before God in Christ: but we do all things, dearly beloved, for your edifying. 20. For I fear, lest, when I come, I shall not find you such as I would, and that I shall be found unto you such as ye would not: lest there be debates, envyings, wrath, strifes, backbitings, whisperings, swellings, tumults: 21. And lest, when I come again, my God will humble me among you, and that I shall bewail many who have sinned already, and have not repented of the uncleanness and fornication and lasciviousness which they have committed.

In these verses the apostle addresses himself to the Corinthians, two ways.

I. He blames them for what was faulty in them; that they had not stood up in his defence as they ought to have done, and so made it the more needful for him to insist so much on his own vindication. They in a manner compelled him to commend himself, who ought to have been commended of them, v. 11. And had they, or one among them, not failed in this part, it would have been less needful for him to have said so much on his own behalf. He tells them further, that they in particular had good reason to speak well of him, as being in nothing behind the very chiefest apostles, because he had given them full proof and evidence of his apostleship; for the signs of an apostle were wrought among them in all patience, in signs, and wonders, and mighty deeds. Note, 1. It is a debt we owe to good men, to stand up in defence of their reputation; and we are under special obligations to those we have received benefit by, especially spiritual benefit, to own them as instruments in God's hand of good to us, and to vindicate them when they are calumniated by others. 2. How much soever we are, or ought to be, esteemed by others, we ought always to think humbly of ourselves. See an example of this in this great apostle, who thought himself to be nothing, though in truth he was not behind the chiefest apostles. So far was he from seeking praise from men, though he tells them their duty to vindicate his reputation: so far was he from applauding himself, when he was forced to insist upon his own necessary self-defence.

II. He gives a large account of his behaviour and kind intentions toward them; in which we may observe the characters of a faithful minister of the gospel.

1. He was not willing to be burdensome to them, nor did he seek their's, but them. He says, (v. 13.) he had not been burdensome to them for the time past, and tells them, (v. 14.) he would not be burdensome to them for the time to come, when he should come to them: he spared their purses, and did not covet their money; I seek not your's, but you. He sought not to enrich himself, but to save their souls: he did not desire to make a property of them to himself, but to gain them over to Christ, whose servant he was. Note, Those who aim at clothing themselves with the fleece of the flock, and take no care of the sheep, are hirelings, and not good shepherds.

2. He would gladly spend and be spent for them; (v. 15.) he was willing to take pains, and to suffer loss for their good. He would spend his time, his parts, his strength, his interest, his all, to do them service, may as spend as to be spent, and be them a candle, which consumes itself, to give light to others.

3. He did not abate in his love to them, notwithstanding their unkindness and ingratitude to him; and therefore was contented and glad to take pains with them, though the more abundantly he loved them, the less he was loved, v. 15. This is applicable to other relations: if others be wanting in their duty to us, we must not therefore that we may neglect our duty to them.

4. He was careful not only that he himself should not be burdensome, but that none he employed should. This seems to be the meaning of what we read, v. 16—18. If it should be objected by any, that though he did not himself burden them, yet that he, being crafty, caught them with guile, that is, he sent them among them who pillaged them, then he was not careful with them in the love and profit; "This was not so," says the apostle; "I did not make a gain of you myself, nor by any of them I sent; nor did Titus, nor any others. We walked by the same spirit, and in the same steps." They all agreed in this matter, to do them all the good they could, without being burdensome to them; to promote the gospel among them, and make it as easy to them as possible. Or, this may be read with an interrogative, as utterly disclaiming any guile in himself and others toward them.

5. He was a man who did all things for edifying, v. 19. This was his great aim and design, to do good, to lay the foundation well, and then with care and diligence to build the superstructure.

6. He would not shrink from his duty, for fear of displeasing them, though he was so careful to make himself easy to them. Therefore he was resolved to be faithful in reproving sin, though the case was there found to be such as they would not, v. 20. The apostle here mentioned several sins that are too commonly found among professors of religion, and are very reprovable; debates, envyings, wraths, strifes, backbodings, whisperings, swellings, tumults: and though those who are guilty of these sins, can hardly bear to be reproved for them, yet faithful ministers must not fear offending the guilty by sharp reproofs, as they are needful, in public and in private.

7. He was grieved at the apprehensions that he should find scandalous sins among them, not duly repented of. This, he tells them, would be the cause of great humiliation and lamentation. Note, (1.) The falls and miscarriages of professors cannot but be in some degree humbling consideration to a good minister; and God surely takes this way to humble those who might be under temptation to be lifted up: I fear lest my God will humble me among you. (2.) We have reason to bewail those who sin, and do not repent; to bewail many that have sinned, and have not repented, v. 21. If these have not, yet, grace to mourn and lament their own case, their case is the more lamentable; and those who love God, and love them, should mourn for them.

CHAP. XIII.

In this chapter, the apostle threatens to be severe against obstinate sinners, and assigns the reason thereof; (v. 1—6.) and concludes his epistle with a valediction and a benediction, v. 11.14.

1. This is the third time I am coming to you. In the mouth of two or three witnesses shall every word be established. 2. I told you before, and now declare, as if I were present, the second time; and being absent, now I write to them who heretofore have sinned, and to all others, that, if I come again, I will not spare: 3. Since ye seek a proof of Christ speaking in me, which to you-ward is not weak, but is mighty in you. 4. For though he was crucified through weakness, yet he liveth by the power of God. For we also are weak in him, but we shall live with him by the power of God toward you. 5. Examine yourselves, whether ye be in the faith; prove your own selves. Know ye not your own selves, how that Jesus Christ is in you, except ye be reprobates? 6. But I trust that ye shall know that we are not reprobates?

In these verses, observe, 1. The apostle threatens to be severe against obstinate sinners when he should come to Corinth, having now sent to them a first and second epistle, with proper admonitions and exhortations, in order to reform what was amiss among them. Concerning which we may notice, (1.) The caution with which he proceeded in his censures: he was not hasty in using severity, but gave a first and second admonition. So some understand his words, (v. 1.) This is the third time I am coming to you; referring to his first and second epistles, by which he admonished them, as if he were present with them, though in person he was absent, v. 2. According to this interpretation, these two epistles are the witnesses he means in the first verse, referring rather to the direction of our Saviour, (Matt. 18. 16.) concerning the manner how Christians should deal with offenders before they proceed to extremity, than to the law of Moses, (Deut. 17. 6—19. 5.) for the behaviour of judges in criminal matters. We should go, or send, to our brother, once and again, to tell him of his fault. Thus the apostle had told these Corinthians before, in his former epistle, and now he tells them, or writes to them who heretofore had sinned, and to all others, giving warning unto all before he came in person the third time, to exercise severity against scandalous offenders.

Others think that the apostle had designed and prepared for his journey to Corinth twice already, but was providentially hindered, and now informs them of his intentions a third time to come to them. However this be, it is observable, that he kept an account how often he endeavoured, and what pains he took with these Corinthians for their good: and we may be sure that an account is kept in heaven, and we must be reckoned with another day, for the helps we have had for our souls, and how we have improved them.

(2.) The threatening itself. That if (or when) he come again (in person) he would not spare obstinate sinners, as such as were impertinent, in their scandalous enormities. He had told them before, he feared God would humble him among them, because he should find some who had sinned and had not repented: and now he declares he would not spare such, but would inflict church-censures upon them, which are thought to have been accompanied in those early times with visible and extraordinary tokens of divine displeasure. Note, Though it is God's gracious method to bear long with sinners, yet he will not bear always; at length he will come, and will not spare them who remain obstinate and impenitent, notwithstanding all his methods to reclaim and reform them.

2. The apostle assigns a reason why he would be thus severe, namely, for a proof of Christ speaking in him, which they sought after. It was thus necessary for the credit, confirmation, and success, of the gospel he preached; and therefore such as denied that, were justly and severely to be censured. It was the design of the false teachers, to make the Corinthians call this matter into question, of which yet they had not weak, but strong or mighty proofs, (v. 3.) notwithstanding the mean figure he made in the world, and the contempt of those who among the Corinthians sought a proof of Christ's speaking in the apostle, he puts them upon the proving their Christianity; (v. 5.) Examine yourselves, &c. Hereby he intimates, that if they could prove their own Christianity, this would be a proof of his apostleship; for if they were in the faith, if Jesus Christ was in them, this was a proof that Christ spoke in him, because it was by his ministry they were converted. And therefore, as a proof unto those who among the Corinthians sought a proof of Christ's speaking in the apostle, he puts them upon the proving their Christianity. It was, thus necessary for the credit, confirmation, and success, of the gospel he preached, to have the Corinthians call this matter into question, of which yet they had not weak, but strong or mighty proofs, (v. 3.) notwithstanding the mean figure he made in the world, and the contempt of those who among the Corinthians sought a proof of Christ's speaking in him, because it was by his ministry they were converted. And therefore, as a proof unto those who among the Corinthians sought a proof of Christ's speaking in him, he puts them upon the proving their Christianity. Why the next? The apostle says of the duty of the Corinthians to examine themselves, &c. with the particular view already mentioned, is applicable to the great duty of all who call themselves Christians, to examine themselves concerning their spiritual state. We should examine whether we be in the faith, because it is a matter in which we may be easily deceived, and wherein a deceit is highly dangerous: we should examine whether we are weak and ye are strong; that is, that we have no power to censure those who are strong in faith, and fruitful in good works. Some understand this passage thus: Though we are weak through persecutions and contempt, we bear it patiently, and also joyfully, while we see that ye are strong, that ye are prosperous in holiness, and persevering in welldoing. But another way is, (3.) He desired their perfection, (v. 9.) that is, that they might be sincere, and aim at perfection; (sincerity is our gospel-perfection;) or else he wished there might be a thorough reformation among them. He not only desired that they might be kept from sin, but also that they might grow in grace, and increase in holiness, and that all that was amiss among them might be rectified and reformed. This was the great end of his writing this epistle, and that freedom he used with them by writing these things, those friendly admonitions and warnings, being absent, that so, being present, he should not use sharpness, (v. 10.) not proceed to the utmost extremity in the exercise of the power which the Lord had given him as an apostle, to revenge all disobedience, ch. 10. 6.

7. Now I pray to God that ye do no evil; not that we should appear approved, but that ye should do that which is honest, though we be as reprobates. 8. For we can do nothing against the truth, but for the truth. 9. For we are glad, when we are weak, and ye are strong: and this also we wish, even your perfection. 10. Therefore I write these things being absent, lest being present, I should use sharpness, according to the power which the Lord hath given me to edification, and not to destruction.

Here we have,

1. The apostle's prayer to God on the behalf of the Corinthians, that they might do no evil, v. 7. This is the most desirable thing we can ask of God, both for ourselves and for our friends, to be kept from sin, that we and they may do no evil; and it is most needful, that we often pray to God for his grace to keep us, because without that we cannot keep ourselves. This is the reason the apostle had to pray, that we may do no evil, than that we may suffer evil.

2. The reasons why the apostle put up this prayer to God on behalf of the Corinthians; which reasons have a special reference to their case, and the subject-matter about which he was writing to them. Observe, he tells them,

(1.) It was not so much for his own personal reputation, as for the honour of religion; "Not that I should appear approved, but that ye should be approved, that which is honest, or decent, and for the credit of religion, though we should be reproached and vilified, and accounted as reprobates," v. 7. Note, (1.) The great desire of faithful ministers of the gospel, is, that the gospel they preach may be honoured, however their persons may be vilified. (2.) The best way to adorn our holy religion, is, to do that which is honest, and of good report; to walk so as becomes the gospel of Christ.

(2.) Another reason was this; that they might be free from all blame and censure when he should come to them. This is intimated in v. 8. We can do nothing against the truth, but for the truth. If they therefore did not evil, nor act contrary to their profession of the gospel, the apostle had no power or authority to punish them. He had said before, (ch. 10. 8.) and says here, (v. 10.) The power which the Lord has given me, was to edification, not to destruction. So that although the apostle had great powers committed to him for the credit and advancement of the gospel, yet he could not do any thing to the disparagement of the truth, or the discouragement of them who obeyed it. He could not, he would not, he dared not, he had no commission to act against the truth, and it is remarkable, how the apostle did rejoice in this blessed impotency. "We are glad," says he, (v. 8.) "when we are weak, and ye are strong; that is, that we have no power to censure those who are strong in faith, and fruitful in good works." Some understand this passage thus: Though we are weak through persecutions and contempt, we bear it patiently, and also joyfully, while we see that ye are strong, that ye are prosperous in holiness, and persevering in well-doing.

(3.) He desired their perfection, (v. 9.) that is, that they might be sincere, and aim at perfection; (sincerity is our gospel-perfection;) or else he wished there might be a thorough reformation among them. He not only desired that they might be kept from sin, but also that they might grow in grace, and increase in holiness, and that all that was amiss among them might be rectified and reformed. This was the great end of his writing this epistle, and that freedom he used with them by writing these things, those friendly admonitions and warnings, being absent, that so, being present, he should not use sharpness, (v. 10.) not proceed to the utmost extremity in the exercise of the power which the Lord had given him as an apostle, to revenge all disobedience, ch. 10. 6.

11. Finally, brethren, farewell. Be perfect, be of good comfort, be of one mind, live in peace; and the God of love and peace shall be with you. 12. Greet one another with a holy kiss. 13. All the saints salute you. 14. The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost, be with you all. Amen.

Thus the apostle concludes this epistle, with,
1. A valediction. He gives them a parting farewell, and takes his leave of them for the present, with hearty good wishes for their spiritual welfare.
In order to which,
(1.) He gives them several good exhortations.
[1.] To be perfect, or to be knit together in love, which would tend greatly to their benefit and advantage, as a church, or Christian society. [2.] To be of good comfort under all the sufferings and persecutions they might endure for the cause of Christ, or any calamities and disappointments they might meet with in the world. [3.] To be of one mind, which would greatly tend to their comfort; for the more easy we are with our brethren, the more ease we shall have in our own souls. The apostle would have them, as far as was possible, to be of the same opinion and judgment; however, if this could not be attained to, yet, [4.] He exhorts them to live in peace; that difference in opinion should not cause an alienation of affections; that they should be at peace among themselves. He would have all the schisms healed, that were among them; that there should be no more contention and wrath found among them; to prevent which, they should avoid debates, envyings, backbittings, whisperings, and such like enemies to peace.
(2.) He encourages them with the promise of God’s presence among them; The God of love and peace shall be with you, v. 11. Note, [1.] God is the God of love and peace. He is the Author of peace, and lover of concord: he hath loved us, and is willing to be at peace with us; he commands us to love him, and to be reconciled to him, and also that we love one another, and be at peace among ourselves.
[2.] God will be with them who live in love and peace. He will love them who love peace; he will dwell with them here, and they shall dwell with him for ever. Such shall have God's gracious presence here, and be admitted to his glorious presence hereafter.
(3.) He gives directions to them to salute each other, and sends kind salutations to them from those who were with him, v. 12, 13. He would have them testify their affection to one another by the sacred rite of a kiss of charity, which was then used, but has long been disused, to prevent all occasions of wantonness and impurity, in the more declining and degenerate state of the church.
2. The apostolical benediction; (v. 14.) The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost, be with you all.
Thus the apostle concludes his epistle, and thus it is usual and proper to dismiss worshipping assembly. This plainly proves the doctrine of the gospel, and is an acknowledgment, that Father, Son, and Spirit, are three distinct Persons, yet but one God; and herein the same, that they are the Foundation of all blessings to men. It likewise speaks our duty, which is, to have an eye by faith to Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; to live in a continual regard to the three Persons in the Trinity, into whose name
we were baptized, and in whose name we are blessed.
This is a very solemn benediction, and we should give all diligence to inherit this blessing. The grace of Christ, the love of God, and the communion (or communication) of the Holy Ghost; the grace of Christ as Redeemer, the love of God who sent the Redeemer, and all the communications of this grace and love, which come to us by the Holy Ghost; it is the communications of the Holy Ghost that qualify us for an interest in the grace of Christ, and the love of God: and we can desire no more to make us happy than the grace of Christ, the love of God,

AN
WITH
OF THE
EPISTLE OF ST. PAUL TO THE GALATIANS.

Completed by Mr. Bayes.

THIS epistle of Paul is directed not to the church or churches of a single city, as some others are, but of a country or province, for so Galatia was. It is very probable that these Galatians were first converted to the Christian faith by his ministry; but if he was not the instrument of planting, yet at least he had been employed in watering these churches, as is evident from this epistle itself, and also from Acts 18.
23, where we find him going over all the country of Galatia and Phrygia in order, strengthening all the disciples.
While he was with them, they had expressed the greatest esteem and affection both for his person and ministry; but he had not been long absent from them, before some judaizing teachers got in among them, by whose arts and insinuations they were soon drawn into a meaner opinion both of the one and of the other.

That which these false teachers chiefly aimed at, was, to draw them off from the truth as it is in Jesus, particularly in the great doctrine of justification, which they grossly perverted, by asserting the necessity of joining the observation of the law of Moses with faith in Christ, in order to it; and the better to accomplish this their design, they did all they could to lessen the character and reputation of the apostle, and to raise up their own on the ruins of his; representing him as one, who, if he was to be owned as an apostle, yet was much inferior to others, and particularly who deserved not such a regard as Peter, James, and John, whose followers, it is likely, they pretended to be; and in both these attempts they had but too great success.

This was the occasion of his writing this epistle; wherein he expresses his great concern, that they had suffered themselves to be so soon turned aside from the faith of the gospel; vindicates his own character and authority as an apostle against the aspersions of his enemies; shewing that his mission and doctrine were both divine, and that he was not, upon any account, behind the very chieftest of the apostles, 2 Cor. 11. 5. He then sets himself to assert and maintain the great gospel-doctrine of justification by faith without the works of the law, and to obviate some difficulties that might be apt to arise in their minds concerning it: and having established this important doctrine, he exhibits, and how far in the liberty whereby Christ had made them free, cautions them against the abuse of this liberty, gives them several very needful counsels and directions; and then concludes the epistle with giving them the true character of those false teachers by whom they had been in snared, and, on the contrary, with his own temper and behaviour. In all which, his great scope and design were, to recover those who had been perverted, to settle those who might be wavering, and to confirm such among them as had kept their integrity.

GALATIANS, I.

In this chapter, after the preface or introduction, (v. 1...5.) the apostle severely reproves these churches for their defection from the faith; (v. 6, 9.) and then proves his own apostleship, which his enemies had brought them to question; I. From his ordination and design in preaching the gospel, v. 10. II. From his having received it by immediate revelation, v. 11, 12. For the proof of which, he acquaints them, I. What his former conversation was, v. 13, 14. 2. How he was converted, and called to the apostleship, v. 15. 3. How he behaved himself afterward, v. 16, to the end.

1. PAUL, an apostle, (not of men, neither by man, but by Jesus Christ, and God the Father, who raised him from the dead;) 2. And all the brethren which are with me, unto the churches of Galatia: 3. Grace be to you, and peace from God the Father, and from our Lord Jesus Christ, 4. Who gave himself for our sins, that he might deliver us from this present evil world, according to the will of God and our Father: 5. To whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen.

In these verses we have the preface or introduction to the epistle; where observe, 1. The person or persons from whom this epistle is sent—from Paul an apostle, &c. and all the brethren that were with him. The epistle is sent from Paul; he only was the penman of it. And because there were some among the Galatians, who endeavoured to lessen his character and authority, in the very front of it he gives a general account, both of his office, and of the manner in which he was called to it: which afterward, in this and the following chapter, he enlarges more upon. As to his office, he was an apostle; he is not afraid to style himself so, though his enemies would scarcely allow him this title; and to let them see that he did not assume this character without just ground, he acquaints them how he was called to this dignity and office, and assures them that his commission to it was wholly divine, for he was an apostle, not of men, neither by man; he had not the common call of an ordinary minister, but an extraordinary call from Heaven to this office; he never received his qualification for it, nor his designation to it, by the mediation of men, but had both the one and the other directly from above; for he was an apostle by Jesus Christ, he had his instructions and commission immediately from him, and consequently from God the Father, who was one with him, in respect of his divine nature, and who had appointed him, as Mediator, to be the Apostle and High Priest of our profession, and as such to authorize others to this office. He adds, Who raised him from the dead; both to acquaint us, that herein God the Father gave a public testimony to Christ's being his Son and the promised Messiah; and also, that as his call to the apostleship was immediately from Christ, so it was after his resurrection from the dead, and when he was entered upon his exalted state: so that he had reason to look upon himself, not only as standing upon a level with the other apostles, but as in some sort preferred above them; for whereas they were called by him when on earth, he had his call from him when in heaven. Thus does the apostle, being constrained to it by his adversaries, magnify his office; which shews that though men should by no means be proud of any authority they are possessed of, yet, at certain times and upon certain occasions, it may become needful to assert it. But, 2. He joins all the brethren that were with him, in the inscription of the epistle, and writes in their name as well as his own. By the brethren that were with him may be understood, either the Christians in common of that place where he now was, or such as were employed as ministers of the gospel. These, notwithstanding his own superior character and attainments, he is ready to own as his brethren; and though he only wrote the epistle, yet he joins them with himself in the inscription of it. Herein, as he shews his own great modesty and humility, and how remote he was from an assuming temper, so he might do this to dispose these churches to a greater regard to what he wrote;
since hereby it would appear that he had their concurrence with him in the doctrine which he had preached, and was now about to confirm, and that it was no other than what was both published and professed by others as well as himself.

II. To whom this epistle is sent—The churches of Galatia. The apostle and his brethren exhort the churches at that time in this country, and it should seem that all of them were more or less corrupted through the arts of those seducers who had crept in among them; and therefore Paul, on whom came daily the care of all the churches, being deeply affected with their state, and concerned for their recovery to the faith, and establishment in it, writes this epistle to them; he directs it to all of them, as being all equally concerned in it; and he gives them the name of churches, though they had done enough to forfeit it; for corrupt churches are never allowed to be churches: no doubt, there were some among them, who still continued in the faith, and he was not without hope that others might be recovered to it.

III. The apostolical benediction; (v. 3.) Herein the apostle and the brethren who were with him, wish the churches grace and peace from God the Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ. This is the usual blessing wherewith he blesses the churches in the name of the Lord, grace and peace. Grace includes God's good-will towards us, and his good work upon us; and peace implies in it all that inward comfort, or outward prosperity, which is really needful for us; they come from God the Father, as the Fountain, through Jesus Christ, as the Channel of this grace and peace, for these the apostle wishes for these Christians. But we may observe, first grace, and then peace, for there can be no true peace without grace. Having mentioned the Lord Jesus Christ, he cannot pass without enlarging upon his love; and therefore adds, (v. 4.) Who gave himself for our sins, that he might deliver, &c. Jesus Christ gave himself for our sins, as a great Sacrifice to make atonement for us; this the justice of God required, and this he freely submitted to for our sakes. One great end hereof, was, to deliver us from this present evil world; not only to redeem us from the wrath of God, and the curse of the law, but also to recover us from the corruption that is in the world through lust, and to rescue us from the vicious practices and customs of it, unto which we are naturally enslaved; and possibly also to set us free from the Mosaic law, as an instrument by which they were corrupted; see Gal. 2, 6, 8. From whence we may note, 1. This present world is an evil world: it is become so by the sin of man, and it is so on the account of the sin and sorrow with which it abounds, and the many snarest and temptations to which we are exposed, as long as we continue in it. But, 2. Jesus Christ has died to deliver us from this present evil world, not presently to remove his people out of it, but to rescue us from the corruption and sorrow of it, to keep them from the evil of it, and in due time to possess them of another and better world. This, the apostle informs us, he has done according to the will of God and our Father. In offering up himself a Sacrifice for this end and purpose, he acted by the appointment of the Father, as well as with his own free consent; and therefore we have the greatest reason to depend upon the sincerity and acceptableness of what he has done, and suffered for us; yea, from hence we have encouragement to look upon God as our Father, for thus the apostle here represents him: as he is the Father of our Lord Jesus, so in and through him he is also the Father of all true believers; as our blessed Saviour himself acquaints us, (John 20, 17.) when he tells his disciples, that he was ascending to his Father and their Father. The apostle, having thus taken notice of the great love wherewith Christ hath loved us, concludes this preface with a solemn ascription of praise and glory to him; (v. 5.) To whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen. Intimating, that on this account he is justly entitled to our highest esteem and regard. Or this doxology may be considered as referring both to God the Father and our Lord Jesus Christ, from whom he had just had before been wishing grace and peace. They are both the proper objects of our worship and adoration, and all honour and glory are perpetually due to them, both on the account of their own infinite excellences, and also on the account of the blessings we receive from them.

6. I marvel that ye are so soon removed from him that called you into the grace of Christ unto another gospel: 7. Which is not another; but there are some that trouble you, and would pervert the gospel of Christ. 8. But though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed. 9. As we said before, so say I now again, If any man preach any other gospel unto you than that ye have received, let him be accursed. Here the apostle comes to the body of the epistle; and he begins it with a more general reproof of these churches for their unsteadiness in the faith, which he has mentioned, and some following parts of it, enrols more upon. Here we may observe, I. How much he was concerned at their defection; I marvel, &c. It at once filled him with the greatest surprise and sorrow. Their sin and folly were, that they did not hold fast the doctrine of Christianity as it had been preached to them, but suffered themselves to be removed from the purity and simplicity of it. And there were several things by which their defection was greatly aggravated: as, 1. That they were removed from him that called them; not only from the apostle, who had been the instrument of calling them into the fellowship of the gospel, but from God himself, by whose order and direction the gospel was preached to them, and they invited to a participation of the privileges of it: so that herein they had been guilty of a great abuse of his kindness and mercy toward them. 2. That they had been led into it by false teachers, who had taught the gospel which had been preached to them, was the most glorious discovery of divine grace and mercy in Christ Jesus; so 'towards they had been called to partake of the greatest blessings and benefits, such as justification, and reconciliation with God here, and eternal life and happiness hereafter. These our Lord Jesus has purchased for us at the expense of his precious blood, and freely bestows upon all that believe in him, Col. 1, 12, 13, 14. 3. That they were so soon removed. In a very little time they lost that relish and that esteem of this grace of Christ, which they seemed to have, and too easily yielded to the snares and crafty wiles of false teachers, who taught the gospel more after their own fashion, than after the doctrine of Christ, which was taught by the apostle; and therefore in proportion to the greatness of the privilege they enjoyed, such were their sin and folly in deserting it, and suffering themselves to be drawn off from the established way of obtaining these blessings. 4. That they were removed to another gospel, which yet was not another. Thus the apostle represents the doctrine of these teaching teachers; he calls it another gospel, because it opened different way of justification and salvation from what was revealed in the gospel, namely, by works, and not by faith in Christ. And yet he adds, "Which is not another; you will find it be no gospel at all; not really another gospel, but the perversion of the gospel of Christ, and the overturning of the foundations of that;" whereby he intimates that they who go and establish and propagate what the gospel of Christ has revealed, are guilty of a gross perversion of it, and in the issue will find themselves wretchedly mistaken.

Thus the apostle endeavours to impress upon these Galatians a due sense of their guilt in forsaking the gospel-way of justification; and yet at the same time he tempers his reproof with mildness and tenderness toward them, and represents them as rather drawn into the snares of some that troubled them, than as coming into it of their own accord; which, though it did not excuse them, yet was some extenuation of their fault. And hereby he teaches us, that in reproving others, as we should be faithful, so we should also be gentle, and endeavour to restore them in the spirit of meekness, ch. 6. 1.

11. How confident he was, that the gospel he had preached to them, was the only true gospel: he says so in the following words: that he pronounces an anathema upon those who pretended to preach any other gospel: (v. 8.) and to let them see that this did not proceed from any rashness or impetrate zeal in him, he repeats it again, v. 9. This will not justify our thundering out anathemas against those who differ from us in lesser things. It is only, against those who forge a new gospel, who overturn the foundation of the covenant of grace, by setting up the works of the law in the place of Christ's righteousness, and corrupting Christianity with Judaism, that Paul denounces this. He puts the case; "Suppose we should preach any other gospel; nay, suppose an angel from heaven should: not as if it were possible for an angel from heaven to be the messenger of a lie; but it is expressed so, the more to strengthen what he was about to say, "If you have any other gospel preached to you by any other person, under our name, or under colour of having it from an angel himself, you must conclude that you are imposed upon: and whoever preaches another gospel, lays himself under a curse, and is in danger of losing you under it too.""

10. For do I now persuade men, or God? Or do I seek to please men? For if I yet pleased men, I should not be the servant of Christ. 11. But I certify you, brethren, that the gospel which was preached of me is not after man. 12. For I neither received it of man, neither was I taught it, but by the revelation of Jesus Christ. 13. For ye have heard of my conversation in time past in the Jews' religion, how that beyond measure I persecuted the church of God, and wasted it: 14. And profited in the Jews' religion above many my equals in mine own nation, being more exceedingly zealous of the traditions of my fathers. 15. But when it pleased God, who separated me from my mother's womb, and called me by his grace, 16. To reveal his Son in me, that I might preach him among the heathen; immediately I conferred not with flesh and blood: 17. Neither went I up to Jerusalem to them who were apostles before me; but I went up to Arabia, 18. Then after three years I went up to Jerusalem to see Peter, and abode with him fifteen days. 19. But other of the apostles saw I none, save James the Lord's brother. 20. Now the things which I write unto you, behold, before God, I lie not. 21. Afterward I came into the regions of Syria and Cilicia; 22. And was unknown by face unto the churches of Judea which were in Christ: 23. But they had heard only, That he who persecuted us in times past, now preacheth the faith which once he destroyed. 24. And they glorified God in me.

What Paul had said more generally, in the preface of this epistle, he now proceeds more particularly to enlarge upon. There he had declared himself to be an apostle of Christ; and here he comes to declare, not only what he was, but what he did. He was then solicited to cast off that character and office. There were some in the churches of Galatia, who were prevailed with to call this into question; for they who preached up the ceremonial law, did all they could to lessen Paul's reputation, who preached the pure gospel of Christ to the Gentiles: and therefore he here sets himself to prove the divinity both of his mission and doctrine, that he was not to be set off the Devil from his true self. Paul was well satisfied, if he might first of all get the churches of Christians into a better opinion of the gospel he had preached to them. This he gives sufficient evidence of,

1. From the scope and design of his ministry, which was not to persuade men, but God, &c. The meaning of this may be, either that in his preaching the gospel he did not act in obedience to men, but God, who had called him to this work and office; or that his aim therein was to bring persons to obedience, not of men, but of God. As he professed to act by a commission from God; so that which he chiefly aimed at, was, to promote his glory, by recovering sinners into a state of subjection to him. And as this was the great end he was pursuing, so, agreeably heretofore, he did not seek to please men. He did not, in his doctrine, accommodate himself to the humours of persons, either to gain their affection, or to avoid their resentment; but his great care was to approve himself to God. The judaizing teachers, by whom these churches were corrupted, had discovered a very different temper; they mixed works with faith, and the law with the gospel, only to please the Jews, whom they were willing to court and keep in with, that they might escape persecution. But Paul was a man of another spirit and heart, who was to please God, or to mitigate their rage against him, as to alter the doctrine of Christ, either to gain their favour, or to avoid their fury. And he gives this very good reason for it; that, if he yet pleased men, he should not be the servant of Christ. These he knew were utterly inconsistent, and that no man could serve two such masters; and therefore, though these he would not needlessly displease any, yet he dares not allow himself to gratify men, nor to receive the applause of his faithfulness to Christ. Thus, from the sincerity of his aims and intentions in the discharge of his office, he proves that he was truly an apostle of Christ. And from this his temper and behaviour we may note, 1. That the great end which ministers of the gospel should aim at, is, to bring men to God. 2. That they who are faithful, will not seek to please men, but to approve themselves to God. 3. That they must not be solicitous to please men, if they would approve themselves faithful servants to Christ. But if this argument should not be thought sufficient, he goes on to prove his apostleship from the manner wherein he received the gospel which he preached to them; concerning which he assures them, (v. 11, 12,) that he had it not by information from others, but by revelation from heaven. One thing peculiar in the character of an apostle, was, that he had been called to, and instructed for, this office immediately by Christ himself. And this he here shews that he was by no means defective in, whatever his enemies might suggest to the contrary. Ordinary ministers, as they receive their call to preach the gospel by the mediation of others, so it is by means of the instruction and assistance of others that they are brought to the knowledge of it. But Paul acquaints them, that he had his knowledge of the gospel, as well as his authority to preach it, directly from the Lord Jesus: the gospel which he preached, was not after man; he neither received it of man, nor was he taught it by man, but by immediate inspiration, or revelation from Christ himself. This he was concerned to make out, to prove himself an apostle: and to this purpose,

1. He tells them what his education was, and what, accordingly, his conversation in time past had been, v. 13, 14. Particularly, he acquaints them, that he had been brought up in the Jewish religion, educated in the schools of the doctors of his own nation: that he had been exceedingly zealous of the traditions of the elders, such doctrines and customs as had been invented by their fathers, and conveyed down from one generation to another; yea, to that degree, that, in his zeal for them, he had beyond measure persecuted the church of God, and wasted it. He had not only been a rejecter of the Christian religion, but an enemy; he was of the number of those instruments which were given of its divine original, but he had been a persecutor of it too, and had applied himself with the utmost violence and rage to destroy the professors of it. This Paul often takes notice of, for the magnifying of that free and rich grace, which had wrought so wonderful a change in him, whereby of so great a sinner he was made a sincere penitent, and from a persecutor was become an apostle. And it was this which, if he had depended upon his first profession, might have caused it to be supposed, that he was not led to Christianity, as many others are, purely by education, since he had been bred up in an enmity and opposition to it; and they might reasonably suppose, that it must be something very extraordinary, which had made so great a change in him, which had conquered the prejudices of his education, and brought him not only to profess, but to preach, that doctrine, which he had before so vehemently despised. And in how wonderful a manner he was turned from the error of his ways, brought to the knowledge and faith of Christ, and appointed to the office of an apostle, v. 15, 16. This was not done in an ordinary way, or by ordinary means, but in an extraordinary manner; for, (1. God had separated him hereunto from his mother's womb: the change that was wrought in him, was in pursuance of a divine purpose concerning him, whereby he was appointed to be a Christian and an apostle, before he came into the world, or had done either good or evil. (2.) He was called by his grace. All who are savingly converted, are called by the grace of God; their conversion is the effect of his good pleasure concerning them, and is affected by his power and grace in them. But there was something peculiar in the case of Paul, both in the suddenness, and in the greatness of the change wrought in him, and also in the manner wherein it was effected, which was not by the mediation of others, as the instruments of it, but by Christ's personal appearance to him, and immediate operation upon him, whereby it was rendered a more special and extraordinary instance of divine grace. Paul was not only a new testimony to the effectual call of the gospel, in the manner wherein it was revealed to him, He was not only revealed to him, but in him. It will but little avail us to have Christ revealed to us, if he is not also revealed in us; but this was not the case of Paul; it pleased God to reveal his Son in him, to bring him to the knowledge of Christ and his gospel by special and immediate revelation. And, (4.) It was with this design, that he should preach him among the heathen; not only that he should prove him himself, but preach him also to others; so that he was both a Christian and an apostle by revelation.

3. He acquaints them how he behaved himself hereupon, from v. 16, to the end: being thus called to this work and office, he conferred not with flesh and blood. This may be taken more generally, and so we may learn from it, that, when God calls us by his grace, we must not consult flesh and blood. But the meaning of it here, is, that, he did not consult men; he did not apply himself to any other for their advice and direction; neither did he go up to Jerusalem, to those that were apostles before him; as though he needed to be approved by them, or to receive any further instructions or authority from them: but instead of that, he steered another course, and went into Arabia, either as a place of retirement proper for receiving further instruction, or at least to be with the saints there among the Gentiles, being appointed to be the apostle of the Gentiles; and from thence he returned again to Damascus, where he had first begun his ministry, and from whence he had with difficulty escaped the rage of his enemies, Acts 9. It was not till three years after his conversion that he went up to Jerusalem, to see Peter; and when he did so, he made but a very short stay with the apostles; he was only there, did he go much into conversation; for other of the apostles he saw none, but James, the Lord's brother. So that it could not well be pretended that he was indebted to any other, either for his knowledge of the gospel, or his authority to preach it; but it appeared that both his qualifications for, and his call to, the apostolic office were extraordinary and divine. This account before of his impositions on the church at Jerusalem, and his office, to receive the unjust censures of his adversaries, and to recover the Galatians from the impressions they had received to his prejudice, he confirms it by a solemn oath, (v. 20.) declaring, as in the presence of God, that what he had said was strictly true, and that he had not in the least falsified in what he had related; which, though it will not justify us in solemn appeals to God upon every occasion, shows that, in matters of plain and moment, this sometimes may not only be lawful, but duty. After this he acquaints them, that he came into the regions of Syria and Cilicia: having made this short visit to Peter, he returns to his work again; he had no communication at that time with the churches of Christ in Judea, they had not so much as seen his face; but having heard that he who persecuted them all, was Paul, Paul, the faith which he once destroyed, they glorified God because of him; thanksgivings were rendered by many unto God on that behalf; the very report of this mighty change in him, as it filled them with joy, so it excited them to give glory to God on the account of it.

CHAP. II.
The apostle, in this chapter, continues the relation of his past life and conduct, which he had begun in the former, and, by some further instances of what had passed between himself and the other apostles, makes it appear that he was not be-older to them, either for his knowledge of the gospel, or his authority as an apostle, as his adversaries would in- sinuate; but, on the contrary, that he was owned and ap- proved by them, as having an equal commission with them to this office. 1. He particularly informs them of an- other journey which he took to Jerusalem many years after the former; and how he behaved himself at that time, v. 1. — 10. And, II. Gives them an account of another inter- view he had with the apostle Peter at Antioch; and how he was obliged to behave himself toward him there. From the subject-matter of that conversation, he proceeds to dis- course on the great doctrine of justification by faith in Christ, without the works of the law; which it was the main design of this epistle to establish, and which he en- larges more upon in the following chapters.

1. THEN fourteen years after I went up again to Jerusalem with Barnabas, and took Titus with me also. 2. And I went up by revelation, and communicated unto them that gospel which I preach among the Gentiles, but privately to those who were of reputation, lest by any means I should run, or had run, in vain. 3. But neither Titus, who was with me, being a Greek, was com- pelled to be circumcised: 4. And that be- cause of false brethren unawares brought in, who came in privily to spy out our liberty which we have in Christ Jesus, that they might bring us into bondage: 5. To whom we gave place by subjection, no, not for an hour; that the truth of the gospel might con- tinue with you. 6. But of those who seemed to be somewhat, whatsoever they were, it maketh no matter to me: God accepteth no man's person: for they who seemed to be somewhat, in conference added nothing to me; 7. But contrariwise, when they saw that the gospel of the uncircumcision was committed unto me, as the gospel of the circumcision was unto Peter; 8. (For he that wrought effectually in Peter to the apostleship of the circumcision, the same was mighty in me toward the Gentiles;) 9. And when James, Cephas, and John, who seemed to be pillars, perceived the grace that was given unto me, they gave to me and Barnabas the right hands of fellow- ship; that we should go unto the heathen, and they unto the circumcision. 10. Only they would that we should remember the poor; the same which I also was forward to do.

It should seem, by the account Paul gives of him- self in this chapter, that, from the very first preaching and planting of Christianity, there was a differ- ence of apprehension between those Christians who had first been Jews, and those who had first been Gentiles. Many of those who had been first Jews, retained a regard to the ceremonial law, and strove to keep up the reputation of those Gentiles who had first been Gentiles, had no regard to the law of Moses, but took pure Christianity as perfor- mative of natural religion, and resolved to adhere to that. Peter was the apostle of the circumcision, and preached the gospel to them; and the ceremonial law, though dead with Christ, yet not being as yet buried, he condescended at the respect kept up for it. But Paul was the apostle of the Gentiles; and though he was a Hebrew of the Hebrews, yet he adhered to pure Christianity. Now in this chapter he tells us what passed between him and the other apostles, and particularly between him and Peter hereupon.

In these verses he informs us of another journey which he took to Jerusalem, and of what passed be- tween him and the other apostles there, v. 1—11. And there he tells us,

I. With some circumstances relating to this his journey thither. As particularly, 1. With the time of it; that it was not till fourteen years after the former, (mentioned ch. 1. 18.) or, as others choose to understand it, from his conversion, or from the death of Christ. It was an instance of the great goodness of God, that so useful a person was for so many years continued in his work. And it was some evidence that he had no dependence upon the other apostles, but had an equal authority with them, that he had been so long absent from them, and all the while employed in preaching and propagating pure Christianity, without being called into question by them for it; which it may be thought they would have done, had he been inferior to them, and his doctrine disapproved by them. 2. With his com- panions in it; he went up with Barnabas, and took with him Titus; and it is the same account of what was the same with that recorded Acts 15. (as many think,) then we have a plain reason why Barnabas went along with him; for he was chosen by the Christians at Antioch, to be his companion and asso- ciate in the affair he went about. But as it does not appear that Titus was put into the same com- mission with him, so the chief reason of his taking him along with him, seems to have been to let them at Jerusalem, that he was neither ashamed nor afraid to own the doctrine which he had constantly preached: for though Titus was now become not only a convert to the Christian faith, but a preacher of it too, yet he was by birth a Gentile, and uncir- cumcised: and therefore, by his making him his companion, it appeared that his doctrine and prac- tice were of a piece; and that as he had preached the non-necessity of circumcision, and observing the law of Moses, so he was ready to own and confess with those who were uncircumcised. 3. With the reason of it, which was a divine revelation he had concerning it; he went up by revelation; not of his own head, much less as being summoned to appear there, but by special order and direction from heaven. It was a privilege with which this apostle was often favoured, to be under a special divine conduct in his operations and undertakings; and though this is what we have no reason to expect, yet it should teach us, in every thing of moment we go about, to endeavour, as far as we are capable, to see our way made plain before us, and to commit ourselves to the guidance of providence.

II. He gives us an account of his behaviour while he was at Jerusalem; which was such as made it ap- pear that he was not in the least inferior to the other apostles; but that both his authority and qualifica- tions were every way equal to their's. He peculiarly acquaints us,

1. That he there communicated the gospel to them, which he preached among the Gentiles, but pri- vately, &c.; where we may observe both the faith- fulness and prudence of our great apostle. (1.) His faithfulness in giving them a true and fair account of the doctrine which he had all along preached among the Gentiles, and was still resolved to resolve that of pure Christianity, free from all mixtures of Juda- ism. This he knew was a doctrine that would be ungrateful to many there, and yet he was not afraid to own it, but in a free and friendly manner lays it open before them, and leaves them to judge whether or no it was not the true gospel of Christ. And yet, (2.) He uses prudence and caution herein, for fear of giving offence; he chooses rather to do it in a more private than in a public way, and to them that were of reputation, that is, to the apostles themselves, or to the chief among the Jewish Christians, rather than more openly and promiscuously to all; because, when he came to Jerusalem, there were multitudes that believed, and yet continued zealous for the law. And one of his caution, was, lest he should run, or had run, in vain lest he should stir up opposition against him, and thereby either the success of his past labours should be lessened, or his future usefulness be obstructed: for nothing more hinders the progress of the gospel, than differences of opinion about the doctrines of it; especially when they occasion quarrels and contentions among the preachers of it, as they too usually do. It was enough to his purpose to have his principle owned by those who were of greatest authority, whether it was approved by others or not. And therefore, to avoid offence, he judges it safest to communicate it privately to them, and not in public, to the whole church. This conduct of the apostle may teach all, and especially ministers, how much need they have of prudence, and how careful they should be to use it in private occasions, as far as is consistent with their faithfulness.

2. That in his practice he firmly adhered to the doctrine which he had preached. Paul was a man of resolution, and would adhere to his principles; and therefore, though he had Titus with him, who was a Greek, yet he would not suffer him to be circumcised, because he would not betray the doctrine of Christ, as he had preached it to the Gentiles. It does not appear that the apostles at all insisted upon this; for though they conversed at the use of circumcision among the Jewish converts, yet they were not for imposing it upon the Gentiles. But there were others who did, whom the apostle here calls false brethren; and concerning whom he informs us, that they were unawares brought in, that is, into the church, or into their company, and that they came only to spy out their liberty which they had in Christ Jesus; or to see whether Paul would stand up in defence of that freedom from the ceremonial law, which he had taught as the doctrine of the gospel, and represented as the privilege of those who embraced the Christian religion. Their design herein, was, to bring them into bondage, which they would have effected, could they have gained the point they aimed at; for had they prevailed with Paul and the other apostles to have circumcised Titus, and the other converts, they would have imposed it upon the Gentiles, and so have brought them under the bondage of the law of Moses. But Paul, seeing their design, would by no means yield to them; he would not give place by subjection, no not for an hour; not in this one single instance; and the reason of it was, that the truth of the gospel might continue with them; that the Gentile Christians, and particularly the Galatians, might be preserved to them pure and entire, and not corrupted with the mixture of Judaism, as it would have been, had he yielded to this point of their perver-circumcision was at that time a thing indifferent, and what in some cases might be complied with without sin; and accordingly we find even Paul himself sometimes giving way to it, as in the case of Timothy, Acts 16. 3. But when it is insisted on as necessary for obtaining to it, though only in a single instance, was likely to be improved as giving countenance to such an innovation, he has too good an eye to a concern for the purity and liberty of the gospel, to submit to it; he would not yield to those who were for the Mosaic rites and ceremonies, but would stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free. Which conduct of his may give us occasion to observe, That what under some circumstances may lawfully be complied with, yet, when that cannot be done without betraying the truth, or giving up the liberty of the gospel, it ought to be refused.

3. That, though he conversed with the other apostles, yet he did not receive any addition to his knowledge, or authority from them, v. 6. By those who seemed to be somewhat, he means the other apostles, particularly James, Peter, and John, whom he afterwards mentions by name, v. 9. And concerning these he says, that they were deceived in revelation by all; that they were looked upon (as unjustly too) as pillars of the church, who were set not only for its ornament, but for its support; and that of some accounts they might seem to have the advantage of him, in that they had seen Christ in the flesh, which he had not, and were apostles before him, yea even while he continued a persecutor. But yet, whatever they were, it was no matter to him. This was no prejudice to his being equally and acknowledged by them; for God does not accept the persons of men on the account of any such outward advantages. As he had called them to this office, so he was at liberty to qualify others for it, and to employ them in it.

And it was evident in this case, that he had done so; for in conference they added nothing to him, they told him nothing but what he before knew by revelation, nor could they except against the doctrine which he communicated to them. This was not at all inferior to them, but was as much called and qualified to be an apostle as they themselves were.

4. That the issue of this conversation, was, that the other apostles were fully convinced of his divine mission and authority, and accordingly acknowledged him as their fellow-apostle, v. 7—10. They were not only satisfied with his doctrine, but they saw a divine power attending him; he did what he pleased, and did miracles with it, and in working miracles for the confirmation of it; that he who wrought effectually in Peter to the apostleship of the circumcision, the same was mighty in him toward the Gentiles. And from hence they justly concluded, that the gospel of the uncircumcision was committed to Paul, as the gospel of the circumcision was to Peter. And therefore, receiving the grace that was given to him; that he was divinely honored and exalted, and apprehended and glorified as themselves; they gave unto him and Barnabas the right hands of fellowship, a symbol whereby they acknowledged their equality with them, and agreed that these should go to the heathen, while they continued to preach to the circumcision; as judging it most agreeable to the mind of Christ, and most conducive to the interest of Christianity, so to divide their work. And thus this meeting ended in harmony and agreement; they approved both Paul's doctrine and conduct, they were fully satisfied in him, heartily embraced him as an apostle of Christ, and had nothing further to add, only that they would remember the poor, which of his own accord he was very forward to do. The Christians of Judea were at that time labouring under great wants and difficulties; and the apostles, out of their compassion to them, added this to their case to Paul, that he should use his interest with the Gentile churches to procure a supply for them. This was a reasonable request; for if the Gentiles were made partakers of their spiritual things, it was their duty to minister to them in carnal things, as Rom. 15. 27. And he very readily falls in with it, whereby he shewed his charitable and catholic disposition; and, how readily he was to own, that in the case of Paul, that he should use his interest with the Gentile churches to procure a supply for them. This was an excellent pattern of Christian charity, and has taught us that we should by no means confine it to those who are just of the same sentiments with us, but be ready to extend it to all whom we have reason to look upon as the disciples of Christ.

11. But when Peter was come to Antioch, I withheld him to the face, because he was to be blamed. 12. For before that certain came from James, he did eat with the Gentiles: but when they were come, he withdrew and separated himself, fearing them which were of the circumcision. 13. And the other Jews dissembled likewise with him; insomuch that Barnabas also was carried away with their dissimulation. 14. But when I saw that they walked not uprightly, according to the truth of the gospel, I said unto Peter before them all, If thou, being a Jew, livest after the manner of Gentiles, and not as do the Jews, why compellest thou the Gentiles to live as do the Jews? 15. We who are Jews by nature, and not sinners of the Gentiles, 16. Knowing that a man is not justified by the works of the law, but by the faith of Jesus Christ, that we might be justified by the faith of Christ, and not by the works of the law: for by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified. 17. But if, while we seek to be justified by Christ, we ourselves also are found sinners, is therefore Christ the minister of sin? God forbid. 18. For if I build again the things which I destroyed, I make myself a transgressor. 19. For I through the law am dead to the law, that I might live unto God. 20. I am crucified with Christ: nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me: and the life which I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me. 21. I do not frustrate the grace of God: for if righteousness come by the law, then Christ is dead in vain.

From the account which Paul gives of what passed between him and the other apostles at Jerusalem, the Galatians might easily discern both the falseness of what his enemies had insinuated against him, and their own folly and weakness in departing from that Gospel which he had preached to them. But, to give the greater weight to what he had already said, and more fully to fortify them against the insinuations of the Judaizing teachers, he acquaints them with another interview which he had with the apostle Peter at Antioch, and what passed between them there, v. 11—14. Antioch was one of the chief churches of the Gentile Christians, as Jerusalem was of those Christians who turned from Judaism to the faith of Christ. There is no colour of reason for the supposition that Peter was bishop of Antioch. If he had, surely Paul would not have withstood him in his own church, as we here find he did: but, on the contrary, it is here spoken of as an occasional visit which he made thither. In their other meeting, there had been good harmony and agreement. Peter and the other apostles had both acknowledged Paul's commission, and approved his doctrine, and they parted very good friends. But in this Paul finds himself obliged to oppose Peter, for he was to be blamed; a plain evidence that he was not inferior to him, and, consequently, of the weakness of the Pope's pretence to supremacy and infallibility, as the successor of Peter.

I. Peter's faults. When he came among the Gentile churches, he complied with them, and did eat with them, though they were not circumcised; agreeably to the instructions which were given in particular to him, (Acts 10,) when he was warned by the heavenly vision, to call nothing common or unclean. But when there came some Jewish Christians from Jerusalem, he grew more shy of the Gentiles, only to humour the Jews: for he esteemed the restraint and fear of giving them offence, which doubtless was to the great grief and discouragement of the Gentile churches. Then he withdrew, and separated himself. His fault herein had an ill influence upon others, for the other Jews also dissembled with him; though before they might be better disposed, yet now, from his example, they took on them to scruple eating with the Gentiles, and pretended they could not in conscience partake the same table with them. 1. The weakness and inconstancy of the best of men, when left to themselves, and how apt they are to falter in their duty to God, out of an undue regard to the pleasing of men. And, 2. The great force of bad examples, especially the examples of great men and good men, such as are in reputation for wisdom and honour.

II. The rebuke which Paul gave him for his fault. Notwithstanding Peter's character, yet, when he observes him thus behaving himself to the great prejudice both of the truth of the gospel and the peace of the church, he is not afraid to reprove him for it. Paul adhered resolutely to his principles, when others faltered in their's; he was as good a Jew as any of them, (for he was a Hebrew of the Hebrews,) but he would magnify his office as the apostle of the Gentiles, and therefore would not see them discouraged and trampled upon. When he saw that they walked not uprightly, according to the truth of the gospel; that they did not live up to that principle which the gospel taught; and which they had professed to own and embrace, namely, That by the death of Christ the partition-wall between Jew and Gentile was taken down, and the observation of the law of Moses was no longer in force; when he observed this, as Peter's offence was public, so he publicly reproved him for it; he said unto him before them all, If thou, being a Jew, livest after the manner of the Gentiles, and not as do the Jews, why compellest thou the Gentiles to live as do the Jews? He in one part of his conduct was a contradiction to the others: for if he was a Jew, could he himself sometimes dispense with the use of the ceremonial law, and live after the manner of the Gentiles, this shewed that he did not look upon the observation of it as still necessary, even for the Jews themselves; and therefore, that he could not consistently with his own practice, impose it upon the Gentile Christians. And yet Paul charges him with this, as representing him as compelling the Gentiles to live as did the Jews; and the same force on this, but this was the tendency of what he did; for it was in effect to signify this, that the Gentiles must comply with the Jews, or else not be admitted into Christian communion.

Paul having thus established his character and office, and sufficiently shewn that he was not inferior to any of the apostles, no not to Peter himself, from the account of the refraction he gave him he takes oc-cision to speak of that great fundamental doctrine of the gospel—that justification is only by faith in Christ, and not by the works of the law, (though some think all that he says to the end of the chapter, is what he said to Peter at Antioch,) which doctrine condemned Peter for his symbolizing with the Jews. But Paul must needs, as a Christian and Christian apostle, assert the gospel is the instrument of our justification, and not the law; then he did very ill in countenancing them who kept up the law, and were for mixing it with faith in the business of our justification. This was the doctrine which Paul had preached among the Galatians, which he still adhered to, and which it is his great business in this epistle to mention and confirm. Now concerning this, Paul acquaints us,

1. That it was the duty of such Christians themselves; " We," says he, "are Jews by nature, and not sinners of the Gentiles; even we who have been born and bred in the Jewish religion, and not among the impure Gentiles; knowing that a man is not justified by the works of the law, but by the faith of Jesus Christ, even we ourselves have believed in Jesus Christ, that we might be justified by the faith of Christ, and not by the works of the law. And is it not manifest that it was the principle of his religion? Thus any justification by the faith of Christ, why then should we hamper ourselves with the law? What did we believe in Christ for? Was it not, that we might be justified by the faith of Christ? And is it not folly to go back to the law, and to expect to be justified either by the merit of moral works, or the influence of any ceremonial sacrifices or purifications? And if it would be wrong in us, if Jews by nature, to mix the law, and expect justification by it, would it not be much more so to require this of the Gentiles, who were never subject to it, since by the works of the law no flesh shall be justified?" To give the greater weight to this, he adds, (v. 17.) "But if, while we seek to be justified by Christ, we ourselves also are found sinners, is Christ the minister of sin? If, while we seek justification by Christ alone, it was the principle of his religion. Thus we are found giving countenance or indulgence to sin, or rather are accounted sinners of the Gentiles, and such as it is not fit to have communion with, unless we also observe the law of Moses; is Christ the minister of sin? Will it not follow, that he is so, if he engages us to receive a doctrine that gives liberty to sin, or by which we are so far from being justified, that we remain impure sinners, and unfit to be considered with the Gentiles? He would have difficulties with the Gentiles, but he rejects it with abhorrence; "God forbid," says he, "that we should entertain such a thought of Christ, or of his doctrine; that thereby he should direct us into a way of justification that is defective and ineffectual, and leave those who embrace it still unjustified, or that would give the least encouragement to sin and sinners." This would be very dishonourable to Christ, and it would be a reproach to the apostles of Christ who have given such a testimony of God's love, (v. 18.) "If I build again the things which I destroyed; if I, (or any other,) who have taught that the observation of the Mosaic law is not necessary to justification, should now, by word or practice, teach or intimate that it is necessary, I make myself a transgressor; I own myself to be still an impure sinner, and to remain under the guilt of sin, notwithstanding the Spirit of God would be liable to be charged with deceit and prevation, and to render me accountable to God inconsistently with myself." Thus does the apostle argue for the great doctrine of justification by faith without the works of the law, from the principles and practice of the Jewish Christians themselves, and from the consequence that would attend their departure from it; whence it appeared, that Peter and the other Jews were much in the way for refusing to communicate with the Gentile Christians, and endeavouring to bring them under the bondage of the law.

2. He acquaints us what his own judgment and practice were.

(1.) That he was dead to the law. Whatever accounts others might make of it, yet, for his part, he had discovered and experienced that it was itself a curse to him. He therefore pronounced a curse against all that continue not in all things written therein, to do them; and therefore he was dead to it, as to all hope of justification and salvation that way. And as for the ceremonial law he also knew that it was now antiquated and superseded by the coming of Christ; and therefore he was the more dead to the law, through the law, which discovered itself to be an enemy to him. Considering the law itself, he saw that justification was not to be expected by the works of it, (since none could perform a perfect obedience to it,) and that there was now no further need of the sacrifices and purifications of it, since they were done away in Christ, and a period was put to them by his offering up himself a Sacrifice for us; and therefore he was dead to the law, as to all the religion of it, and to all the sacrifices and purifications of it. This, therefore, was the law, to which he was dead, and which he had denounced and renounced, as a curse to him.

(2.) That, as he was dead to the law, so he was alive unto God through Jesus Christ; (v. 20.) I am crucified with Christ, &c. And here in his own person he gives us an excellent description of the mysterious life of a believer. [1.] He is crucified, and yet he lives; the old man is crucified, (Rom. 6. 6.) but the new man is living; he is dead to the world, and dead to himself, and crucified to the world, and alive unto God. For, the old man is crucified and ruined, the Gentile soul is mortified, and grace quickened. [2.] He lives in the flesh, and yet not he; this is strange, I live, and yet not I; he lives in the exercise of grace; he has the comforts and the triumphs of grace; and yet that grace is not from himself, but from another. Believers see themselves living in a state of dependence. [3.] He is crucified with Christ, and yet lives in him; this results from his mystical union with Christ, by means of which he is immersed into Christ, which is the life of the soul; as it is crucified, so as by virtue of that to die unto sin; and yet interested in the life of Christ, so as by virtue of that to live unto God. [4.] He lives in the flesh, and yet lives by faith; to outward appearance he lives as other people do, his natural life is supported as others are; yet he has a higher and nobler principle that supports and acts him, that of faith in Christ, and especially the life of faith in Christ, that is, faith in Christ, and faith in himself, as faith in Christ; hence it is, that though he lives in the flesh, yet he does not live after the flesh. Note, They who have true faith, live by that faith; and the great thing which faith fastens upon, is, Christ's loving us, and giving himself for us. The great evidence of Christ's loving us, is, his giving himself for us; and this is that which we are chiefly concerned to mix faith with, in order to our living to him.
The apostle concludes this discourse with acquainting us, that by the doctrine of justification by faith in Christ, without the works of the law, (which he asserted, and others opposed,) he avoided two great difficulties, which the contrary opinion was loaded with; First, That he did not frustrate the grace of God, which the doctrine of justification by the works of the law did; for as he argued them for departing from that of justification by faith without the works of the law; 1. From the example of Abraham’s justification. 2. From the nature and tenure of the law. 3. From the express testimony of the Old Testament; and, 4. From the stability of the covenant of God with man; which, any should hereupon say, Wherefore then serveth the law? he answers, (1.) It was added because of transgressions. (2.) It was given to convince the world of the necessity of a Saviour. (3.) It was designed as a schoolmaster, to bring us to Christ. And then he concludes the chapter, by acquainting us with the privilege of Christians under the gospel state.

1. FOOLISH Galatians, who hath bewitcht you, that ye should not obey the truth, before whose eyes Jesus Christ hath been evidently set forth, crucified among you? 2. This only would I learn of you, Received ye the Spirit by the works of the law, or by the hearing of faith? 3. Are ye so foolish? Having begun in the Spirit, are ye now made perfect by the flesh? 4. Have ye suffered so many things in vain, if it be yet in vain? 5. He therefore that ministereth to you the Spirit, and worketh miracles among you, doeth he it by the works of the law, or by the hearing of faith?

The apostle is here dealing with those who, having embraced the faith of Christ, still continued to seek for justification by the works of the law, who depended upon their own obedience to the moral precepts as their righteousness before God, and, wherein that was defective, had recourse to the legal sacrifices and purifications, to make it up. These he first sharply reproves, and then endeavoureth, by the evidence of truth, to convince them. This is the right method, when we reprove any for a fault or an error, to convince them that it is an error, that it is a fault. He reproves them, and the reproof is very close and warm; he calls them foolish Galatians, v. 1. Though Christians they were Wisdom’s children. Hence, he interrupt Christians they were foolish children. Yea, he asks, Who hath bewitcht you? whereby he represents them as enchanted by the arts and snares of their seducing teachers, and so far deluded as to act very unlike themselves. That wherein their folly and infatuation appeared, was, that they did not obey the truth, they did not adhere to the gospel-way of justification, wherein they had been taught, and which they had professed to embrace. Note, (1.) It is not enough to know the truth, and to say we believe it, but we must obey it too; we must heartily submit to it, and steadfastly abide by it. And, (2.) Those are spiritually bewitcht, who, when the truth as it is in Jesus is plainly set before them, will not thus obey it. Several things proved and aggravating the folly of these Christians.

1. Jesus Christ had been evidently set forth as crucified among them; that is, they had had the doctrine of the cross preached to them, and the sacrament of the Lord’s supper administered among them, in both which Christ crucified had been set before them. Now, it was the greatest madness that could be for them who had had acquaintance with such sacred mysteries, and admissitance to such great solemnities, not to obey the truth which was thus published to them, and signed and sealed in that ordinance. Note, The consideration of the honours and privileges we have been admitted to as Christians, should shame us out of the folly of apostasy and backsliding. 2. He appeals to the experiences they had had of the working of the Spirit upon their souls; (v. 2.) he puts them in mind, that, upon their becoming Christians, they ’thence embraced the Spirit, that many of them at least had been moved by the Spirit, of the sanctifying influences, but of the miraculous gifts, of the Holy Spirit, which were eminent proofs of the truth of the Christian religion and the several doctrines of it, and especially of this, that justification is by Christ only, and not by the works of the law, which was one of the peculiar and fundamental principles of it. To convince them of the folly of departing from this doctrine, he desires to know how they came by these gifts and graces; Was it by the works of the law, that is, the preaching the necessity of these in order to justification? This they could not say, for that doctrine had not then been preached to them, nor had they, as Gentiles, any pretence to justification that way. Or was it by the hearing of faith, that is, the preaching of the doctrine of faith in Christ, as the only way of justification. This, if they had heard the same, and wherein only the way of justification was revealed. And thus they had been brought under the word that is, it was not the word of the Spirit, but the word of men; now they were turning to the law, and expected to be advanced to higher degrees of perfection, by adding the observation of it to faith in Christ, in order to their justification, which could end in nothing but their shame and disappointment: for this, instead of being an improvement upon the gospel, was really a perversion of it, and while they sought to be justified in this way, they were in the opposite of justification, were in the way of becoming no Christians at all; thereby they were pulling down with one hand what they had built with the other, and undoing what they had hitherto done in Christianity. Yea, he further puts them in mind, that they had not only embraced the Christian doctrine, but suffered for it too; and therefore their folly would be the more aggravated, if now they should desert it: for in this case all that they had suffered would be in vain, it would appear that they had been foolish in suffering for what they now despised, and their sufferings would be altogether in vain, and of no advantage to them. Note, (1.) It is the folly of apostates, that they lose the benefit of all they have done in religion, or suffered for it. And, (2.) It is very sad for any to live in an age of services and sufferings, of sabbaths, sermons, and sacraments, in vain; in this case former righteousness shall not be mentioned.

4. He puts them in mind, that they had had ministers among them, (and particularly himself,) who came with a divine seal and commission; for they had ministered the Spirit to them, and wrought miracles among them; and he appeals to them, whether they did it by the works of the law, or by the hearing of faith; whether the doctrine that was preached by them, and confirmed by the miraculous gifts and operations of the Spirit, was that of justification by the works of the law, or by the faith of Christ: they very well knew that it was not the former, but the latter; and therefore must needs be inexcusable in forsaking a doctrine which had been so signally owned and attested, and exchanging it for one that had received no such attestations.

5. Even as Abraham believed God, and it was accounted to him for righteousness.

6. Know ye therefore that they which are of faith, the same are the children of Abraham.

7. For as many are of the works of the law are under the curse: for it is written, Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things which are written in the book of the law, to do them. But that no man is justified by the law in the sight of God, it is evident: for, The just shall live by faith. And the law is not of faith: but, The man that doeth them shall live in them. Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us: for it is written, Cursed is every one that hangeth on a tree: 14. That the blessing of Abraham might come on the Gentiles through Jesus Christ; that we might receive the promise of the Spirit through faith. Brethren, I speak after the manner of men; though it be but a man's covenant, yet, if it be confirmed, no man disannulleth, or addeth thereto. Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made. He saith not, And to seeds, as of many; but as of one, and to thy seed, which is Christ. And this I say, that the covenant, which was confirmed before of God in Christ, the law, which was four hundred and thirty years after, cannot disannul, that it should make the promise of no effect. For if the inheritance be of the law, it is no more of promise: but God gave it to Abraham by promise.

The apostle having reproved the Galatians for their not obeying the truth, and endeavoured to impress them with a sense of their folly herein; in these verses he largely proves the doctrine which he and had maintained, viz. justification by faith, and setting of; namely, that of justification by faith without the works of the law. This he does several ways.

I. From the example of Abraham's justification. This argument the apostle uses, Rom. 4. Abraham believed God, and that was accounted to him for righteousness; (v. 6.) his faith fastened upon the word and promise of God, and upon his believing he was owned and accepted of God as a righteous man; and this he did not by the works of the law, but by the hearing of faith, that is, by the doctrine, word, or promise of God; and from thence infers, that he who is of faith, is, true believer, of what nation soever they are, are blessed with faithful Abraham. They are blessed with Abraham the father of the faithful, by the promise made to him, and therefore by faith as he was. It was through faith in the promise of God that he was blessed, and it is only in the same way that others obtain this privilege.

He proves, that we cannot be justified but by faith fastening on the gospel, because the law condemns us. If we put ourselves upon trial in that court, and stand to the sentence of it, we are certainly cast, and lost, and undone; for, as many as are of the works of the law, are under the curse; as many as depend upon the merit of their own works as their righteousness, as plead not guilty, and insist upon this account. He is represented as the case of all certainly against them; for, if it is written, Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things which are written in the book of the law, to do them, v. 10. and Deut. 27. 26. The condition of life, by the law, is, perfect, personal, and perpetual, obedience; the language of it is, Do this, and live; or, as v. 12. The man that doeth them shall live in them: and for every failure herein the law denounces a curse. Brethren, I speak after the manner of men; though it be but a man's covenant, yet, if it be confirmed, no man disannulleth, or addeth thereto. Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made. He saith not, And to seeds, as of many; but as of one, and to thy seed, which is Christ. And this I say, that the covenant, which was confirmed before of God in Christ, the law, which was four hundred and thirty years after, cannot disannul, that it should make the promise of no effect. For if curse of the law, &c. A strange method it was which Christ took to redeem us from the curse of the law, it was by his being himself made a Curse for us; being made Sin for us, he was made a Curse for us; not separated from God, but laid for the present under that infamous token of the divine displeasure, which the law of Moses had put a particular brand upon, Deut. 21. 23. The design of this, was, that the blessing of Abraham might come on the Gentiles through Jesus Christ: that all who believe on Christ, whether Jews or Gentiles, might become heirs of Abraham's blessing, and particularly of that great promise of the Spirit, which was peculiarly connected with the times of the gospel. Hence it appeared, that it was not by putting themselves under the law, but by faith in Christ, that they became the people of God and heirs of the promise. Here note, 1. The misery which as sinners we are sunk into; we are under the curse and condemnation of the law. 2. The love and grace of our Lord Jesus Christ towards us; he has submitted to be made a Curse for us, that he might redeem us from the curse of the law. 3. The happy prospect which we now have through him, not only of escaping the curse, but of inheriting the blessing. And, 4. That it is only through faith in him that we can hope to obtain this favour.

III. To prove that justification is by faith, and not by the works of the law, the apostle alleges the express testimony of the Old Testament, v. 11. The phrase is ref. 2. 4. 15, 16. The just shall live by faith; it is again quoted, Rom. 1. 17. and Heb. 10. 38. The design of it is, to shew that they only are just or righteous, who do truly live, who are freed from death and wrath, and restored into a state of life in the favour of God; and that it is only through faith that persons become righteous, and as such obtain life and happiness; that they are accepted of God, and enabled to live to him now, and are entitled to an eternal life in the enjoyment of him hereafter. Hence the apostle says, It is evident that no man is justified by the law in the sight of God. Whatever he may be in the account of others, yet he is not so in the sight of God, for the law is not of faith; that says nothing concerning faith in the business of justification, nor does it give life to those who believe; but the language of it is, The man that doeth them, shall live in them. Law requires presence as the condition of life, and therefore now can by no means be the rule of our justification: this argument of the apostle's may give us occasion to remark, That justification by faith is no new doctrine, but what was established and taught in the church of God, long before the times of the gospel. Yea, it is the only way wherein any sinners ever were, or can be justified.

IV. To this purpose the apostle urges the stability of the covenant which God made with Abraham, which was not vacated or disannulled by the giving of the law to Moses, v. 15. &c. Faith had the precedence of the law, for Abraham was justified by faith. It was a promise that he built upon, and promises are the proper objects of faith. God entered into covenant with Abraham, (v. 8.) and this covenant is still in force; even as it was, and are so, and therefore much more his. When a deed is executed, or articles of agreement are sealed, both parties are bound, and it is too late then to settle things otherwise; and therefore it is not to be supposed that by the subsequent law the covenant of God should be vacated. The original word diobian signifies both a covenant and a testament. Now the promise made to Abraham, was rather a testament than a covenant. When a testament is become of force by the death of the testator, it is not capable of being altered; and therefore the promise that was given to Abraham, being of the nature of a testament, it remains firm and unalterable. But if it should be said that a grant or testament may be disannulled for want of persons to claim the benefit of it, (v. 16.) he shews that there is no danger of that in this case. Abraham is dead, and the prophets are dead, but the covenant is made with Abraham and his Seed. And he gives us a very surprising exposition of that. We should have thought it had been meant only of the people of the Jews. "Nay," says the apostle, "it is in the singular number, and points at a single person—that Seed is Christ." So that the covenant is still in force; for Christ abideth for ever in his person, and in his spiritual seed, who are his by faith. And if it be objected, that the law which was given by Moses, did disannul this covenant, because that insisted so much upon works, and there was so little in it of faith, or of the promised Messiah; he answers, that the subsequent law could not disannul the precedent covenant or promise; (v. 18.) If the inheritance be of the law, it is no more of promise; but, says he, God gave it to Abraham by promise; and therefore it would be inconsistent with his holiness, wisdom, and faithfulness, by any subsequent act to set aside the promise, and so alter the way of justification, which he had thus established. If the inheritance was given to Abraham by promise, and thereby entailed upon his spiritual seed, we may be sure that God would not retract that promise; for he is not a man, that he should repent.

19. Wherefore then serveth the law? It was added because of transgressions, till the seed should come to whom the promise was made; and it was ordained by angels in the hand of a mediator. 20. Now a mediator is not a mediator of one, but God is one. 21. Is the law then against the promises of God? God forbid: for if there had been a law given which could have given life, verily righteousness should have been by the law. 22. But the scripture hath concluded all under sin, that the promise by faith of Jesus Christ might be given to them that believe. 23. But before faith came, we were kept under the law, shut up unto the faith which should afterwards be revealed. 24. Wherefore the law was our schoolmaster, to bring us unto Christ, that we might be justified by faith. 25. But after faith came, we are no longer under a schoolmaster. 26. For ye are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus. 27. For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ. 28. There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female: for ye are all one in Christ Jesus. 29. And if ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise.

The apostle having just before been speaking of the promise made to Abraham, and representing that as the rule of our justification, and not the law, lest they should think he did too much derogate from the law, and render it altogether useless, he thence takes occasion to discourse of the design and tendency of it, and to acquaint us for what purposes it was given. It might be asked, "If that promise was sufficient for salvation, wherefore then serve the law? Or why did God give the law by Moses?"

To this he answers;

1. The law was added because of transgressions, v. 19. It was not designed to disannul the promise, and to establish a different way of justification from that which was settled by the promise: but it was added to it, annexed on purpose to be subservient to it; and it was so because of transgressions. The Israelites, though they were chosen to be God's peculiar people, were sinners as well as others, and therefore the law was given to convince them of their sin, and of their obnoxiousness to the divine law, and thus to lead them to see that they needed a Saviour, and that the wisdom, the knowledge of sin, (Rom. 3. 20,) and the law entered, that sin might abound, Rom. 5. 20. And it was also intended to restrain them from the commission of sin, to put an awe upon their minds, and be a curb upon their lusts, that they should not run into that excess of riot which they were naturally inclined to; and yet at the same time it was designed to direct them to the true and only way whereby sin was to be expiated, and wherein they might obtain the pardon of it, namely, through the death and sacrifice of Christ, which was the special use for which the law of sacrifices and purifications was given.

The apostle adds, that the law was given for this purpose, till the Seed should come to whom the promise was made; that is, either till Christ should come, (the principal Seed) to make it effectual to the Israelites, as he had before shewn,) or till the gospel-dispensation should take place, when Jews and Gentiles, without distinction, should, upon believing, become the seed of Abraham. The law was added because of transgressions, till this fulness of time, or this complete dispensation, was come. But when the Seed was come, and a fuller discovery of divine grace in the promise was made, then the law, as given by Moses, was to cease; that covenant, being found faulty, was to give place to another, and a better, Heb. 8. 7, 8. And though the law, considered as the law of nature, is always in force, and still continues to be of use, to convince men of sin, and to restrain them from it; yet we are now no longer under the bondage and terror of that legal covenant. The law then was not intended to discover another way of justification, different from that revealed by the gospel; but it was to lead men to see that the promise of the gospel, by shewing them the sinfulness of sin, and to point them to Christ, through whom alone they could be pardoned and justified.

As a further proof that the law was not designed to vacate the promise, the apostle adds, It was ordained by angels in the hand of a mediator. It was given to different persons, and in a different manner from that on which the law was annexed to it in the Jewish dispensation. The promise was made to Abraham, and all his spiritual seed, including believers of all nations, even of the Gentiles as well as Jews; but the law was given to the Israelites as a peculiar people, and separated from the rest of the world. And whereas the promise was given immediately by God himself, the law was given by the ministry of angels, through Moses. Hence, it appeared, that the law could not be designed to disannul the promise; for, (v. 20.) A mediator is not a mediator of one, of one party only; but God is one, but one party in the promise or covenant made with Abraham: and therefore it is not to be supposed that by a transaction which passed only between him and the nation of the Jews, he should make void a promise which was given by God, to Abram and his spiritual seed, whether Jews or Gentiles.

This would not have been consistent with his wisdom, or with his truth and faithfulness. Moses was only a mediator between God and the Israelites, not between God and the spiritual seed of Abraham; and therefore the law that was given by him, could not affect the promise made to them, much less be subversive of it.

2. The law was given to convince men of the necessity of a Saviour. The apostle asks, (v. 21.) as what some might be ready to object, "Is the law then against the promises of God? Do they really clash and interfere with each other? Or do ye not set the covenant with Abraham, and the law of Moses, at variance with one another?" To this he answers, God forbid; he was far from entertaining such a thought, nor could it be inferred from what he said, that the law and the gospel were at variance, but that with the promise, but subservient to it, as the design of it is to discover men's transgressions, and to shew them the need they have of a better righteousness than that of the law. That consequence would much rather follow from their doctrine than from his; for if there had been a law given, that could have given life, verily righteousness should have been by the law; and in that case the promise would have been absolutely and entirely nullified, and it must have been that in our present state could not be, for the scripture hath concluded all under sin, (v. 22,) or declared that all, both Jew and Gentile, are in a state of guilt, and therefore unable to attain to righteousness and justification by the works of the law. That discovered their wounds, but could not afford them a remedy: it shewed that they were guilty, because it apprised them of the insufficiency of the law, which was manifestly insufficient to take away sin: and therefore the great design of it, was, that the promise by faith of Jesus Christ might be given to them that believe; that, being convinced of their guilt, and the insufficiency of the law to effect a righteousness for them, they might be persuaded to believe on Christ, and so obtain the benefit of the promise.

III. The law was designed for a schoolmaster, to bring men to Christ, v. 24. In the foregoing verse, the apostle acquaints us with the state of the Jews under the Mosaic economy; that before faith came, or before Christ appeared, and the doctrine of justification by faith in him was more fully discovered, they were kept under the law, obliged, under severe penalties, to a strict observance of the various precepts of it; and at that time they were shut up, held under the terror and discipline of it, as prisoners in a dark dungeon, and in prison, Acts 28. 30. and thereby they might be disposed more readily to embrace the faith which should afterward be revealed, or be persuaded to accept Christ when he came into the world, and to fall in with the better dispensation he was to introduce, whereby they were to be freed from bondage and servitude, and brought into a state of greater light and liberty. Now, in that state, he tells them, the law was their schoolmaster, to bring them to Christ, that they might be justified by faith.

As it declared the mind and will of God concerning them, and at the same time denounced a curse against them for every failure in their duty, so it was proper to convince them of their lost and undone condition in themselves, and to let them see the weakness and insufficiency of their own righteousness to recommend them for admission to the gospel sacrifice, &c. which, though they could not of themselves take away sin, were typical of Christ, and of the great sacrifice which he was to offer up for the expiation of it, so it directed them (though in a more dark and obscure manner) to him as their only Relief and Refuge. And thus it was their schoolmaster, to instruct and govern them in their state of wrath and condemnation, when the word rudest, most properly signifies, their want, to lead and conduct them to Christ, as children were wont to be led to school by those servants who had the care of them,) that they might be more fully instructed by him as their Schoolmaster, in the true way of justification and salvation, which is only by faith in him, and which he was appointed to give the fullest and clearest discoveries of. But lest it should be said, If the law was of this use and service under the Jewish, why may it not continue to be so under the Christian state too; the apostle adds, (v. 25.) that after faith is come, and the gospel-dispensation had taken place, under which Christ, and the way of pardon and life through faith in him, are set in the clearest light, we are no longer under a schoolmaster; we have now need of the law to direct us to him, as there was then.

Thus the apostle acquaints us for what uses and purposes the law served. From what he says concerning this matter, we may observe, 1. The goodness of God to his people of old, in giving the law to them: for though, in comparison of the gospel-state, it was a dispensation of darkness and terror, yet it furnished them with sufficient means and helps, both for the preservation of their freedom, and to encourage their hopes in him. 2. The great fault and folly of the Jews, in mistaking the design of the law, and abusing it to a very different purpose from that which God intended in the giving of it: for they expected to be justified by the works of it; whereas it was never designed to be the rule of their justification, but only a means of convincing the ignorance and sinfulness of their national Saviour, and of directing them to Christ, and faith in him, as the only way of obtaining this privilege. See Rom. 9. 31, 32.—10. 3, 4. 3. The great advantage of the gospel-state above the legal, under which we not only enjoy a clearer discovery of divine grace and mercy than was afforded to the Jews of old, but are also freed from the state of bondage and terror under which they were held. We are not now treated as children in a state of minority, but as sons, grown up to a full age, who are admitted to greater freedoms, and instated in larger privileges, than they were. This the apostle enlarges upon in the following verses. For, having shewn for what intent the law was given, in the close of the chapter he acquaints us with our privilege by Christ: where he particularly declares,

(1.) That we are the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus, v. 26. And here we may observe, [1.] The great and excellent privilege which real Christians enjoy under the gospel; they are the children of God; they are no longer accounted servants, but sons; they are not now kept at such a distance, and under such restraints, as the Jews were, but are allowed a nearer and freer access to God than was granted to them; yea, they are admitted into the number, and become the sons of God, with all the privileges of his children. [2.] How they come to obtain this privilege, and that is by faith in Christ Jesus; having accepted him as their Lord and Saviour, and relying on him alone for justification and salvation, they are hereupon admitted into this happy relation to God, and are entitled to the privileges of it: for (John 1. 12.) as many as received him, to he power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name. And this faith in Christ, whereby they became the children of God, he reminds us, (v. 27.) was what they professed in baptism; for he adds, As many of you as have been baptized into Christ, have put on Christ. Having in baptism professed their faith in him, they were thereby devoted to him, and had, as it were, put on his livery, and declared themselves to be his servants and disciples; and being thus become the members of Christ, they were through him owned and accounted as the children of God. Here note, First, Baptism is now the solemn rite of our admission into the Christian church, as circumcision was into that of the Jews. Our Lord Jesus appointed it to be so, in the commission he gave to his apostles; (Matt. 28. 19.) and accordingly it was the mode in which those who had discipled to the Christian faith; and perhaps the apostle might take notice of their baptism here, and of their becoming the children of God through faith in Christ, professed therein, to obviate a further objection, which the false teachers might be apt to urge in favour of circumcision. They might be ready to say, Though it should be allowed that the law was given to man, when they were abrogated by the coming of Christ the promised Seed; yet why should circumcision be set aside too, when that was given to Abraham together with the promise, and long before the giving of the law by Moses? But this difficulty is sufficiently removed, when the apostle says, They who are baptized into Christ, have put on Christ: for from thence it appears, that under the gospel, baptism comes in the room of circumcision, and that they who are baptized are devoted to Christ, and do sincerely believe in him, are to all intents and purposes as much admitted into the privileges of the Christian state, as the Jews were by circumcision into those of the legal, (Phil. 3. 3.) and therefore there was no reason why the use of that should still be continued. Note, Secondly, In our baptism we put on Christ, wherein we profess our discipleship to him, and are obliged to behave ourselves so as to become the real children of faith, baptized into Christ, we are baptized into his death, that as he died and rose again, so, in conformity thereto, we should die unto sin, and walk in newness of life; (Rom. 6. 3, 4.) it would be of great advantage to us, did we often remember this.

(2.) That this privilege of being the children of God, and of being by baptism devoted to Christ, is now enjoyed in common by all real Christians. The law indeed made a difference between Jew and Greek, giving the Jews on many accounts the pre-eminence: that also made a difference between bond and free, master and servant, and between male and female, the males being circumcised; but it is not so now, they all stand on the same level, and are all one in Christ Jesus: as the one is not accepted on the account of any national or personal advantages they enjoy, the other is the other rejected for the want of them; but all who sincerely believe on Christ, of what nation, or sex, or condition, soever they be, are accepted of him, and become the children of God through faith in him.

(3.) That, being Christ's, we are Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise. Their Judaizing teachers would make them believe that they must be circumcised and keep the law of Moses, or they could not be the children of God, or heirs of promise; and that there is no need of that; for if ye be Christ's, if ye sincerely believe on him, who is the promised Seed, in whom all the nations of the earth were to be blessed, ye thereby become the true seed of Abraham, the father of the faithful, and as such are heirs according to the promise, and consequently are entitled to the great blessings and privileges of it. And therefore, because since it appeared that justification was not to be attained by the works of the law, but only by faith in Christ, and that the law of Moses was a temporary institution, and was given for such purposes as were only subservient to, and not subservive of, the promise; and that now, under the gospel, Christians enjoy much greater and better privileges than the Jews did under that dispensation; it must needs follow, that they were very unreasonable and unwise, in heartening to those who at once endeavoured to deprive them of the truth and liberty of the gospel.
CHAP. IV.

The apostle, in this chapter, is still carrying on the same general design as in the former—to recover these Christians from their mistaken ideas in relation to the conduct of the judaizing teachers, and to represent their weakness and folly in suffering themselves to be drawn away from the gospel-doctrine of justification, and to be deprived of their freedom from the bondage of the law of Moses. For this purpose he makes use of various considerations; such as, I. The great excellency of the gospel-state above the legal, v. 1. 7. II. The happy change that was made in them at their conversion: v. 8. III. The affection they had had for him and his ministry, v. 12. 16. IV. The character of the false teachers by whom they had been perverted, v. 17, 18. V. The very tender affection he had for them, v. 19, 20. VI. The apostle's own tenderest love, and his and his fellow-spirits affection, as taken from which he illustrates the difference between such as rested in Christ and such as trusted in the law. And in all these, as he uses great plainness and faithfulness with them, so he expresses the tenderest concern for them.

1. NOW I say, that the heir, as long as he is a child, differeth nothing from a servant, though he be Lord of all; 2. But is under tutors and governors until the time appointed of the father. 3. Even so we, when we were children, were in bondage under the elements of the world: 4. But when the fulness of the time was come, God sent forth his Son, made of a woman, made under the law, 5. To redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons. 6. And because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father. 7. Wherefore thou art no more a servant, but a son; and if a son, then an heir of God through Christ.

In this chapter the apostle deals plainly with those who heartenked to the judaizing teachers, who cried up the law of Moses in competition with the gospel of Christ, and endeavored to bring them under the bondage of it. To convince them of their folly, and to rectify their mistake herein, in these verses he prosecutes the comparison of a child under age, which he had touched upon in the foregoing chapter; and thence shews what great advantages we have now, under the gospel, above what they had under the law. And here:—

1. He acquaints us with the state of the Old Testament church: it was like a child under age, and it was used accordingly, being kept in a state of darkness and bondage, in comparison of the greater light and liberty which we enjoy under the gospel. That was indeed a dispensation of grace, and yet it was comparatively a dispensation of darkness: for as the heir, in his minority, is under tutors and governors till the time appointed of his father, by whom he is educated and instructed in those things which, at present he knows little of the meaning of, though afterward they are likely to be of great use to him; so it was with the Old Testament church—the Mosaic economy, which they were under, was what they could not fully understand the meaning of; for, as the apostle says, (2 Cor. 3. 13.) They could not steadfastly look to the end of that which was abolished.

But to the church, when grown up to the purpose in gospel-days, it becomes of great use. And as that was a dispensation of darkness, so of bondage too; for they were in bondage under the elements of the world, being tied to a great number of burdensome rites and observances, by which, as by a kind of first rudiments, they were taught and instructed, and whereby they were kept in a state of subjection, like a child under tutors and governors. The church then lay more under the character of a servant, being obliged to do every thing according to the command of God, without being fully acquainted with the reason of it; but the service under the gospel appears to be more reasonable than that was. The time appointed of the Father being come, when the church was to arrive at its full age, they were in the darkness of bondage under which it before lay are removed, and we are under a dispensation of greater light and liberty.

II. He acquaints us with the much happier state of Christians under the gospel-dispensation, v. 4—7. When the fulness of time was come, the time appointed of the Father, when he would put an end to legal dispensation, and set up another and a better in the room of it, he sent forth his Son, &c. The apostle who speaks, means hereby, that this new dispensation, was no other than the Son of God himself, the only begotten of the Father; who, as he had been prophesied of, and promised, from the foundation of the world, so in due time he was manifested for this purpose. He, in pursuance of the great design he had undertaken, submitted to be made of a woman; there is his incarnation—and to be made under the law; there is his subjection. He who was of God, for ever to reign in heaven, he who was Lord of all, consented to come into a state of subjection, and to take upon him the form of a servant; and one great end of all this, was, To redeem them that were under the law; to save us from that intolerable yoke, and to appoint gospel-ordinances more rational and easy. He had indeed something more and greater in his view, in coming into the world, than merely to deliver us from the bondage of the law, and to restore us to that simplicity of nature, and consented to suffer and die for us, that hereby he might redeem us from the wrath of God, and from the curse of the moral law, which, as sinners, we all lay under. But that was one end of it, and a mercy reserved to be bestowed at the time of his manifestation; then the more servile state of the church was to come to a period, and a better to succeed in the place of it; for he was sent to redeem that which we had received the adoption of sons: we might no longer be accounted and treated as servants, but as sons grown up to maturity, who are allowed greater freedoms, and admitted to larger privileges, than while they were under tutors and governors. This the course of the apostle's argument leads us to take notice of, as one thing intended by this expression, though, no doubt, it may also be underwood was signifying this glorious state of which the gospel so often speaks of, as the privilege of those who believe in Christ. Israel was God's son, his first-born, Rom. 9. 4. But now, under the gospel, particular believers receive the adoption; and, as an earnest and evidence of it, they have together therewith the Spirit of adoption, putting them upon the duty of prayer, and enabling them in prayer to cry God as a Father; (v. 6.) Because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father. And hereupon, (v. 7.) the apostle concludes this argument, by adding, Wherefore thou art no more a servant, but a son; and if a son, then an heir of God through Christ; that is, Now, under the gospel-state, we are no longer under the servitude of the law, but, upon our believing in Christ, become the sons of God; and therefore, when once accepted of him, and adopted by him; and, being the sons, we are also heirs of God, and are entitled to the heavenly inheritance: (as he also reasons, Rom. 8. 17.) and therefore it must needs be the greatest weakness and folly to turn back to the law, and to seek justification by the works of it. From what the apostle says in these verses, we may observe,
1. The wonders of divine love and mercy towards us, particularly of God the Father, in sending his Son into the world to redeem and save us; of the Son of God, in submitting so low, and suffering so much, for us, in pursuit of that design; and of the Holy Spirit, in condescending to dwell in the hearts of believers for such gracious purposes.

2. The great and invaluable advantages which Christians enjoy under the gospel: for, (1.) We receive the adoption of sons. Whence note, It is the great privilege which believers have through Christ, that they are adopted children of the God of heaven. We who by nature are children of wrath and disobedience, are become by grace children of love. (2.) We receive the Spirit of adoption. Note, [1.] All who have the privilege of adoption, have the Spirit of adoption; all who are received into the number, partake of the nature, of the children of God; for he will have all his children to resemble him. [2.] The Spirit of adoption is always the Spirit of prayer, and it is our duty in prayer to eye God as a Father. Christ has taught us in prayer to eye God as our Father in heaven. [3.] If we are his sons, then his heirs. It is not so among men, with whom the eldest son is heir; but all God's children are heirs; they who have the nature of sons, shall have the inheritance of sons.

3. Howbeit then, when ye knew not God, ye did service unto them who by nature are no gods. 9. But now, after that ye have known God, or rather are known of God, how turn ye again to the weak and beggarly elements, whereunto ye desire again to be in bondage? 10. Ye observe days, and months, and times, and years. 11. I am afraid of you, lest I have bestowed upon you labour in vain.

In these verses the apostle puts them in mind of what they were before their conversion to the faith of Christ, and what a blessed change their conversion had made upon them; and thence endeavours to convince them of their great weakness in hearkening to those who would bring them under the bondage of the law of Moses.

I. He reminds them of their past state and behaviour, and what they were before the gospel was preached to them; then they knew not God, they were grossly ignorant of the true God, and the way wherein he is to be worshipped: and at that time they were under the worst of slaveries, for they did service to them which by nature were no gods; they were employed in a great number of superstitions and idolatrous services to those, who, though they were accounted gods, were yet really no gods, but mere creatures, and perhaps of their own making, and thereby deprived them of the knowledge of the true God.

Note, 1. Those who are ignorant of the true God, cannot but be inclined to false gods. Those who forsook the God who made the world, rather than be without gods, worshipped such as they themselves made. 2. Religious worship is due to none but to him who is by nature God; for when the apostle blames the doing service to such as by nature were no gods, he plainly shews that He only is to be worshipped, (and that design was, to worship the proper Object of our religious worship.

II. He calls upon them to consider the happy change that was made in them by the preaching of the gospel among them. Now they had known God; they were brought to the knowledge of the true God and of his Son Jesus Christ, whereby they were recovered out of the ignorance and bondage under which they before lay: or rather were known of God; this happy change in their state, whereby they were turned from idols to the living God, and through Christ had received the adoption of sons, was not owing to themselves, but to him; it was the effect of his free and rich grace toward them, and in such things they were to rejoice, and thereby they were laid under the greater obligation to adhere to the liberty wherewith he had made them free. Note, All our acquaintance with God begins with him; we know him, because we are known of him.

III. Hence he infers the unreasonableness and madness of their suffering themselves to be brought again into a state of bondage; he speaks of it with surprise and deep concern of mind, that such as they should do so; How turn ye again, &c. says he, v. 9. "How is it that ye, who have been taught to worship God in the gospel-way, should now be persuaded to comply with the ceremonial-way of worship; that ye, who have been acquainted with a dispensation of light, liberty, and love, as that of the gospel is, should now submit to a dispensation of darkness, and bondage, and terror, as that of the law?" The apostle has shewn that they had never been under the law of Moses, as the Jews had been; and therefore on this account they were more inexcusable than the Jews themselves, who might be supposed to have some fondness for that which had been of so long standing among them. Besides, what they suffered themselves to be brought into bondage to, were but weak and beggarly elements, such things as had no power in them to cleanse the soul, or to afford any solid satisfaction to the mind, and which were only designed for that state of papillage under which the church had been, and which was now come to a period; and therefore their weakness and folly were the more aggravated, in submitting to them, and in symbolizing with the Jews in observing their various festivals, here signified by days, months, times, and years. Here note, 1. It is possible for those who have made great professions of religion, to be afterward drawn into very great defections from the purity and simplicity of it, for this was the case of these Christians. And, 2. The more mercy God has shewn to any, in bringing them into an acquaintance with the gospel, and the liberties and privileges of it, the greater are their sin and folly, in suffering themselves to be deprived of them; for this the apostle lays a special stress upon, that, after they had known God, or rather were known of him, they desired to be in bondage under the weak and beggarly elements of the law.

IV. Hereupon he expresses his fears concerning them, lest he had bestowed on them labour in vain. He had been at a great deal of pains about them, in preaching the gospel to them, and endeavouring to confirm them in the faith and liberty of it; but now they were giving up the soul, and the rendering of the labour and the trouble that was inflicted upon them, he could not but be deepely affected with the thoughts of. Note, 1. A great deal of the labour of faithful ministers is labour in vain; and when it is so, it cannot but be a great grief to those who desire the salvation of souls. Note, 2. The labour of ministers is in vain upon those who begin in the Spirit, and end in the flesh; who, though they seem to set well, yet at last turn aside from the way of the gospel. Note, 3. Those still shall have a great deal to answer for, upon whom the faithful ministers of Jesus Christ bestow labour in vain.

12. Brethren, I beseech you, be as I am; for I am as ye are: ye have not injured me at all. 13. Ye know how through infirmity of the flesh I preached the gospel unto you at the first. 14. And my temptation which was in the flesh ye despised not, nor rejected; but received me as an angel of God, even as Christ Jesus. 15. Where is then the blessedness ye spake of? For I bear you record, that, if it had been possible, ye would have plucked out your own eyes, and have given them to me. 16. Am I therefore become your enemy, because I tell you the truth?

That these Christians might be the more ashamed of their defection from the truth of the gospel which Paul had preached to them, he here reminds them of the great affection they formerly had for him and his ministry, and puts them upon considering how very unsuitable their present behaviour was to what they then professed. And here we may observe,

I. How affectionately he addresses himself to them, as he styles them brethren, though he knew their hearts were in a great measure alienated from him. He desires that all resentments might be laid aside, and that they would bear the same temper of mind toward him, which he did to them; he would have them to be as he was, for he was as they were, and moreover tells them that they had not injured him at all. He had no quarrel with them upon his own account; though, in blaming their conduct, he had spoken to them with some warmth and concern of mind. He assures them that it was not owing to any sense of personal injury or affront, (as they might be ready to think,) but proceeded wholly from a zeal for the truth and purity of the gospel, and their welfare and happiness. Thus he endeavours to mollify their spirits toward him, that so they might be the better disposed to receive the admonitions he was giving them; hereby he teaches us, that in our reproving others we should take care to convince them that our reproofs do not proceed from any private pique or resentment, but from a sincere regard to the honour of God and religion, and their true welfare; for then they are likely to be most successful, when they appear to be most disinterested.

II. How he magnifies their former affection to him, that hereby they might be the more ashamed of their present behaviour toward him. To this purpose, I. He puts them in mind of the difficulty under which he laboured when he came first among them; Ye know, says he, how, through infirmity of the flesh, I preached the gospel unto you at the first. What this infirmity of the flesh was, which in the following words he expresses by his temptation that was in his flesh, (though, no doubt, it was well known to these Christians to whom he wrote,) we can have no certain knowledge of: some take it to have been the persecutions which he suffered for the gospel's sake; others, to have been something in his person, or manner of speaking, which might render his ministry less grateful and acceptable, referring to 2 Cor. 10. 10. and to ch. 12. 7—9. But, whatever it was, it seems it made no impression on them to this Christians to whom he wrote, (as he taketh.) nevertheless this his infirmity, (which might possibly lessen him in the esteem of some others,) they did not despise or reject him on the account of it, but, on the contrary, received him as an angel of God, even as Christ Jesus; they showed a great deal of respect to him; he was a welcome messenger to them, even as though an angel of God or Jesus Christ himself had preached to them. Yea, so great was their esteem of him, that, if it would have been any advantage to him, they could have plucked out their own eyes, and have given them to him. Note, How uncertain the respects of people are, how apt they are to change their minds, and are easily they are drawn into a contempt of those for whom they once had the greatest respect and affection, so that they are ready to pluck out the eyes of those for whom they would before have plucked out their own! We should therefore labour to be accepted of God, for it is a small thing to be judged of men's judgment, 1 Cor. 4. 3. III. How earnestly he expostulates with them hereupon; Where is then, says he, the blessedness ye spake of? As he had said, "Time was, when you expressed the greatest joy and satisfaction in the glad tidings of the gospel, and were very forward in pouring out your blessings upon me, as the publisher of them; whence is it that you are now so much altered, that you have so little relish of them, or respect for me? You once thought yourselves happy in receiving the gospel; have you now any reason to think otherwise?" Note, Those who have left their first love, would do well to consider, Where is now the blessedness they once spake of, what is become of that pleasure they used to take in communion with God, and in the company of his servants? The more to impress upon them a just shame of their present conduct, he again asks, (v. 16.) "Am I become your enemy, because I tell you the truth? How is it that I, who was heretofore your favourite, am now accounted your enemy? Can you pretend any other reason, that, that ye have for disapproving and disengaged to acquaint you with, and to confirm you in, the truth of the gospel? And if not, how unreasonable must your disaffection be!" Note, 1. It is no uncommon thing for men to account those their enemies, who are really their best friends; for so, undoubtedly, those are, whether ministers or others, who tell them the truth, and deal freely and faithfully with them in matters relating to the salvation of their souls. He argues thus, that as the apostle did with these Christian Ministers, may sometimes create enemies to themselves by the faithful discharge of their duty: for this was the case of Paul, he was accounted their enemy for telling them the truth. 3. Yet ministers must not forbear speaking the truth, for fear of offending others, and drawing their displeasure upon them. 4. They may be easy in their own minds, when they are conscious to themselves, that, if others are become their enemies, it is only for telling them the truth.

17. They zealously affect you, but not well; yea, they would exclude you, that ye might affect them. 18. But it is good to be zealously affected always in a good thing, and not only when I am present with you.

The apostle is still carrying on the same design as in the foregoing verses, which was, to convince the Galatians of their sin and folly in departing from the truth of the gospel: having just before been expostulating with them about the change of their behaviour toward him who endeavoured to establish them in it, he here gives them the character of those false teachers who made it their business to drive them away from it; which if they would attend to, they might soon see how little reason they had to hearken to them: whatever opinion they might have of them, he tells them they were designing men, who were aiming to set up themselves, and who, under their specious pretences, were more consulting their own interest than theirs; They zealously affect you, says he; they shew a mighty respect for you, and pretend a great deal of affection to you, but not well; they do it not with any good design.
they are not sincere and upright in it, for they would exclude you, that ye might affect them; that which they are chiefly aiming at, is, to engage your affections to them; in order to this, they are doing all they can to draw off your affections from me, and from the truth, that so they may engross you to themselves. This, he assures them, was their design, and therefore they must needs be very unwise in hearkening to them. Note, 1. There may appear to be a great deal of zeal, where yet there is but little truth and sincerity. Observe, 2. It is the usual way of seducers, to insinuate themselves into people's affections, and by that means to draw them into their opinions. 3. Whatever pretences such may make, they have usually more regard to their own interest than that of others, and will not stick at ruining the reputation of others, if by that means they can raise their own. On this occasion the apostle gives us that excellent rule which we have, v. 18. It is good to be zealously affected always in a good thing. What our translation renders in a good thing, some choose to render to a good man, and so consider the apostle as pointing to himself; this sense, they think, is favoured both by the preceding context, and also by the words immediately following, and not only when I am present with you: which may be as if he had said, "Time was, when ye were zealously affected toward me; once took me for a good man, and have now no reason to think otherwise of me; surely then it would become you to shew the same regard to me, now that I am absent from you, which ye did when I was present with you." But if we adhere to our own translation, the apostle here furnishes us with a very good rule to direct and regulate us in the exercise of our zeal: there are two things which to this purpose he more especially recommends to us; (1.) That he be exercised only upon that which is good; for zeal is then only good, when it is in a good thing: they who are zealously affected to that which is evil, will thereby only do so much the more hurt. And, (2.) That herein it be constant and steady: it is good to be zealous always in a good thing; not for a time only, or now and then, like the heat of an ague-fit, but, like the natural heat of the body, constant. Happy would it be for the church of Christ, if this rule was better observed among Christians! 19. My little children, of whom I travail in birth again until Christ be formed in you, 20. I desire to be present with you now, and to change my voice; for I stand in doubt of you. That the apostle might the better dispose these Christians to bear with him in the reproofs which he was obliged to give them, he here expresses his great affection to them, and the very tender concern he had for their welfare: he was not like them—one thing he had more upon his mind than absent from them; their disaffection to him had more upon his mind than his affection from them; but he still bore the same respect to them which he had formerly done; nor was he like his false teachers, who pretended a great deal of affection to them, when at the same time they were only consulting their own interest; but he had a sincere concern for their truest advantage; he sought not their's, but them. They were too ready to account him their enemy, but he assured them that he was their friend; nay, not only so, but that he had the bowels of a parent toward them. He calls them his children, as he justly might, since he had been the instrument of their conversion to the Christian faith; yea, he styles them his little children, which as it denotes a greater degree of tenderness and affection to them, so it may possibly have a respect to their present behaviour, whereby they shewed themselves too like little children, who are easily wrought upon by the arts and insinuations of others. He expresses his concern for them, and earnest desire of their welfare and soul-prosperity, by the pangs of a travelling woman—he travailed in birth for them: and the great thing which he was in so much pain about, and which he was so earnestly desirous of, was, not so much that they might affect him, as that Christ might be formed in them; that they might become Christians indeed, and be more confirmed and established in the faith of the gospel. From whence we may note, 1. The very tender affection which faithful ministers bear toward those among whom they are employed; it is like that of the most affectionate parents to their little children. 2. That the chief thing they are longing and even travelling in birth for, on their account, is, that Christ may be formed in them; not so much that they may gain their affections, much less that they may make a prey of them, but that they may be renewed in the spirit of their minds, wrought into the image of Christ, and more fully settled and confirmed in the Christian faith and life: and how unreasonably must those people act, who suffer themselves to be prevailed upon to desert or dislike such ministers! 3. That Christ is not full and complete in men till they are brought off from trusting in their own righteousness, and made to rely only upon him and his righteousness. As a further evidence of the affection and concern which the apostle had for these Christians, he adds, (v. 20.) that he desired to be then present with them, that he would be glad of an opportunity of being among them, and conversing with them, and that then upon occasion he might find occasion to change his voice toward them: for at present he stood in doubt of them; he knew not well what to think of them; he was not so fully acquainted with their state as to know how to accommodate himself to them; he was full of fears and jealousies concerning them, which was the reason of his writing to them in such a manner as he had done; but he would be glad to find that matters were better with them than he feared, and that he might have occasion to commend them instead of thus reproving and chiding them. Note, Though ministers too often find it necessary to reprove those they have to do with, yet this is no grateful work to them; they had much rather there was no occasion for it, and are always glad when they can see reason to change their voice toward them. 21. Tell me, ye that desire to be under the law, do ye not hear the law? 22. For it is written, that Abraham had two sons, the one by a bond-maid, the other by a free-woman. 23. But he who was of the bond-woman was born after the flesh; but he of the free-woman was by promise. 24. Which things are an allegory; for these are the two covenants; the one from the mount Sinai, which gendereth to bondage, which is Agar. 25. For this Agar is mount Sinai in Arabia, and answereth to Jerusalem which now is, and is in bondage with her children. 26. But Jerusalem which is above, is free, which is the mother of us all. 27. For it is written, Rejoice, thou barren that bearest not; break forth and cry, thou that travailest not: for the desolate hath many more children than she who
1. It hath a husband. 28. Now we, brethren, as Isaac was, are the children of promise. 29. But as then he that was born after the flesh persecuted him that was born after the Spirit, even so is it now. 30. Nevertheless what saith the scripture? Cast out the bond-woman and her son: for the son of the bond-woman shall not be heir with the son of the free-woman. 31. So then, brethren, we are not children of the bond-woman, but of the free.

In these verses the apostle illustrates the difference between believers who rested in Christ only, and those Judaisers who trusted in the law, by a comparison taken from the story of Isaac and Ishmael. This he introduces in such a manner as was proper to strike and impress their minds, and to convince them of their great weakness in departing from the truth, and suffering themselves to be deprived of the liberty of the gospel; Tell me, says he, ye that desire to be under the law, do ye not hear the comparison which I give? Consider, they did not practice the law, for among the Jews it was wont to be read in their public assemblies every sabbath-day; and since they were so very fond of being under it, he would have them duly to consider what is written therein, (referring to what is recorded Gen. 16. and ch. 21.) which if they would do, they might soon see how little reason they had for it. And here, 1. He sets before them the history itself; (v. 22, 23.) for it is written, Abraham had two sons, &c. Here he represents the different state and condition of these two sons of Abraham; that the one, Ishmael, was by a bond-maid, and the other, Isaac, by a free-woman; and that whereas the former was born after the flesh, or by the ordinary course of nature, the other was by promise, when in the course of nature there was no reason to expect that Sarah should have a son.

2. He acquaints them with the meaning and design of this history, or the use which he intended to make of it; (v. 24—27.) These things, says he, are an allegory, wherein, beside the literal and historical sense of the words, the Spirit of God might design to signify something further to us, and that was, That these two, Agar and Sarah, are the two covenants, or were intended to typify and prefigure the two different dispensations of the covenant. The former, Agar, represented that which was given from mount Sinai, and which gendereth to bondage, though it was a dispensation of grace, yet, in comparison of the gospel-state, was a dispensation of bondage, and became more so to the Jews, through their mistake of the design of it, and expecting to be justified by the works of it. For this Agar is mount Sinai in Arabia, (mount Sinai was then called Agar,) and shall cast out the child of the bond-woman which now is, and is in bondage with her children; that is, justly represents the present state of the Jews, who, continuing in their infidelity, and adhering to that covenant, are still in bondage with their children. But the other, Sarah, was intended to prefigure Jerusalem which is above, or the state of Christians under the new and better dispensation of grace; for every covenant is free both from the curse of the moral and the bondage of their removal law, and is the mother of us all; a state into which all, both Jews and Gentiles, are admitted, upon their believing in Christ. And to this greater freedom and enlargement of the church under the gospel-dispensation, which was typified by Sarah the mother of the promised seed, the apostle refers that of the prophet, Isa. 54. 1. where it is written, Rejoice, thou barren that bearest not; break forth and cry, thou that travailest not; for the desolate hath many more children than she who hath a husband.

3. He applies the history thus explained, to the present case; (v. 28.) Now we, brethren, says he, as Isaac was, are the children of the promise. We Christians, who have accepted Christ, and rely upon him, and look for justification and salvation by him alone, as hereby we become the spiritual, though we are not the natural, seed of Abraham, so we are entitled to the promised inheritance, and interested in the blessings of it. But lest these Christians should be stumbled at the opposition they might meet with from the Jews, who were so tenacious of their law, as to be ready to persecute those who would not submit to it, he tells them that this was no more than what was pointed to in the type; for as then he that was born after the flesh, persecuted him that was born after the Spirit, they must expect it would be so now. But, for their comfort in this case, he desires them to consider what the scripture saith, (Gen. 21. 10.) Cast out the bond-woman and her son, for the son of the bond-woman shall not be heir with the son of the free-woman. Though the judaisers should persecute and hate them, yet the issue would be, that Judaism would sink, and wither, and perish; but true Christianity should flourish and be propagated, and Christ himself would be the whole, or the sum of what he had said, he concludes, (v. 31.) So then, brethren, we are not children of the bond-woman, but of the free.

CHAP. V.

In this chapter, the apostle comes to make application of his foregoing discourse. He begins it with a general caution, or exhortation, (v. 1.) which he afterward endorses by several considerations, v. 2—12. He then presses them to serious practical godliness, which would be the best antidote against the snares of their false teachers; particularly,

1. That we should not strive with one another. II. That they would strive against sin; where he shews, 1. That there is in every one a struggle between flesh and spirit, v. 17. 2. That it is our duty and interest, in this struggle, to side with the better part, v. 16, 18. 3. He specifies the works of the flesh, which must be watched against, and mortified; and the fruits of the Spirit, which must be brought forth and cherished; and shews of what importance it is that they be so, v. 19, 24. And then concludes the chapter with a caution against pride and envy.

1. Stand fast therefore in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free, and be not entangled again with the yoke of bondage. 2. Behold, I Paul say unto you, that if ye be circumcised, Christ shall profit you nothing. 3. For I testify again to every man that is circumcised, that he is a debtor to do the whole law. 4. Christ is become of no effect unto you, whosoever of you are justified by the law; ye are fallen from grace. 5. For we through the Spirit wait for the hope of righteousness by faith. 6. For in Jesus Christ neither circumcision availeth any thing, nor uncircumcision; but faith which worketh by love. 7. Ye did run well; who did hinder you, that ye should not obey the truth? 8. This persuasion cometh not of him that calleth you. 9. A little leaven leaveneth the whole lump. 10. Have confidence in you through the Lord, that ye will be none otherwise minded: but he that troubleth you shall bear his judgment, whosoever he be. 11. And I, brthren, if I yet preach circumcision, why do I yet suffer persecution? Then is the offence of the cross ceased. 12. I would they were even cut off who trouble you.

In the former part of this chapter the apostle cautions the Galatians to take heed of the Judaizing teachers, who endeavoured to bring them back under the bondage of the law. He had been arguing against them before, and had largely shewn how contrary the principles and spirit of those teachers were to the spirit of the gospel; and now this is as it were the general inference or application of all that discourse. Since it appeared by what had been said, that a man is justified by faith in Christ, and not by the righteousness of the law; and that the law of Moses was no longer in force, nor Christians under any obligation to submit to it; therefore he would have them to stand fast in the liberty where-with Christ hath made us free, and not to be again entangled with the yoke of bondage. Here observe, 1. Under the gospel we are enfranchised; we are brought into a state of liberty, wherein we are freed from the yoke of bondage, from the curse of the moral law; so that we are no longer tied to the observation of the one, nor tied up to the rigour of the other, which curses every one that continues not in all things written therein to do them, ch. 3. 10. 2. We owe this liberty to Jesus Christ, it is he who has made us free; by his merits he has satisfied the demands of the broken law, and by his authority as a King he has discharged us from the obligation of those carnal ordinances which were imposed on the Jews. And, 3. It is therefore our duty to stand fast in this liberty, constantly and faithfully to adhere to the gospel and to the liberty of it, and not to suffer ourselves, upon any considerations, to be again entangled with the yoke of bondage, or persuaded to return back to the law of Moses. This is the general caution or exhortation, which in the following verses, the apostle enforces by several reasons or arguments. As,

1. That their submitting to circumcision, and depending on the works of the law for righteousness, was an implicit contradiction of their faith as Christians, and a forfeiture of all their advantages by Jesus Christ, v. 2-4. And here we may observe,

1. With what solemnity the apostle asserts and declares this; Behold, I Paul say unto you; (v. 2.) and he repeats it justified only by faith in Jesus Christ, and not by the righteousness of the law; and he adds, I who have proved myself an apostle of Christ, and to have received my authority and instructions from him, do declare, and am ready to pawn my credit and reputation upon it, that if ye be circumcised, Christ shall profit you nothing, &c. wherein he shews that what he was now saying was not only a matter of great importance, but what might be most assuredly depended on. He was so far from being satisfied with this (as some might report him to be,) that he looked upon it as a matter of the greatest consequence, that they did not submit to it. 2. What it is which he so solemnly, and with so much assurance, declares; it is, that if they were circumcised, Christ would profit them nothing, &c. We are not to suppose that it is mere circumcision which he speaks of, but circumcision with its design to say, that none who are circumcised could have any benefit by Christ; for all the Old Testament saints had been circumcised, and he himself had consented to the circumcision of Timothy. But he is to be understood as speaking of circumcision in the sense in which the Judaizing teachers did impose it, who taught, that except they were circumcised, and kept the law of Moses, they could not be saved, Acts 15. 1. That this is his meaning, appears from v. 4, where he expresses the same thing by their being justified by the law, or seeking justification by the works of it. Now in this case, if they submitted to circumcision in this sense, he declares that Christ would profit them nothing; that they were debtors to do the whole law; that Christ was become of no effect to them; and that they were fallen from all the grace of God. From all which expressions it appears, that thereby they renounced the only ground of justification which God had established; yea, that they laid themselves under an impossibility of being justified in his sight, for they became debtors to do the whole law, which required such an obedience as they were not capable of performing, and denounced a curse against those who failed in it; and therefore condemned, but could not justify them; and, consequently, that having thus revolted from Christ, and built their hopes upon the law, Christ would profit them nothing, nor be of any effect to them. Thus, as by being circumcised they renounced their Christianity, so they cut themselves off from all advantage by Christ; and therefore there was the greatest reason why they should steadfastly adhere to that decree which they had embraced, and not suffer themselves to be again entangled with the yoke of bondage. Note, (1.) Though Jesus Christ was the utmost; yet there are multitudes to whom he shall profit nothing. (2.) All those who seek to be justified by the law, do thereby render Christ of no effect to them; by building their hopes on the works of the law, they forfeit all their hopes from him; for he will not be the Saviour of any who will not own and rely upon him as their only Saviour.

2. To persuade them to steadfastness in the doctrine and liberty of the gospel, he sets before them his own example, and that of other Jews who had embraced the Christian religion, and acquaints them what their hopes were, namely, That through the Spirit they were waiting for the hope of righteousness by faith. Though they were Jews by nature, and had been bred up under the law, yet being, through the Spirit, brought to the knowledge of Christ, they had renounced all dependence on the works of the law, and looked for justification and salvation only by faith in him: and therefore it must needs be the greatest folly in those who had never been under the law, to suffer themselves to be brought into subjection to it, and to found their hopes upon the works of it. Here we may observe, 1. What it is that Christians are waiting for, it is the hope of righteousness, by which we are chiefly to understand justification. This is that which this is called the hope of Christians, as it is the greatest object of their hope, which they are above every thing else desiring and pursuing; and the hope of righteousness, as their hopes of it are founded on righteousness, not their own, but that of our Lord Jesus: for through a life of righteousness is the way that leads to this happiness, yet it is the righteousness of Christ, which has procured it for us, and on the account of which we can expect and rest in the possession of it. 2. How they hope to obtain this happiness, and that is by faith, that is, in our Lord Jesus Christ, not by the works of the law, or any thing they can do to deserve it, but only by faith, receiving and relying upon him as our Lord our righteousness. It is in this way only that they expect their reward to be entitled to it here, or possess of it hereafter. 3. We see it is that they are thus waiting for the hope of righteousness, it is through the Spirit; wherein they act under the direction and influence of the Holy Spirit; it is under his conduct, and by his assistance, that they are both persuaded and enabled to believe on Christ, and to look for the hope of righteousness through him. When the apostle thus represents the case of Christians, it is implied that if they expected to be justified and saved in any other way, they were likely to meet with a disappointment, and therefore that they were greatly cheered where to be the doctrine of the gospel which they had embraced.

III. He argues from the nature and design of the Christian institution, which was to abolish the difference between Jew and Gentile, and to establish faith in Christ, as the way of our acceptance with God. He tells them, (v. 6.) that in Christ Jesus, or under the gospel dispensation, neither circumcision availeth any thing, nor uncircumcision. Though, through, as he往下, there was a distinction put between Jew and Greek, between those who were, and those who were not, circumcised, the former being admitted to those privileges of the church of God, from which the other were excluded; yet it was otherwise in the gospel-state; Christ, who is the End of the law, being come, now it was neither here nor there whether a man was circumcised or uncircumcised, he engaged for one, nor the worse for the other, nor would either the one or the other recommend him to God; and therefore as their judaizing teachers were very unreasonable in imposing circumcision upon them, and obliging them to observe the law of Moses, so they must needs be very unwise in submitting to them herein. But though he assures them that neither circumcision nor uncircumcision would avail to their acceptance with God, yet he tells them, with especial assurance, that the only thing that is faith, which worketh by love: such a faith in Christ as discovers itself to be true and genuine, by a sincere love to God and our neighbour. If they had this, it mattered not whether they were circumcised or uncircumcised, but without it nothing else would stand them in any stead. Note. 1. No external privileges or profession will avail to our acceptance with God, without a sincere faith in our Lord and Redeemer. If, therefore, where it is true, there is a working grace; it works by love, love to God, and love to our brethren; and faith, thus working by love, is all in all in our Christianity.

IV. To recover them from their backslidings, and engage them to greater steadfastness for the future, he puts them in mind of their good beginnings, and calls upon them to consider whence it was that they were so much altered from what they had been, v. 7. He tells them that at first setting out in Christianity they had behaved themselves very commendably, they had readily embraced the Christian religion, and discovered a becoming zeal in the ways and work of it; as in their baptism they were devoted to God, and had declared themselves the disciples of Christ, so their behaviour was agreeable to their character and profession. Note. (1.) The life of a Christian is a race, wherein he must run, and hold on, if he would obtain the prize. (2.) It is not enough that we run in this race, by a profession of Christianity, but we must run well, by living up to that profession. Thus these Christians had done for a while, but they had been obstructed in their progress, and were either turned out of the way, or at least made to flag and falter in it. Therefore, 2. He asks them, and calls upon themselves, Who did hinder them? How it came to pass that they did not hold on in the way wherein they had begun to run so well? He very well knew who they were, and what it was, that hindered them; but he would have them to put the question to themselves, and seriously consider, whether they had any good reason to hearken to those who gave them this disturbance, and whether what they offered was sufficient to justify them in their present conduct. Note. (1.) Many who set out fair in religion, and run well for a while, run within the bounds appointed for the race, and run with zeal and alacrity too, are yet by some means or other hindered in their progress, or turned out of the way. (2.) It concerns those who have run well, but now begin either to turn out of the way, or to tire in it, to inquire what it is that is hindering them. Young converts must expect that Satan will be bringing stumbling-blocks in their way, and doing all he can to divert them from the course they are in; but whenever they find themselves in danger of being turned out of it, they would do well to consider who it is that hinders them. Whoever they were that hindered these Christians, the apostle tells them, that by hearkening to them, they were kept from obeying God, and thereby lost the benefit of what they had done in religion. The gospel which he had preached to them, and which they had embraced and professed, he assures them was the truth; it was therein only that the true way of justification and salvation was fully discovered; and in order to their enjoying the advantage of it, it was necessary that they should obey it, that they should not hinder one another for it, and continue to preserve their lives and hopes according to the directions of it. If therefore they should suffer themselves to be drawn away from it, they must needs be guilty of the greatest weakness and folly. Note. [1.] The truth is not only to be believed, but to be obeyed; to be received not only in the light of it, but in the love, and power of it. [2.] They do not rightly obey the truth, who do not steadfastly adhere to it. [3.] They who have begun to run well, and have been hindered, may recover their way, if they will consider that there was for our embracing it; and therefore they act very unreasonably, who, when they have begun to run well in the Christian race, suffer themselves to be hindered, so as not to persevere in it.

V. He argues for their steadfastness in the faith and liberty of the gospel, from the ill rise of that persuasion, whereby they were drawn away from it; (v. 8.) This persuasion, says he, cometh not of him that calleth you; but is of the world, and of the devil, whom he discovered to them, and who was not to be trusted. It was no other than the apostle here speaks of, was, no doubt, that of the necessity of their being circumcised, and keeping the law of Moses, or of their mixing the works of the law with faith in Christ in the business of justification. This was what the judaizing teachers endeavoured to impose upon them, and what they had too easily fallen into. To convince them of their folly herein, he tells them, that this persuasion did not come from him that had called them to God, by whose authority the gospel had been preached to them, and they had been called into the fellowship of it; or of the apostle himself, who had been employed as the instrument of calling them hereunto. It could not come from God, for it was contrary to that way of justification and salvation which he had established; nor could they have received it in full by himself; or, whatever some might pretend, he had all along been an opposer, and not a preacher, of circumcision; and if in any instance he had submitted to it for the sake of peace, yet he had never pressed the use of it upon Christians, much less imposed it upon them as necessary to salvation. Since then this persuasion did not come of him that had called them, he leaves them to judge whence it must arise; and sufficiently intimates, that they should not be guided by any of the arguments, by which this means were endeavouring to overthrow their faith, and obstruct the progress of the gospel, and therefore that the Galatians had every reason to reject it, and to continue steadfast in the truth which they had before embraced. Note. 1. In order to our judging aright of the different persuasions in religion there are among Christians, we are to consider whether they come of the world that calleth us, whether or no they are founded upon the authority of Christ and his apostles. 2. If, upon inquiry, they appear to have no such foundation, how forward soever others may be to impose them upon us, we should by no means submit to them, but reject them.
VI. The danger there was of the spreading of this infection, and the ill influence it might have upon others, was drawn to by bringing them against their complying with their false teachers, in what they would impose on them. It is possible that, to extenuate their fault, they might be ready to say, that there were but few of those teachers among them, who endeavoured to draw them into this persuasion and practice; or, that they were only some lesser matters wherein they complied with them; that though they submitted to be circumcised, yet were not soon satisfied with this, but that they by no means renounced their Christianity, and gone over to Judaism. Or suppose their complying thus far was as faulty as he would represent it, yet perhaps they might further say, that there were but few among them, who had done so, and therefore he needed not be so much concerned about it. Now, to obviate such pretences as these, and to convince them that there was more danger in it than they supposed, he tells them, (v. 9.) that a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump; that the whole lump of Christianity may be tainted and corrupted by one such erroneous principle, or that the whole lump of the Christian society may be infected by one member of it; and therefore that they were greatly concerned not to yield in this single instance; or, if any had done so, to endeavour by all proper methods to extirpate it among them. It is dangerous for Christian churches to encourage those among them, who entertain, especially who set themselves to propagate, destructive errors. This was the case here; the doctrine which the false teachers were industrious to spread, and which some in these churches had been drawn into, was subversive of Christianity itself, as the apostle had before shewn: and therefore, though the number, perhaps, might be but few, yet, considering the fatal tendency of such an error, and the corruption of human nature, whereby others were too much disposed to be infected with it, he would not have them on that account to be easy and unconcerned, but remember that a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump. If these were indulged, the contagion might soon spread farther and wider; and if they suffered themselves to be imposed upon in this instance, they would be the utter ruin of the truth and liberty of the gospel.

VII. That he might conciliate the greater regard to what he had said, he expresses the hopes he had concerning them; (v. 10.) I have confidence in you, says he, through the Lord, that you will be none otherwise minded. Though he had many fears and doubts about them, (which was the occasion of his using so much plainness and freedom with them,) yet he hoped that through the blessing of God might be fulfilled, what he had written, they might be brought to be of the same mind with him, and to own and abide by that truth and that liberty of the gospel, which he had preached to them, and was now endeavouring to confirm in them. Herein he teaches us, that we ought to hope the best even of those concerning whom we have cause to fear the worst. That they might be the less offended at the reproofs he had given them for their unsteadfastness in the faith, he lays the blame of it more upon others than themselves; for he adds, But he that troubleth you, shall bear his judgment, whosoever he be. He was sensible that there were some that troubled them, and would pervert the gospel of Christ; (as ch. 1. 7.) and possibly he may point to some one particular man, who was more busy and forward than others, and might be the chief instrument of the disorder that was among them; and to this he imputes their defection or inconstancy, more than to any thing in themselves. This may give us occasion to observe, that in reproving sin and error, we should always distinguish between the leaders and the led; such as set themselves to draw others therein, and such as are drawn aside by them. This is an admirable softening and alleviates the fault of these Christians, even while he is reproving them, that he might the better persuade them to return to, and stand fast in, the liberty wherewith Christ had made them free; but as for him or them that troubled them, whoever he or they were, he declares they should bear their judgment; he did not doubt but God would deal with them according to their deserts; and out of indignation against them as enemies of Christ and his church, he wishes that they were even cut off; not cut off from Christ and all hopes of salvation by him, but cut off by the censures of the church, which ought to witness against those teachers who thus corrupted the purity of the gospel. Those, whether ministers or others, who set themselves to overthrow the faith of the gospel, and disturb the peace of Christians, do thereby forfeit the privileges of Christian communion, and deserve to be cut off from them.

VIII. To dissuade these Christians from hearkening to their Judaizing teachers, and to recover them from the ill impressions they had made upon them, he represents them as men who had used very base and disengenuous methods to compass their designs; for they had misrepresented him, that they might gain more contempt on them, and for that purpose, which they were endeavouring, was, to bring them: to submit to circumcision, and to mix judaism with their Christianity; and the better to accomplish this design, they had given out among them, that Paul himself was a preacher of circumcision: for when he says, (v. 11.) And brethren, if I yet preach circumcision, it plainly appears that he had reported him to have done so, and that they had made use of this as a prejudice against him, and his doctrine. It is probable that they grounded this report upon his having circumcised Timothy, Acts 16. 3. But though for good reasons he had yielded to circumcision in that instance, yet that he was a preacher of it, and especially in that sense wherein they imposéd it, he utterly denies. To prove the injustice of this charge upon him, he offers such arguments, as, if they would allow themselves to consider, could not fail to convince them that this was a great mistake. If he had preached circumcision, he might have avoided persecution. If I yet preach circumcision, says he, why do I yet suffer persecution? V. was evident, and they could not but be sensible of it, that he was hated and persecuted by the Jews; but what account could be given of this their behaviour toward him, if he had so far symbolized with them as to preach up circumcision, and the observation of the law of Moses, as necessary to salvation? This was the great point they were contending for; and if he had fallen in with them herein, instead of being exposed to their rage, he might have been received into their favour. When therefore he was suffering persecution from them, this was a plain evidence that he had not complied with them: yea, that he was so far from preaching the doctrine he was charged with, that, rather than do so, he was willing to expose himself to the greatest hazards. 2. If he had yielded to the Jews herein, then would the offence of the cross have ceased; they would not have taken so much offence against the doctrine of Christianity, as they did, nor would he and others have been exposed to so much suffering on the account of it, as they were. He acquaints us, (1 Cor. 1. 23.) that the preaching of the cross of Christ, (or the doctrine of justification and salvation only by faith in Christ crucified,) was to the Jews a stumbling-block. That which they were most offended at in Christianity, was, that thereby circumcision, and the whole frame of the legal administration, were set aside, as no longer in force.
This raised their greatest outrages against it, and stirred them up to oppose and persecute the professors of it. Now if Paul and others could have given into it, that circumcision was still to be retained, and the observation of the law of Moses joined with faith in Christ as necessary to salvation, then their offence against it would have been in a great measure removed; and they might have avoided the sufferings they underwent for the sake of it. But though others, and particularly those who were so forward to asperse him as a preacher of this doctrine, could easily come into it, yet so could not he; he rather chose to hazard his case and his credit, yea his very life itself, than thus to corrupt the truth, and give up the liberty of the gospel. Hence it was, that the Jews continued to be so much offended against Christianity, and against him as the preacher of it. Thus the apostle clears himself from the unjust reproach which his enemies had cast upon him, and at the same time shews how little regard was due to those men who could treat him in such an injurious manner, and how much reason he had to wish that they were even cut off.

13. For, brethren, ye have been called unto liberty; only use not liberty for an occasion to the flesh, but by love serve one another. 14. For all the law is fulfilled in one word, even in this: Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. 15. But if ye bite and devour one another, take heed that ye be not consumed one of another. 16. This I say then, Walk in the Spirit, and ye shall not fulfiil the lust of the flesh. 17. For the flesh lusteth against the Spirit, and the Spirit, against the flesh: and these are contrary the one to the other; so that ye cannot do the things that ye would. 18. But if ye be led by the Spirit, ye are not under the law. 19. Now the works of the flesh are manifest, which are these; Adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness, Idolatry, witchcraft, hatred, variance, emulations, wrath, strife, seditions, heresies, Envying, murders, drunkenness, revellings, and such like: of the which I tell you before, as I have also told you in time past, that they who do such things shall not inherit the kingdom of God. 22. But the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, Meekness, temperance: against such there is no law. 24. And they that are Christ’s have crucified the flesh with the affections and lusts. 25. If we live in the Spirit, let us also walk in the Spirit. 26. Let us not be desirous of vain-glory, provoking one another, envying one another.

In the latter part of this chapter the apostle comes to exhort these Christians to serious practical godliness, as the best antidote against the snare of the false teachers. Two things especially he presses upon them:

I. That they should not strive with one another, but love one another. He tells them, (v. 13.) that they had been called unto liberty; and he would have them to stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ had made them free; but yet he would have them be very careful that they did not use this liberty as an occasion to the flesh; that they did not therefore take occasion to indulge themselves in any corrupt affections and practices, and particularly such as might create distance and disaffection, and be the ground of quarrels and contentions among them. One should love them by love to serve one another, to maintain that mutual love and affection, which, notwithstanding any lesser differences there might be among them, would dispose them to all those offices of respect and kindness to each other, which the Christian religion obliged them to. Note, 1. The liberty we enjoy as Christians, is not a licentious liberty; though Christ has redeemed us from the curse of the law, yet he has not freed us from the obligation of it; the gospel is a doctrine according to godliness, (1 Tim. 6. 3.) and is so far from giving the least countenance to sin, that it lays us under the strongest obligations to avoid and subdue it. 2. Though we ought to stand fast in our Christian liberty, yet we should not insist upon it to the breach of Christian charity; we should not use it as an occasion of strife and contention with our fellow Christians, who may be differently minded from us; but shew the same affection towards each other as may dispose us by love to serve one another. This the apostle endeavours to persuade these Christians to, and there are two considerations which he sets before them for this purpose: (1.) That all the law is fulfilled in one word, even in this, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself, v. 14. Love is the sum of the whole law; as love to God comprises the duties of the first table, so love to our neighbour comprises the duties of the second. The apostle takes notice of the latter here, because he was speaking of their behaviour towards one another; and when he makes use of this as an argument to persuade them to mutual love, he intimates both that this would be a good evidence of their sincerity in religion, and also the most likely means of rooting out those dissensions and divisions that were among them. It will appear that we are the disciples of Christ indeed, when we have love one to another; (John 13. 35.) and where this temper is kept up, if it do not wholly extinguish those unhappy discords that are among Christians, yet at least it will so far accommodate them, that the fatal consequences of them will be prevented. (2.) The sad and dangerous tendency of a contrary behaviour; (v. 15.) But, says he, if instead of serving one another in love, and therein fulfilling the law of Christ, ye bite and devour one another, take heed ye be not consumed one of another. If instead of acting like men and Christians, they would behave themselves more like brute beasts, in tearing and rending one another, they could expect nothing as the consequence of it, but that they would be consumed one of another; and therefore they had the greatest reason not to indulge themselves in such quarrels and animosities. Note, Mutual stripes among brethren, if persisted in, may become a common ruin; they that devour one another, are in a fair way to be consumed one of another. Christian churches cannot be ruined but by their own hands; but if Christians, who should be helps to one another, and a joy one to another, be as brute beasts, biting and devouring each other, what can be expected but that the God of love should deny his grace to them all, and cause them to depart from them, and that the evil spirit, who seeks the destruction of them all, should prevail?

II. That they should all strive against sin; and happy would it be for the church, if Christians would let all their quarrels be swallowed up of this, even a quarrel against sin; if, instead of biting and devouring one another on the account of their dif-fierent opinions, they would all set themselves against sin in themselves and the place where they live. This is what we are chiefly concerned to fight against, and that which above every thing else we should make it our business to oppose and suppress. To excite Christians hereunto, and to assist them therein, the apostle shews,

1. That there is in every one a struggle between the flesh and the Spirit; (v. 17.) The flesh, the corrupt and carnal part of us, lusts, strives and struggles with the Spirit, which is to oppose all the motions of the Spirit, and resists every thing that is spiritual. On the other hand, the Spirit, the renewed part of us, strives against the flesh, and opposes the will and desire of it: and hence it comes to pass, that we cannot do the things that we would; as the principle of grace in us will not suffer us to do all the evil which our corrupt nature would prompt us to, so neither can we do all the good which we know is our duty, and we are enabled, by the motions and propensions we meet with from that corrupt and carnal principle. Even as in a natural man there is something of struggle; (the convictions of his conscience, and the corruption of his own heart, strive with one another; his convictions would suppress his corruptions, and his corruptions silence his convictions) so in a renewed man, where there is something of a good principle, there is a struggle between the old nature and the new, between the corruption and the beginnings of grace; and this Christians must expect will be their exercise as long as they continue in this world.

2. That it is our duty and interest in this struggle to side with the better part, to side with our convictions against our corruptions, and with our graces against our lusts. This the apostle represents as our duty, and, almost effects of his general exhortation, and the ends and purposes we meet with from that corrupt and carnal principle. He shews, (v. 16.) This I say then, Walk in the Spirit, and ye shall not fulfiil the lusts of the flesh. By the Spirit here may be meant either the influent Spirit who implanteth the new heart, the new life, the new nature in us; or this be our care in the ordinary course and tenor of our lives, we may depend upon it, that, though we may not be freed from the stirrings and oppositions of our corrupt nature, we shall be kept from fulfilling it in the lusts thereof; so that though it remain in us, yet it shall not obtain a dominion over us. Note, The best antidote against the contrary motions of sin, is to walk in the Spirit; to be much in conversing with spiritual things; to mind the things of the soul, which is the spiritual part of man, more than those of the body, which is his carnal part; to commit ourselves to the guidance of the word, wherein the Holy Spirit makes known the will of God concerning us, and in the way of our duty to act in a dependence on his aids and influences. And as this would be the best means to subdue the lusts of the flesh, so it would be good evidence that they were Christians indeed; for, says the apostle, (v. 18.) If ye be led by the Spirit, ye are not under the law. As if he had said, You must expect a struggle between flesh and Spirit as long as you are in the world; that the flesh will be lust ing against the Spirit, as well as the Spirit against the flesh; but, if in the prevailing and tenor of your lives you are led by the Spirit, you shall act under the guidance and government of the Holy Spirit, and of that spiritual nature and disposition he has wrought in you; if you make the word of God your rule, and the grace of God your principle; it will hence appear, that you are not under the law; not under the condemning, though you are still under the commanding, power of it: for there is now no condemnation in the world in which you live. Some are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God,” Rom. 8. 1—14.

3. The apostle specifies the works of the flesh, which must be watched against and mortified, and the fruits of the Spirit, which must be cherished and brought forth; (v. 19, &c.) and by specifying particulars he further illustrates what he is here upon.

He begins,

(1.) With the works of the flesh, which, as they are many, so they are manifest. It is past dispute that the things he here speaks of are the works of the flesh, or the product of corrupt and depraved nature; most of them are condemned by the light of nature itself, and all of them by the light of scripture. The particulars he specifies are of various sorts; some are sins against the seventh commandment, such as Adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness; by which are meant in general immoral acts of these sins, but all such thoughts, or words, or actions, as have a tendency toward the great transgression. Some are sins against the first and second commandments, as idolatry, and witchcraft; others are sins against our neighbour, and contrary to the royal law of brotherly love, such as hatred, variance, emulation, wrath, strife, which too often occasion sedition, bloodshed, and sacrifices, and sometimes break out into murders, not only of the bodies, but also of the names and reputation, but even of the very lives, of our fellow-creatures. Others are sins against ourselves, such as drunkenness and revellings; and he concludes the catalogue with an et cetera, and gives fair warning to all to take care of them, as they hope to see the face of God with comfort. Of these and such like, says he, I tell you before, as I have also told you in times past, the will of God, which is, How much soever they may flatter themselves with Vain宜men, shall not inherit the kingdom of God. These are sins which will undoubtedly shut men out of heaven. The world of spirits can never be comfortable to those who plunge themselves in the filth of the flesh; nor will the righteous and holy God ever admit such into his favour and presence, unless they are first cleansed and sanctified, and justified in the name of our Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God, 1 Cor. 6. 11.

(2.) He specifies the fruits of the Spirit, or the renewed nature, which as Christians we are concerned to bring forth, v. 22, 23. And here we may observe, that as sin is called the work of the flesh, because the flesh, or corrupt nature, is the principle that moves and exerts men to it; so grace is said to be the fruit of the Spirit, because it wholly proceeds from the Spirit, as the fruit does from the root; and whereas before the apostle had chiefly specified those works of the flesh, which were not only hurtful to men themselves, but tended to make them so to one another; so here he chiefly takes notice of those fruits of the Spirit, which had a tendency to make Christians agreeable one to another, as well as easy to themselves; and this was very suitable to the caution or exhortation he had before given, (v. 12.) that they should not use their liberty as an occasion to the flesh, but by love serve one another. He particularly recommends to us, Love, to God especially, and to one another for his sake—Joy, by which may be understood cheerfulness in conversation with our friends, or rather a constant delight in God—Peace, with God and conscience, or a peaceableness of temper and behaviour towards others—Long-suffering, patience to defer anger, and a contentedness to bear injuries—Gentleness, such a sweetness of temper, and especially towards our inferiors, as disposes us to be affable and courteous, and easy to be entreated. And so, for the want of these, we have but the other things, or those in whom these fruits of the Spirit are found, the apostle says, There is no law against them, to condemn and punish them. Yea, hence it appears, that they are not under the law, but under grace; for these fruits of the Spirit, in whomsoever they are found, plainly shew, that such are led by the Spirit, and, consequently, that they are not under the law, as v. 18. Hence it follows, that by specifying these works of the flesh and fruits of the Spirit, the apostle directs us both what we are to avoid and oppose, and what we are to cherish and cultivate; so (v. 24.) he acquaints us, that this is the sincere care and endeavour of all real Christians; And they that are Christ's, says he, they who are Christians indeed, not only in shew and profession, but in sincerity and truth, have crucified the flesh with the affections and lusts. As in their baptism they were washed from the old, (for, being baptized into Christ, they were baptized into his death, Rom. 6. 3.) so they are now sincerely employing themselves herein, and, in conformity to their Lord and Head, are endeavouring to die unto sin, as he had died for it. They have not yet obtained a complete victory over it, they have still flesh as well as Spirit in them, and that has its affections and lusts, which continue to give them no little disturbance; but as it does not now reign in their mortal bodies, so that they obey it in the lusts thereof, (Rom. 6. 12.) so they are seeking the utter ruin and destruction of it, and to put it to the same shameful and ignominious, though lingering death, which our Lord Jesus underwent for our sakes. Note, If we would approve ourselves to be Christ's, such as are united to him, and interested in him, we must make it our constant care and business to crucify the flesh with its corrupt affections and lusts. Christ will never own those as his who yield themselves the servants of sin. But though the apostle here only mentions crucifying of the flesh with the affections and lusts, as the care and character of real Christians; yet, no doubt, it is also implied, that, on the other hand, we should shew forth those fruits of the Spirit which he had just before been specifying; this is no less our duty than that, nor in a lesser degree, as well as is the conquest of sin, and the perfecting of grace. It is not enough that we cease to do evil, but we must learn to do well. Our Christianity obliges us not only to die unto sin, but to live unto righteousness; not only to oppose the works of the flesh, but to bring forth the fruits of the Spirit too. If therefore we would make it appear that we do indeed belong to Christ, this must be our sincere care and endeavour, as well as the other; and that it was the design of the apostle in representing both the one and the other of these as our duty, and as necessary to support our character as Christians, may be gathered from what follows, (v. 25.) where he adds, If we live in the Spirit, let us also walk in the Spirit; that is, If we profess to have received the Spirit of Christ, or that we are renewed in the spirit of our minds, and encumber with a principle of spiritual life, let us make it appear by the proper fruits of the Spirit in our lives. He had before told us, that the Spirit of Christ is a privilege bestowed on all the children of God, ch. 4. 6. Now, says he, if we profess to be of this number, and as such to have obtained this privilege, let us shew it by a temper and behaviour agreeable hereunto; let us evidence our good profession and election by our fruits of the Spirit. Our conversation will always be answerable to the principle which we are under the guidance and government of: as that they are after the flesh do mind the things of the flesh, so that they are after the Spirit do mind the things of the Spirit, Rom. 8. 5. If therefore we would have it appear that we are Christ's, and that we are partakers of his Spirit, it must be by our walking not after the flesh, but after the Spirit. We must set ourselves to good earnest both to mortify the deeds of the body, and to walk in newness of life. The apostle concludes this chapter with a caution against pride and envy, v. 26. He had before been exhorting these Christians by love to serve one another, (v. 13.) and had put them in mind of what would be the consequence, if, instead of that, they did bite and devour one another, v. 15. Now as a means of engaging them to the one, and preserving them from the other, of these, he here mentions them against being desirous of vain-glory, or glory, which, instead of being desirous of, we should be dead to. Note, [2.] An undue regard to the approbation and applause of men, is one great ground of the unhappy strifes and contentions that are among Christians.

CHAP. VI.

This chapter chiefly consists of two parts. In the former the apostle gives us several plain and practical directions, which more especially tend to instruct Christians in their duty to one another, and to promote the communion of saints in love, v. 1... 10. In the latter he revives the main design of the epistle, which was to fortify the Galatians against the arts of their Judaizing teachers, and confirm them in the truth and liberty of the gospel: for which purpose he, I. Gives them the true character of these teachers, and shews them quite the servants of sin, and enemies to all true religion. It is not enough that we cease to do evil, but we must learn to do well. Our Christianity obliges us not only to die unto sin, but to live unto righteousness; not only to oppose the works of the flesh, but to bring forth the fruits of the Spirit too. If therefore we would make it appear that we do indeed belong to Christ, this must be our sincere care and endeavour, as well as the other; and that it was the design of the apostle in representing both the one and the other of these as our duty, and as necessary to support our character as Christians, may be gathered from what follows, (v. 25.) where he adds, If we live in the Spirit, let us also walk in the Spirit; that is, If we profess to have received the Spirit of Christ, or that we are renewed in the spirit of our BRETHREN, if a man be overtaken in a fault, ye who are spiritual, restore such one in the spirit of meekness; considering thyself, lest thou also be tempted. 2. Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ. 3. For if a man think himself to be something, when he is nothing, he deceiveth himself. 4. But let every man prove his own work, and then shall he have rejoicing in himself alone, and not in another. 5. For every man shall bear his own burden. 6. Let him that is taught in the word communicate unto him that teacheth in all good things. 7. Be not deceived; God is not mocked: for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap. 8. For he that soweth to his flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth to the Spirit shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting. 9. And let us not be weary in well doing: for in due season we shall reap, if we faint not. 10. As we have therefore opportunity, let us do good unto all men, especially unto them who are of the household of faith.

The apostle having, in the foregoing chapter, exhortcd Christians by love to serve one another, (v. 13.) and also cautioned us (v. 26.) against a temper which, if indulged, would hinder us from shewing the mutual love and serviceableness which he had recommended; in the beginning of this chapter he proceeds to mention some further directions, which, if duly observed, would both promote the one, and prevent the other of these, and render our behaviour both more agreeable to our Christian profession, and more useful and comfortable to one another: particularly,

1. We here are taught to deal tenderly with those who are overtaken in a fault, v. 1. He puts a common case, If a man be overtaken in a fault, be brought to sin by the surprise of temptation. It is one thing to overtake a fault by contrivance and deliberation, and full resolution in sin; and another thing to be overtaken in a fault. The latter is the case here supposed, and herein the apostle shews that great tenderness should be used. They who are spiritual, by whom is meant, not only the ministers, (as if none but they were to be called spiritual persons,) have often, in the exercise of their office, the opportunity of discovering faults, both in themselves and others; and being themselves affected by such a discovery, may be said to be overtaken by the surprise of temptation. When such is the case, we are here directed how we should behave: we are to let him know that we perceive it, and there is no reason to doubt but he is sensible of it himself; and therefore it is proper we should speak to him gently and privately, to shew our own concern and anxiety for his welfare; not to laugh at him, or to shew any contemptuous air or manner; nor, being ourselves affected with concern, to set up as judges and examiners. The word καιρως signifies to set in joint, as a dislocated bone is; accordingly, we should endeavour to set him in joint again, to bring him to themselves, by convincing them of their sin and error, persuading them to return to their duty, comforting them in a sense of pardoning mercy thereupon, and, having thus recovered them, confirming our love to them. 2. The manner wherein this is to be done— with the spirit of meekness; not in wrath and passion, as those who triumph in a brother's falls, but with meekness, as those who rather mourn for them. Many needful reproofs lose their effect, by being given in wrath: but when they are managed with calmness and tenderness, and appear to proceed from a sincere affection to them, and concern for their welfare, they are likely to make a due impression. 3. A very good reason why this should be done with meekness— considering thyself, lest thou also be tempted. We ought to deal very tenderly with those who are overtaken in sin, because we some of us know; but it may some time or other be our own case. We also may be tempted, yea, and overcome, by the temptation; and therefore, if we rightly consider ourselves, this will dispose us to do by others as we desire to be done by in such a case.

II. We are here directed to bear one another's burthens, v. 2. This may be considered either as referring to what goes before, and so may teach us to exercise forbearance and compassion towards one another, in the case of those weaknesses, and follies, and infirmities, which too often attend us—that, though we should not wholly connive at them, yet we should not be severe against one another, on the account of them; or as a more general precept, and so it directs us to sympathize, with one another under the various trials and troubles that we may meet with, and to be ready to afford each other the comfort and counsel, the help and assistance, which our circumstances may require. To excite us hereunto, the apostle adds, by way of motive, that so we shall fulfil the law of Christ. This is to act agreeably to the law of his precept, which is the law of love, and obliges us to a mutual forbearance and forgiveness, to sympathy with, and compassion towards, each other; and it would also be agreeable to his former advice. Fellow-Christian, if you would have the benefit of a law to us. We bear with us under our weaknesses and follies; he is touched with a fellow-feeling of our infirmities; and therefore there is good reason we should maintain the same temper towards one another.

Note, Though as Christians we are freed from the law of Moses, yet we are under the law of Christ; and therefore, instead of laying unnecessary temptations upon others, (as those who urged the observation of Moses's law did,) it much more becomes us to fulfil the law of Christ by bearing one another's burdens.

The apostle being aware how great a hinderance pride would be to the mutual condescension and sympathy which he had been recommending, and that a conceit of ourselves would dispose us to censure and condemn our brethren, instead of bearing with their insufficiencies, and endeavouring to restore them when overtaken with a fault; (v. 3.) takes care to caution us against this; he supposes it as a very possible thing, and it would be well if it were not too common, for a man to think himself to be something, to entertain a fond opinion of his own sufficiency, to look upon himself as wiser and better than other men, and as fit to dictate and prescribe to them, when in truth he is nothing, has no more of substance or solidity in him, or that can be a ground of the confidence and superiority which he assumes. To dissuade us from giving way to this temper, he tells us that such a one does but deceive himself; while he imposes upon others, by pretending to what he has not, he puts the greatest cheat upon himself, and sooner or later will find the sad effects of it. This will never gain him that esteem, either with God or good men, which he is likely to expect; he is neither the freer from mistakes, nor will he be the more secure against temptations, for the good opinion he has of his own sufficiency, but rather the more liable to fall into them, and to be overcome by them; for he thinks he stands, had need to take heed lest he fall. Instead therefore of indulging such a vain-glorious humour, which is both destructive of the love and kindness which Christ and all others have to ourselves, it would much better become us to accept the apostle's exhortation, (Phil. 2. 3.) To do nothing through strife or vain-glory; but that in lowliness of mind we should each esteem other better than ourselves. Note, Self-conceit is but self-deceit: as it is inconsistent with that charity we owe to others, (for charity vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up, 1 Cor. 13. 4.) so is it a cheat upon ourselves; and therefore not a more dangerous cheat in the world than self-deceit is. As a means of preventing this evil, to examine them by the rule of God's word, to see whether or not they are agreeable to it, and therefore such as God and conscience do approve of. This he represents as the duty of every man; instead of being forward to judge and censure others, it would much more become us to search and try our own ways; our business lies more at home than abroad, with ourselves than with other men; for what have we to do, to judge another man's servant? From the connexion of this exhortation with what goes before, in appears, that if Christians did duly employ themselves in this work, they might easily discover those defects and failings in themselves, which would soon convince them how little regard they had to the fineness of their own work, or the care of themselves, or severe in their censures of others. And so it gives us occasion to observe, that the best way to keep us from being proud of ourselves, is, to prove ourselves; the better we are acquainted with our own hearts and ways, the less liable shall we be to despise, and the more disposed to compassionate and help, others under their infirmities and afflictions.

That we might be persuaded to this necessary and profitable duty of proving our own work, the apostle urges two considerations very proper for this purpose.

1. This is the way to have rejoicing in ourselves alone. If we set ourselves in good earnest to prove our own work, and, upon the trial, can approve ourselves to God, as to our sincerity and uprightness toward him, then may we not expect to have the comfort and peace in our own souls, having the testimony of our own consciences for us; (as 2 Cor. 1. 12.) and this, he intimates, would be a much better ground of joy and satisfaction than to be able to rejoice in another, either in the good opinion which others may have of us, or in having gained over to our opinion, which the false teachers were wont to glory in, (as we see, v. 13.) or by comparing ourselves with others, as, it should seem, some did, who were ready to think well of themselves, because they were not so bad as some others. Too many are apt to value themselves upon such accounts as these; but the joy that results thence, is nothing to that which arises from an impartial trial of ourselves by the rule of God's word, and our being able thereupon to approve ourselves to him. Note, (1.) Though we have nothing in ourselves to do, yet we are not thereby hindered of rejoicing in ourselves; our works may merit nothing at the hand of God; but if our consciences can witness for us, that they are such as he for Christ's sake approves and accepts, we may upon good ground rejoice therein.

2. The true way to have rejoicing in ourselves, is, to be much in proving our own works; in examining ourselves by the unerring rule of God's word, and by the unerring rule of conscience to be convinced of, who are we, and what matter of rejoicing in ourselves our works can merit nothing at the hand of God; but if our consciences can witness for us, that they are such as he for Christ's sake approves and accepts, we may upon good ground rejoice therein.

If we have the testimony of our consciences, that we are accepted of God, we need not much concern ourselves about what others think or say of us; and without this the good opinion of others will stand us in little stead.

They have a sentiment which the apostle uses to press upon us this duty of proving our own work, is, That every man shall bear his own burden; (v. 5.) the meaning of which is, that at the great day every one shall be reckoned with according as his behaviour here has been. He supposes that there is a day coming, when we must all give an account of ourselves to God; and he declares that then the judged, and the judge, shall pass, not according to the sentiments of the world concerning us, or any ungrounded opinion we may have had of ourselves, or upon our having been better or worse than others, but according as our state and behaviour have really been in the sight of God. And if there be such an awful time to be expected, when he will render to every one according to his works, surely there is the greatest reason why we should serve our own souls, and make ourselves carefully called to an account hereafter, surely we ought to be often calling ourselves to an account here, to see whether or no we are such as God will own and approve then: and as this is our duty, so if we were more our practice, we should entertain more becoming thoughts both of ourselves and our fellow Christians; and instead of bearing hard upon another, on the account of any mistakes or failings we may have, we should cultivate the fulness that law of Christ, by which we must be judged in bearing one another's burthens.

IV. Christians are here exhorted to be free and liberal in maintaining their ministers; (v. 6.) Let him that is taught in the word, communicate to him that teacheth, in all good things. Here we may observe, 1. The apostle speaks of it as a thing known and acknowledged, that, as there are some to be taught, so there are others who are appointed to teach them. The office of the ministry is a divine institution, which does not lie open in common to all, but is confined to those only whom God has qualified for it, and called to it: even reason itself directs us to put a difference between the teachers and the taught; for if all were teachers, there would be none to be taught, and the scriptures sufficiently declare how much depends upon it. (2 Tim. 2. 2.)

2. It is the word of God wherein ministers are to teach and instruct others; that which they are to preach, is the word, 2 Tim. 4. 2. That which they are to declare, is the counsel of God, Acts 20. 27.

They are not lords of our faith, but helpers of our joy, 2 Cor. 1. 24. It is the word of God which is the only rule of faith and life; this they are concerned to study, and to open, and improve, for the edification of others, but they are no further to be regarded than as they speak according to this rule.

3. It is the duty of those who are taught in the word, to support those who are appointed to teach them; for they are to communicate to them in all good things, freely and cheerfully to contribute of the good things which God has blessed them with, what is needful for their comfortable subsistence. Ministers are to give now, as they are to receive hereafter; (1 Tim. 5. 18.) and therefore they are not to entangle themselves with the affairs of this life; (2 Tim. 2. 4.) and therefore it is but fit and equitable, that, while they are sowing to others spiritual things, they should reap their carnal things. And this is the appointment of God himself; for as under the law, they who ministered about holy things, lived of the things of the temple; so hath the Lord ordained, that they who preach the gospel, should live of the gospel, 1 Cor. 9. 11, 13, 14.

V. Here is a caution to take heed of mocking God, or of deceiving ourselves, by imagining that he can be imposed upon by mere pretensions or professions; (v. 7.) Be not deceived, God is not mocked. This may be considered as referring to the foregoing exhortation; and so the design of it is to convince them that sin, in concealing their sin, they have been encouraged by any plausible pretences to excuse themselves from doing their duty in supporting their ministers; or it may be taken in a more general view, as respecting the whole business of religion, and so as designed to take men off from entertaining any vain hopes of enjoying its rewards, while they live in the neglect of its duties. The apostle here supposes that many arise, and endeavour to entice the world of religion, and especially the more self-deceiving and chargeable parts of it, though at the same time they may make a show and profession of it; but he assures them that this their way is their folly, for though hereby they may possibly impose upon others, yet they do but deceive themselves if they think to impose upon God; who is perfectly acquainted with their hearts as well as actions, and as he cannot be deceived, so he will not be mocked; and therefore to prevent this, he directs us to lay it down as a rule to ourselves, That whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap; or that according as we behave ourselves now so will our account be at the great day. Our present time is seed-time, in the other world there will be a great harvest; and as the husbandman reaps in the harvest according as he sows in the seersness, so we shall reap then as we sow now. And he further acquaints us, (v. 8.) that as there are two sorts of seedness, sowing to the flesh, and sowing to the Spirit, so accordingly will the reckoning be hereafter; If one soweth to the flesh, he shall of the flesh reap corruption. If we sow the wind, we shall reap the whirlwind. They who live a carnal sensual life, who, instead of employing themselves to the honour of God, and the good of others, spend all their thoughts and care and time, about the flesh, must expect no other fruit of such a course than corruption; a mean and short-lived satisfaction at present, and ruin and misery at the end of it. But, on the other hand, if they sow to the Spirit, according to the guidance and influence of the Spirit, do live a holy and spiritual life, a life of devotedness to God, and of usefulness and serviceableness to others, may depend upon it, that of the Spirit they shall reap life everlasting; they shall have the truest comfort in their present course, and an eternal life and happiness at the end of it. Note, They who go about to mock God, do but deceive themselves; hypocrisy is a life only as well as as wickedness, since the God we have to do with, can easily see through all our disguises, and will certainly deal with us hereafter, not according to our professions, but our practices.

VI. Here is a further caution given us, not to be weary in well doing, v. 9. As we should not excuse ourselves from any part of our duty, so neither should we give up the rest of it. There is in all of us too great a pruneness bent upon finding fault and flag and tire in duty, yea to fall off from it, particularly that part of it which the apostle here has a special regard to, that of doing good to others. This therefore he would have us carefully to watch and guard against; and he gives this very good reason for it, because in due season we shall reap, if we faint not; where he assures us, that there is a recompense, there is a reward, there is a benefit, that we shall of the flesh reap corruption. If we sow the wind, we shall reap the whirlwind. They who live a carnal sensual life, who, instead of employing themselves in well doing; that the world will certainly be bestowed on us in the proper season—if not in this world, yet undoubtedly in the next; but then that it is upon supposition that we faint not in the way of our duty: if we grow weary of it, and withdraw from it, we shall not only miss of this reward, but lose the comfort and advantage of what we have already done; but if we hold on and hold out in well-doing, though it may be delayed, yet it will surely come, and will be so great as to make us an abundant recompense for all our pains and constancy. Note, Perseverance in well-doing is our wisdom and interest, as well as duty, for to this only is the reward promised.

VII. Here is an exhortation to all Christians to do good in their places; (v. 10.) As we have therefore opportunity, let us do good. It is not enough that we be good ourselves, but we must do good to others, if we would approve ourselves to be Christians indeed. The duty here recommended to us, is the same that is spoken of in the foregoing verses; and as there the apostle exhorts us to sincerity and perseverance in it, so here he directs us both to the objects and the rule of it. 1. The objects of this duty are more generally all men; we are not to confine our charity and beneficence to any particular bounds, as the Jews and judaizing Christians were apt to do; but should be ready to extend it to all who partake of the same common nature with us, as far as we are capable, and they stand in need of us. But yet, in the exercise of it, we are to have a special regard to the household of faith, or to those who profess the same common faith, and are members of the same body of Christ, with us; though others are not to be excluded, yet these are to be preferred. The charity of Christians should be extensive charity; but yet therein a particular respect is to be had to good people. God does good to all, but in an especial manner he is good to his own servants; and we must in doing good be followers of God as dear children. 2. The rule which we are to observe in doing good to others, is, as we have opportunity, which implies, (1.) That we should be sure to do it while we have opportunity, or while our life lasts, which is the only season wherein we are capable of doing good to them. If therefore we would behave ourselves aright in this matter, we must not, as too many do, neglect it in our lifetime, and defer it till we come to die, under a pretence of doing something of this nature then: for as we must be sure that we shall then have an opportunity for it, if not, it we should, have we any ground to expect that what we do will be so acceptable to God, much less that we can atone for our past neglects by leaving something behind us for the good of others, when we can no longer keep it ourselves. But we should take care to do good in our life-time, yea, to make this the business of our lives. And, (2.) That we be ready to improve every opportunity for it: we should not content ourselves in having done some good already, but when any fresh occasions offer themselves, as far as our capacity reaches, we should be ready to embrace them too, for we are directed to give a portion to seven, and also to eight, Eccl. 11. 2. Note, (1.) As God has made it our duty to do good to others, so he takes care in his providence to furnish us with opportunities for it. The poor we have always with us, Matt. 26. 44. And, (2.) God gives us an opportunity of being useful to others, and we should improve it, according to our capacity and ability. (3.) We have need of godly wisdom and discretion to direct us in the exercise of our charity and beneficence, and particularly in the choice of the proper objects of it; for though none who stand in need of us, are to be wholly overlooked, yet there is a difference to be made between some and others.

11. Ye see how large a letter I have written unto you with mine own hand. 12. As many as desire to make a fair shew in the flesh, they constrain you to be circumcised; only lest they should suffer persecution for the cross of Christ. 13. For neither they themselves who are circumcised keep the law; but desire to have you circumcised, that they may glory in your flesh. 14. But God forbid, that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world. 15. For in Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth any thing, nor uncircumcision, but a new creature. 16. And as many as walk according to this rule, peace be on them, and mercy and upon the Israel of God. 17. From henceforth let no man trouble me; for I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus. 18. Brethren, the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with your spirit. Amen.

The apostle, having at large established the doctrine of the gospel, and endeavoured to persuade these Christians to a behaviour agreeable to it, seems as if he intended here to have put an end to the epistle, especially when he had acquainted them, that, as a particular mark of his respect to them, he had written this large letter with his own hand, and had not made use of another as his amanuensis, and only subscribed his name to it, as he was wont to do in his other epistles: but such were his affection to them, and concern to recover them from the ill impressions made upon them by their false teachers, that he cannot break off till he has once again given them the true character of those teachers, and an account of his own contrary temper and behaviour; that, by comparing these together, they might the more easily see how little reason they had to depart from the doctrine he had taught them, and to comply with their's.

1. He gives them the true character of those teachers who were industrious to seduce them, in several particulars. As, 1. They were men who desired to make a fair show in the flesh, v. 12. They were very zealous for the externals of religion; and, that they might be taken for such as had a full compliance with the rites of the ceremonial law, though at the same time they had little or no regard to real piety; for, as the apostle says of them in the following verse, neither do they themselves keep the law. Proud, vain, and carnal hearts desire nothing more than to make a fair show in the flesh; and they can easily be content with so much religion as will help them to keep up such a fair show; but frequently those have least of the substance of religion, who are most solicitous to make a show of it. 2. They were men who were afraid of suffering, for they constrained the Gentile Christians to be circumcised, only lest they should suffer persecution for the cross of Christ. It was not so much out of a regard to the law, as to themselves; they were willing to sleep in a whole skin, and to save their worldly cough, and cared not though they made shipwreck of faith and a good conscience. That the religion of the cross, the religion of the Redeemer, and the religion of the gospel, should be sought after by the Jews, and to keep up their reputation among them, and so to prevent the trouble that Paul, and other faithful professors of the doctrine of Christ, lay open to. And, 3. Another part of their character was, that they were men of a party-spirit, and who had no further zeal for the law than as it subserved their carnal and selfish designs; for they desired to have this message, that we were to be circumcised, that they might glory in their flesh, (v. 12.) as if the Gentiles, who had gained them over to their side, and made proselyte of them, of which they carried the mark in their flesh. And thus while they pretended to promote religion, they were the greatest enemies of it; for nothing has been more destructive to the interest of religion than men siding and party-making.

If he acquaints us, on the other hand, with his own profession of his own faith, hope, and joy; particularly,

1. That his principal glory was in the cross of Christ; God forbid, says he, that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, v. 14. By the cross of Christ is here meant, his sufferings and death on the cross, or the doctrine of salvation by a crucified Redeemer. This was what the Jews stumbled at, and the Greeks accounted foolishness; and the Judaizing teachers themselves, though they had embraced Christianity, yet were so far ashamed of it, that, in compliance with the Jews, and to avoid persecution from them, they were for mixing the observation of the law of Moses with faith in Christ, and putting themselves and their followers in a situation of being liable to the same or to a different opinion of it; he was so far from being offended at the cross of Christ, or ashamed of it, or afraid to own it, that he glories in it; yea, he desires to glory in nothing else, but rejects the thought of setting up anything in competition with it, as the object of his esteem, with the utmost abhorrence; God forbid, &c. This was the ground of all his hope as a Christian: this was the doctrine, which, as an apostle, he was resolved to preach: and whatever trials his firm adherence to it might bring upon him, he was ready, not only to submit to them, but to rejoice in them. Note, The cross of Christ is a good Christian's chief glory, and there is the greatest reason why we should glory in it, for to it we owe all our joys and hopes.

2. That he was dead to the world. By Christ, or by the cross of Christ, the world was crucified to him, and he to the world; he had experienced the power and virtue of it in constraining him from the world, and this was one great reason of his glorying in it. The false teachers were men of a worldly temper, their chief concern was about their secular interests, and therefore they accommodated their religion thereunto. But Paul was a man of another spirit; as the world had no kindness for him, so neither had he any great regard to it; he was got above the world, and the world, and the world's things, and dying out of it. This is a temper of mind that all Christians should be labouring after; and the best way to attain it, is, to converse much with the cross of Christ; the higher esteem we have of him, the meaner opinion shall we have of the world; and the more we contemplate the sufferings our dear Redeemer met with from the world, the less likely shall we be to be in love with it.

3. That he had not laid aside a mark of his religion on one side or other of the competing interests, but on sound Christianity, v. 15. There was at that time an unhappy division among Christians; circumcision and uncircumcision were become names by which they were distinguished from each other; for (ch. 2. 9, 12.) the Jewish Christians are called the circumcision, and they of the circumcision. The false teachers were very zealous for circumcision; yea, to that degree, as it respects the Gentiles too, that they did all they could to constrain the Gentile Christians to submit to it: wherein they had carried the matter much further than others did; for though the apostles connived at the use of it among the Jewish converts, yet they were by no means for imposing it on the Gentiles. But what they laid so great a stress upon, Paul made very little account of. It was indeed of great importance to the interest of Christianity, that none should be imposed on the Gentile converts, and therefore this he had set himself with the utmost vigour to oppose: but as for more circumcision or uncircumcision, whether those who had embraced the Christian religion had been Jews or Gentiles; and whether they were for or against continuing the use of circumcision, so that they did not place their religion in it—this was comparatively a matter of little concern to him. Paul had been very zealous in this, that in Jesus Christ, in his account, or under the Christian dispensation, neither circumcision availed any thing, nor uncircumcision, as to men's acceptance with God, but a new creature. Here he acquaints us, both wherein real religion does not, and wherein it does, consist; it does not consist in circumcision or uncircumcision, in our being in this or the other denomination of Christians; but it consists in our being new creatures: not in having a new name, or putting on a new face, but in our being renewed in the spirit of our minds, and having Christ formed in us: this is of the greatest account with God, and so it was with the apostle. If we compare this text with some others, we may more fully see what it is that renders us most acceptable to God, and which therefore we should be chiefly concerned about. Here we are told, that it is a new creature; and (ch. 5.6.) that it is faith which worketh by love, and (1 Cor. 7.19.) that it is the keeping the commandments of God: from these texts we may gather, that it is a change of heart, whereby we are disposed and enabled to believe in the Lord Jesus, and to live a life of devotedness to God; and that where this inward vital practical religion is wanting, no outward professions or personal names, will ever stand us in any stead, or be sufficient to recommend us to him. Were Christians duly concerned to experience this in themselves, and to preserve it in others, it would not make them lay aside their distinguishing names, yet it would at least take them off from laying so great a stress upon them, as they too often do. Note, Christians should take care to lay the stress of their religion where God has laid it, that is, on those things which are available to our acceptance with him; so we see the apostle did, and it is our wisdom and interest herein to follow his example.

The true Israel of God, and the chief chief consideration in religion, and what he laid the greatest stress upon, that is, not a mere empty name or profession, but a sound and saving change; in v. 16, he pronounces a blessing upon all those who walk according to this rule; And as many as walk according to this rule, peace be upon them, and mercy upon the Israel of God. The rule which he here speaks of, may be considered as signifying either more general, which is the whole word of God, which they keep or observe; and perfect rule of faith and life; or that doctrine of the gospel, or way of justification and salvation, which he laid down in this epistle, by faith in Christ without the works of the law; or, as more immediately referring to the new creature, which he had just before been speaking of. The blessings which he desires for those who walk according to this rule, or which he gives them the hope and prospect of, (for he speaks of other blessings as well,) are, peace and mercy—peace with God and conscience, and all the comforts of this life, as far as they are needful for them—and mercy, that is, an interest in the free love and favour of God in Christ, which are the spring and fountain of all other blessings. A foundation is laid for these in that gracious change which is wrought in them; and while they believe themselves as new creatures, and govern their lives and hopes by the rule of the gospel, they may most assuredly depend upon them. These, he declares, shall be the portion of all the Israel of God, by whom he means all sincere Christians, whether Jews or Gentiles; all who are Israelites indeed, who, though they may not be natural, yet are become the spiritual seed of Abraham; these, being heirs of his faith, are also heirs together with him of the promise; and consequently of all that peace and mercy here spoken of. The Jews and Judaizing teachers were for confirming these blessings only such as were circumcised, and kept the law of Moses; but, on the contrary, the apostle declares that they belong to all who walk according to the rule of the gospel, or of the new creature, even to all the Israel of God; intimating, that those only are to be considered as belonging to this rule, and not of that circumcision, which they insisted so much upon; and therefore that this was the true way to obtain peace and mercy. Note, (1.) Real Christians are such as walk by rule; not a rule of their own devising, but that which God himself has prescribed to them. (2.) Even those who walk according to this rule do yet stand in need of the mercy of God. But, (3.) All who sincerely endeavour to walk according to this rule, may be assured that peace and mercy shall be upon them: this is the best way to have peace with God, ourselves, and others; and therefore, as we may be sure of the favour of God now, so we may be sure that we shall find mercy with him hereafter.

4. That he had cheerfully suffered persecution for the sake of Christ and Christianity, v. 17. As the apostle declared, in the last verse of the former chapter, that he was a foolish Gentile, a blinded creature, and a cursed Redeemer, was what he chiefly gloried in, so he had been willing to run all hazards rather than he would betray this truth, or suffer it to be corrupted. The false teachers were afraid of persecution, and this was the great reason why they were so zealous for circumcision, as we see, v. 12. But this was the least of Paul's concern; he was not moved at any of the afflictions he met with, nor did he value his life dear to him, so that he might finish his course with joy, and the ministry, which he had received of the Lord Jesus, to testify the gospel of the grace of God, Acts 20. 24. He had already suffered much in the cause of Christ, for he bare in his body the marks of the Lord Jesus, the scars of those wounds which he had sustained from persecuting enemies, for his steady adherence to him, and that doctrine of the grace of God which he had so strongly and so often maintained, from hence it appeared that he was firmly persuaded of the truth and importance of it, and that he was far from being a favourer of circumcision, as they had falsely reported him to be; so, hereupon, with a becoming warmth and vehemence, suitable to his authority as an apostle, and to the deep concern of mind he was under, he insists upon it, that no man should henceforth trouble him, by opposing his doctrine and authority, or by contrary calumnies and reproaches as had been cast upon him; for as, both from what he had said, and what he had suffered, they appeared to be highly unjust and injurious, so also they were very unreasonable, who either raised or received them. Note, (1.) It may justly be presumed that men are fully persuaded of those truths which they are willing to suffer in the defence of. And, (2.) It is very unjust to charge those things upon a man which are contrary to the course of his profession not only to their profession, but their sufferings too.

The apostle, having now finished what he intended to write for the conviction and recovery of the churches of Galatia, concludes the epistle with his apostolical benediction, v. 18. He calls them his brethren, wherein he shews his great humility, and the tender affection he had for them, notwithstanding the ill treatment he had met with from them; and asks his leave of them with this very serious and affectionate prayer, that the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ may be with their spirit. This was a usual farewell wish of the apostle's; as we see, Rom. 16. 20, 24, and 1 Cor. 16. 23. And herein he prays, that they might enjoy the favour of Christ, both in its special effects and its sensible evidences; that they might receive from him all that grace and mercy he had promised them, which he had received from him himself, to strengthen them in their work, to establish them in their Christian course, and to encourage and comfort them under all the trials of life, and the prospect of death itself. This is fitly called the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, as he is both the sole Purchaser and the appointed Dispenser of it; and though these churches had done enough to forfeit it, by suffering themselves to be drawn into an opinion and practice highly dishonourable to Christ, as well as dangerous to them; yet, out of his great concern for them, and knowing of what importance it was to them, he earnestly desires it on their behalf; yea, that it might be with their spirit, that they might continually experience the influences of it upon their souls, disposing and enabling them to act with sincerity.
and uprightness in religion. We need desire no more to make us happy than the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ. This the apostle begs for these Christians, and therein shews us what we are chiefly concerned to obtain; and, both for their and our encouragement to hope for it, he adds his amen.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS,

OF THE

EPISTLE OF ST. PAUL TO THE EPHESIANS.

Completed by Mr. Roswell.

SOME think that this epistle to the Ephesians was a circular letter sent to several churches; and that the copy directed to the Ephesians, happened to be taken into the canon, and so it came to bear that particular inscription. And they have been induced the rather to think this, because it is the only one of all St. Paul's epistles, that has nothing in it peculiarly adapted to the state or case of that particular church; but it has much of common concernment to all Christians; and especially to all who, having been Gentiles in times past, were converted to Christianity. But then it may be observed, on the other hand, that the epistle is expressly inscribed (ch. 1. 1.) to the saints which are at Ephesus; and in the close of it he tells them that he had sent Tychicus unto them, whom, in 2 Tim. 4. 12. he says, he had sent to Ephesus.

It is an epistle that bears date out of a prison: and some have observed that what this apostle wrote when he was a prisoner, had the greatest relish and savour in it of the things of God. When his tribulations did abound, his consolations and experiences did much more abound. Whence we may observe, that the afflictive exercises of God's people, and particularly of his ministers, often tend to the advantage of others as well as to their own.

The apostle's design is, to settle and establish the Ephesians in the truth; and further to acquaint them with the mystery of the gospel, in order to it. In the former part he represents the great privilege of the Ephesians, who, having been in time past idolatrous heathens, were now converted to Christianity, and received into covenant with God, which he illustrates from a view of their deplorable state before their conversion, ch. 1—3. In the latter part (which we have in the 4th, 5th, and 6th chapters) he instructs them in the principal duties of religion, both personal and relative; and exhorts and quickens them to the faithful discharge of them. Zanchy observes, that we have here an epitome of the whole Christian doctrine, and of almost all the chief heads of divinity.

CHAP. I.

In this chapter, we have, I. The introduction to the whole epistle, which is much the same as in others, v. 1, 2. II. The apostle's thanksgivings and praises to God for his inestimable blessings bestowed on the believing Ephesians, v. 3—14. III. His earnest prayers to God in their behalf, v. 15—23. This great apostle was wont to abound in prayers and in thanksgivings to almighty God; which he generally so disposes and orders, that at the same time they carry with them and convey the great and important doctrines of the Christian religion, and the most weighty instructions to all those who seriously peruse them.

1. PAUL, an apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God, to the saints which are at Ephesus, and to the faithful in Christ Jesus: 2. Grace be to you, and peace, from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ.

Here is, 1. The title St. Paul takes to himself, as belonging to him—Paul, an apostle of Jesus Christ, &c. He reckoned it a great honour to be employed... by Christ, as one of his messengers to the sons of men. The apostles were prime officers in the Christian church, being extraordinary ministers appointed for a time only. They were furnished by their great Lord with extraordinary gifts, and the immediate assistance of the Spirit, that they might be fitted for publishing and spreading the gospel, and for the governing of the church in its infant-state. Such a one St. Paul was, and that not by the will of man conferring that office upon him, nor by his own intrusion into it; but by the will of God, very expressley and plainly signified to him; he being immediately called (as the other apostles were) by Christ himself to the work. Every faithful minister of Christ (though his call and office are not of so extraordinary a nature) may, with our apostle, reflect on it as an honour and comfort to himself, that he is what he is, by the will of God.

2. The persons to whom this epistle is sent—To the saints which are at Ephesus, to the Christians who were members of the church at Ephesus, the metropolis of Asia. He calls them saints, for such they were in profession, such they were bound to be in truth and reality; and many of them were such. All Christians must be saints; and if they come not under that character on earth, they will never be saints in glory. He calls them the faithful in Christ Jesus, believers in him, and firm and constant in their adherence to him, and to his truths and ways. They are not saints, who are not faithful, believing in Christ, firmly adhering to him, and true to the profession they make of relation to their Lord. Note, It is not only the honour of ministers, but of private Christians too, to have obtained mercy of the Lord to be faithful.—In Christ Jesus, from whom they derive all their grace and spiritual strength; and in whom their persons, and all that they perform, are made accepted. 3. The apostolical benediction—Grace be to you, &c. This is the token in every epistle; and it speaks the apostle's good will to his friends, and a real desire of their welfare. By grace we are to understand the free and undeserved love and favour of God, and those graces of the Spirit which proceed from it; by peace, all other blessings, spiritual and temporal, the fruits and product of the former. No peace without grace. No peace, nor grace, but from God the Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ. These peculiar blessings proceed from God, not as a Creator, but as a Father by special regard to Christ in his person as Mediator. For Christ, who, having purchased them for his people, has a right to bestow them upon them. Indeed the saints, and the faithful in Christ Jesus, had already received grace and peace; but the increase of these is very desirable, and the best saints stand in need of fresh supplies of the graces of the Spirit, and cannot but desire to improve and grow: and therefore they should pray, each one for himself, and for another, that such blessings may still abound upon them.

After this short introduction, he comes to the matter and body of the epistle; and though it may seem somewhat peculiar in a letter, yet the Spirit of God saw fit that his discourse of divine things in this chapter should be cast into prayers and praises: which as they are solemn addresses to God, so they convey weighty instructions to others. Prayer may prevail; and praise may do so too.

3. Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ: 4. According as he hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy, and without blame before him in love: 5. Having predestinated us unto the adoption of children by Jesus Christ to himself, according to the good pleasure of his will. To the praise of the glory of his grace, wherein he hath made us accepted in the Beloved. 7. In whom we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of his grace; 8. Wherein he hath abounded toward us in all wisdom and prudence; 9. Having made known unto us the mystery of his will, according to his good pleasure which he hath purposed in himself: 10. That in the dispensation of the fulness of times, he might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven and which are on earth; even in him, 11. In whom also we have obtained an inheritance, being predestinated according to the purpose of him who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will; 12. That we should be to the praise of his glory, who first trusted in Christ. 13. In whom ye also trusted, after that ye heard the word of truth, the gospel of your salvation: in whom also, after that ye believed, ye were sealed with that holy Spirit of promise, 14. Which is the earnest of our inheritance until the redemption of the purchased possession, unto the praise of his glory.

He begins with thanksgivings and praise, and enlarges with a great deal of fluency and copiousness of affection upon the exceeding great and precious benefits which we enjoy by Jesus Christ. For, the great privileges of our religion are very aptly recounted and enlarged upon in our prayers to God.

In general, (v. 3.) he blesses God for spiritual blessings; where he styles him the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ: for, as Mediator, the Father was his God; as God, and the second Person in the blessed Trinity, God was his Father. It speaks the mystical union betwixt Christ and believers, that the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ is their God and Father; and that, in and through him. All blessings come from God, as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. No good can be expected from a righteous and holy God to sinful creatures, but by his mediation. He hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings. Note, Spiritual blessings are the best blessings with which God blesses us, and for which we are to bless him. HE blesses US by bestowing such things upon us as make us really blessed. WE cannot thus bless God again; but must do it by praising and magnifying, and speaking well of him on that account: and whom God blesses with some, he blesses with all spiritual blessings; to whom he frees all these things. It is not so with temporal blessings: some are favoured with health, and not with riches; some with riches, and not with health, &c. But where God blesses with spiritual blessings, he blesses with all. They are spiritual blessings in heavenly places; that is, say some, in the church, distinguished from the world, and called out of it. Or it may be read, in heavenly things, such as come from heaven, and are designed to prepare men for it, and to secure their reception into it. We should hence learn to mind spiritual and heavenly things as the principal things, spiritual and heavenly blessings as the best blessings, with which we cannot be miserable, and without which we cannot be helpless. All things are affixed to things which are above. These we are blessed with in Christ: for as all our services ascend to God through Christ, so all our blessings are conveyed to us the same way; he being the Mediator between God and us.

The particular spiritual blessings with which we are blessed in Christ, and for which we ought to rejoice (all of them many of them) here enumerated and enlarged upon.

1. Election and predestination, which are the secret springs whence the others flow, v. 4, 5, 11. Election, or choice, respects that lump or mass of mankind, out of which some are chosen, from which they are separated and distinguished. Predestination has respect to the blessings they are designed for; particularly the adoption of children; it being the purpose of God, that in due time we should become his adopted children, and have a right to all the privileges, and to the inheritance, of children. We have here the date of this act of love; it was before the foundation of the world: not only before God's people had a being, but before the world had a beginning; for they were chosen in the counsel of God from all eternity. It magnifies these blessings to a high degree, that they are the produce and eternal counsel of God. The aims which you give to beggars at your doors, proceed from a sudden resolve; but the provision which a parent makes for his children, is the result of many thoughts, and is put into his last will and testament with a great deal of solemnity. And as this magnifies divine love, so it secures the blessings to God's elect; for the purpose of God according to election shall stand. He acts in pursuance of his eternal purpose, not being afraid to substitute his counsels upon his people. He hath blessed us—according as he hath chosen us in him, in Christ the great Head of the election, who is emphatically called God's elect, his chosen; and in the chosen Redeemer an eye of favour was cast upon them. Observe here one great end and design of this choice; chosen—that we should be holy; not because he foresaw they would be holy, but because he determined to make them holy. This is the end of all our spiritual blessings; the end, are chosen to holiness as the means. Their sanctification, as well as their salvation, is the result of the counsels of divine love. And without blame before him; that their holiness might not be only external and in outward appearance, so as to prevent blame from men; but internal and real, and what God himself will account such, who looketh at the heart; such holiness proceeding from love to God and to his service, as that secret deep of grace, as the principle of all true holiness. The original word signifies such an innocence as no man can carp at; and therefore some understand it of that perfect holiness which the saints shall attain to in the life to come, which will be eminently before God; they being in his immediate presence for ever.

Here is also the rule, and the forecast of God's electric actions, and this good pleasure of his will; (v. 5.) not for the sake of any thing in them foreseen, but because it was his sovereign will, and a thing highly pleasing to him. It is according to the purpose, the fixed and unalterable will, of him who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will, (v. 11.) who powerfully accomplishes whatever concerns his elect, as he has wisely and freely foreordained and decreed, to the last and design of all which, is his own glory. To the praise of the glory of his grace, (v. 6.) That we should be to the praise of his glory, (v. 12.) th.t we should live and behave ourselves in such a manner that his rich grace might be magnified, and appear glorious, and worthy of the highest praise. Acts of God, and from him, and through him, and therefore all must be to his glory, and come from him, and through him. The glory of God is his own end, and it should be our's in all that we do.* The next spiritual blessing the apostle takes notice of, is,

2. Acceptance with God through Jesus Christ; Wherein, or by which grace, he hath made us accepted in the Beloved, v. 6. Jesus Christ is the Beloved of his Father, (Matt. 3. 17.) as well as of angels and saints. It is our great privilege to be accepted of God, which implies his love to us, and his taking us under his care, and into his family. We cannot be thus accepted of God, but in and through Jesus Christ. He loves his people for the sake of the Beloved.

3. Remission of sins, and redemption, through the blood of Jesus, v. 7. No remission without redemption. It was by reason of sin that we were captivated; and we cannot be freed from our captivity but by the remission of our sins. This redemption we have in Christ, and this remission through his blood. The guilt and the stain of sin could be no otherwise removed than by the blood of Jesus. All our spiritual blessings flow down to us in that stream. This great benefit, which comes freely to us, was dearly bought and paid for by our blessed Lord; and yet it is according to the riches of God's grace. God is not merely a blessing to his people, but he is rich in the fulness of all things; and he is consistent in the great affair of man's redemption. God was satisfied by Christ as our Substitute and Surety; but it was rich grace that would accept of a Surety, when he might have executed the severity of the law upon the transgressors; and it was rich grace to provide such a Surety as his own Son, and freely to deliver him up, when nothing of that nature could have entered into our thoughts, or have been any otherwise found for us. In which view, he has not only manifested riches of grace, but hath abounded towards us in all wisdom and prudence; (v. 8.) wisdom in contriving the dispensation, and prudence in executing the counsel of his will, as he has done. How illustrious have the divine wisdom and prudence rendered themselves, in so happily adjusting the matter between justice and mercy in this grand affair; in securing the honour of God and the observance of his law, at the same time that the recovery of sinners and their salvation are ascertained and made sure!

4. Another privilege which the apostle here blesses God for, is, divine revelation—that God hath made known to us the mystery of his will; (v. 9.) so much of his good will to men, which had been concealed for a long time, and is still concealed from so great a part of the world: this we owe to Christ, who, having suffered for our sins, and being' accepted in the Beloved, came to declare his will to the children of men. According to his good pleasure, his secret counsels concerning man's redemption, which he had purposed, or resolved upon, merely in and from himself, and not for any thing in them. In this revelation, and in his making known unto us the mystery of his will, the wisdom and the prudence of God do abundantly shine forth. In the dispensation of truth, and the gospel of our salvation. Every word of it is true; it contains and instructs us in the most weighty and important truths, and it is confirmed and sealed by the very oath of God: from whence we should learn to betake ourselves to it in all our searches after divine truth. It is the gospel of our

* This passage has been understood by some in a very different sense, and with a special reference to the conversion of these Ephesians to Christianity. Those who have a mind to see what is said to this purpose, may consult Mr. Locke, and other well-known writers, on the place.
salvation: it publishes the glad tidings of salvation, and contains the offer of it: it points out the way that leads to it; and the blessed Spirit renders the reading and the ministration of it effectual to the salvation of souls. O, how we ought to prize this glorious gospel, and to bless God for it! This is the light shining in a dark place, for which we have reason to be thankful, and to which we should take heed.

5. Union in and with Christ, is a great privilege, a spiritual blessing, and the foundation of many others. He gathers together in one all things in Christ, v. 10. All the lines of divine revelation meet in Christ; all religion centres in him. Jews and Gentiles were united to each other, by being both united to Christ. Things in heaven, and things on earth, are gathered together in him; peace made, correspondence settled, between heaven and earth, through the medium of Christ. Christ is the one in whom we are built one with the church through Christ: this God purposed in himself, and it was his design in that dispensation which was to be accomplished by his sending of Christ in the fulness of time, at the exact time that God had prefixed and settled.

6. The eternal inheritance is the great blessing with which we are blessed in Christ; In whom also we have obtained an inheritance, v. 11. Heaven is the inheritance of all believers, and the covenant of which is a sufficient portion for a soul: it is conveyed in the way of an inheritance; being the gift of a Father to his children. If children, then heirs. All the blessings that we have in hand, are but small if compared with the inheritance. What is laid out upon an heir in his minority, is nothing to what is reserved for him when he comes to age. Christians are said to have obtained this inheritance, as they have a present right to it; and enjoy an actual possession of it, in Christ their Head and Representative.

7. The seal and earnest of the Spirit are of the number of these blessings. We are said to be sealed with that holy Spirit of promise, v. 13. The blessed Spirit is holy himself, and he makes us holy. He is called the Spirit of promise, as he is the promised Spirit. By him believers are sealed; that is, separated and set apart for God, and distinguished and marked as belonging to him. The Spirit is the Earnest of our inheritance, v. 14. The earnest is part of payment, and it secures the full sum: so is the gift of the Holy Ghost; all his influences and operations, both as a Sanctifier and a Comforter, are heaven begun, glory in the seed and bud. The Spirit's illumination is an earnest of everlasting light; sanctification is an earnest of perfect holiness; and his comforts are earnest of everlasting joc und. He is said to be the Earnest, until the redemption of the purchased possession. It may be called here the possession, because this earnest makes it as sure to the heirs as though they were already possessed of it; and it is purchased for them by the blood of Christ. The redemption of it is mentioned, because it was mortgaged and forfeited by sin; and Christ restores it to us, and so is said to redeem it, in allusion to the law of redemption, as such, and be the gracious promise that is, which secures the gift of the Holy Ghost to them who ask him.

The apostle mentions the great end and design of God in bestowing all these spiritual privileges; that we should be to the praise of his glory, who first trusted in Christ, we to whom the gospel was first preached, and who were first converted to the faith of Christ, and to the placing upon us this, what a gracious promise that is, which secures the gift of the Holy Ghost to them who ask him.

(v. 17.) that he would give greater measures of the Spirit. Observe, Even the best of Christians need to be prayed for; and while we hear well of our Christian friends, we should think ourselves obliged to intercede with God for them, that they may abound and increase yet more and more.

Now what is it that St. Paul prays for in their behalf? Not that they might be freed from persecutions, that they might possess the riches, honours, or pleasures of the world; but the great thing he prays for, is, the illumination of their understandings, and that their knowledge might increase and abound: he means it of a practical and experimental knowledge. The graces and comforts of the Spirit are communicated to the soul by the enlightening of the understanding. In this way he gains and keeps possession. Satan takes a contrary way; he is possessed by this and that passion, Christ, by the understanding. Observe,

1. Whence this knowledge must come; from the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, v. 17. The Lord is a God of knowledge; and there is no sound, saving, knowledge, but what comes from him; and therefore to him we must look for it, who is the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, (v. 3.) and the Father of glory. It is from him that every ray of knowledge must be derived; all glory is due to him from his creatures, and he is the Author of all that glory with which his saints are, or shall be, invested. Now he gives knowledge, by giving the Spirit of knowledge; for the Spirit of God is the Teacher of the saints; the Spirit of wisdom and revelation. We have the revelation of the Spirit in the word: but will that avail us, if we have not the wisdom of the Spirit in the heart? If the same Spirit who indited the sacred scriptures do not take the veil from off our hearts, and enable us to understand and improve them, we shall be never the better. In the knowledge of him, or for the acknowledgment of him; not only a speculative knowledge of Christ, and of what relates to him, but an acknowledgment of Christ's authority by an obedient conformity to him, which must be by the help of the Spirit of wisdom and revelation. This knowledge is first in the understanding. He prays that the eyes of their understanding may be enlightened, v. 18. Observe, Those who have their eyes opened, and have some understanding in the things of God, have need to be more and more enlightened, and to have their knowledge more clear and distinct and experimental.

Christians should not think it enough to have warm affections, but they should labour to have clear understandings; they should be ambitious of being sensible of the riches, honour, and glory of this inheritance.

2. What it is that he more particularly desires they should grow in the knowledge of. (1.) The hope of his calling, v. 18. Christianity is our calling. God has called us to it, and on that account it is said to be his calling. There is a hope in this calling; for those who deal with God, deal upon trust. And it is a desirable thing to know what this hope of ours is, and what the glory of this inheritance is, at the Father's right hand in the heavenly places, and what it costs to get it.

And the infinite privileges of God's people, and the expectations they have from God, and with respect to the heavenly world, as to be quickened thereby to the utmost diligence and patience in the Christian course. We ought to labour after, and pray earnestly for, a clearer insight into, and a fuller acquaintance with, the great objects of a Christian's hopes and desires, the riches of the glory of his inheritance in the saints. An inheritance prepared for the saints, there is a present inheritance in the saints: for grace is glory begun, and holiness is happiness in the bud. There is a glory in this inheritance; riches of glory, rendering the Christian more excellent and more truly honourable than all about him; and it is desirable to know this experimentally; to be acquainted with the principles, pleasures, and powers, of the spiritual and divine life. It may be understood of the glorious inheritance in or among the saints in heaven, where God does, as it were, lay forth all his riches, to make them happy and glorious, and where all that the saints are in possession of is transcendently glorious: as the knowledge that can be attained of this upon earth, is very desirable, and must be evidenced, and manifested, and achieved, by diligence and patience, by reading, and contemplation, and prayer, to know as much of heaven as we can, that we may be desiring and longing to be there. (3.) The exceeding greatness of God's power toward them who believe, v. 19. The practical belief of the all-sufficiency of God, and of the omnipotence of divine grace, is absolutely necessary to a close and steady walking with him. It is a desirable thing to know experimentally his power and power; to be made to abound and increase yet more and more; to be carried and carrying on the work of faith in our souls. It is a difficult thing to bring a soul to believe fully in Christ, and to venture its all upon his righteousness, and upon the hope of eternal life. It is nothing less than an almighty power that will work this in us. The apostle speaks here with a mighty fluency and copiousness of expression, and yet, at the same time, as if it were the most natural and easy to express the exceeding greatness of God's almighty power, that power which God exerts toward his people, and by which he raised Christ from the dead, v. 20. That indeed was the great proof of the truth of the gospel to the world: but the transcript of that in ourselves, (our sanctification, and rising from the death of sin, in conformity to Christ's resurrection,) is the great proof to us. Though this cannot prove the truth of the gospel to another who knows nothing of the matter, (there the resurrection of Christ is the proof,) yet to be able to speak experimentally, as the Samaritans, "We have heard him ourselves, we have felt a mighty change in our own hearts," will make us able to say, with the fullest satisfaction, "Now we believe, and are sure, that this is the Christ, the Son of God." Many understand the apostle here as speaking of that exceeding greatness of power, which God will exert for the raising the bodies of believers to eternal life, even the same mighty power which he wrought in Christ when he raised him, &c. And how desirable a thing must it be to become at length acquainted with that power, by being raised out of the grave thereby unto eternal life!

Having said something of Christ and his resurrection, the apostle digresses a little from the subject he is upon, to make some further honourable mention of the head of the body, Christ, at the Father's right hand in the heavenly places, &c. v. 20, 21. Jesus Christ is advanced above all, and he is set in authority over all, they being made subject to him. All the glory of the upper world, and all the powers of both worlds, are entirely devoted to him. The Father hath put all things under his feet, (v. 22.) according to the promise, Ps. 8:6. "Thou art Lord of all;* and therefore any of them he may think proper to employ to his service;* they must either yield him sincere obedience, or fall under the weight of his sceptre, and receive their doom from him. God GAVE him to be Head over all things. It was a gift to Christ, considered as Mediator, to be advanced to such dominion and headship, and to such a mystical body prepared for him: and it was a gift to the church, to be provided with a Head, the figure of the Human and Divine Person, in whom God gave him to be the Head over all things. He gave him all power both in heaven and in earth. The Father loves the Son, and hath given ALL things into his hands. But that which completes the comfort of this, is, that he is the Head over all things to the church; he is therefore intrusted with all power, that he may dispose of all the affairs of the providential Kingdom in sub serviciness to the designs of his grace: concerning his church. With this therefore we may answer the messengers of the nations, that the Lord hath founded Zion. The same power that supports the world, supports the church; and we are sure he loves his church, for it is his body, (v. 25.) his mystical body, and he will support it. It is the fulness of time that filleth all in all. Jesus Christ filleth all in all; he supplies all defects in all his members, filling them with his Spirit, and even with the fulness of God, ch. 3. 19. And yet the church is said to be his fulness; because Christ as Mediator would not be complete if he had not a church. How could he be a King if he had not a kingdom? This therefore comes in to the honour of Christ, as Mediator, that the church is his fulness.

CHAP. II.

This chapter contains an account, I. Of the miserable condition of these Ephesians by nature, (v. 1. 3.) and again, v. 11. 12. II. Of the glorious change that was wrought in them by converting grace, (v. 4. 10.) and again, v. 13. III. Of the great and mighty privileges that converted Jews and Gentiles both receive from Christ, v. 14. 22. The apostle endeavours to affect them with a due sense of the wonderful change which divine grace had wrought in them; and this is very applicable to that great change which the same grace works in all those who are brought into this state of things. The words that we have here now picture both of the misery of unregenerate men, and of the happy condition of converted souls; enough to awaken and alarm those who are yet in their sins, and to put them upon hearing out of this state and condition and to set forth and delight those whom God hath quickened, with a consideration of the mighty privileges with which they are invested.

1. AND you hath he quickened, who were dead in trespasses and sins; 2. Wherein in time past ye walked according to the course of this world, according to the prudence of the air, the spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience: 3. Among whom also we all had our conversation in times past, in the lusts of our flesh, fulfilling the desires of the flesh and of the mind; and were by nature the children of wrath, even as others. The miserable condition of the Ephesians by nature, is here in part described. Observe,

1. Unregenerate souls are dead in trespasses and sins. All those who are in their sins, are dead in sin; yes, in trespasses and sins; which may signify all sorts of sins, habitual and actual; sins of heart and of life. Sin is the death of the soul. Wherever that prevails, there is a privation of all spiritual life. Sinners are dead in state, being destitute of the principles and powers of spiritual life; and cut off from God, the Fountain of life: and they are dead in law, as a condemned malefactor is said to be a dead man.

2. A state of sin is a state of conformity to this world, or to the spirit of this world, as the Devil, or the prince of the air, or the spirit that now worketh, is here thus described. See Matt. 12. 24. 26. The legions of apostate angels are as one power united under one chief; and therefore what is called the powers of darkness elsewhere, is here spoken of in the singular number. The air is represented as the seat of his kingdom: and it was the opinion of both Jews and Heathens, that the air is full of spirits, and that there they exercise and exert themselves. The Devil seems to have some power (by God's permission) in the lower region of the air; there he is at hand to tempt men, and to do as much mischief to the world as he can; but it is the comfort and joy of God's people, that he who is Head over all things to the church, has conquered the Devil, and has him in his chain. But wicked men are slaves to Satan, for they walk according to him; they conform their lives and actions to the will and pleasure of this great usurper. The course and tenor of their lives are according to his suggestions, and in compliance with his temptations; they are subject to him, and are led captive by him at his will; whereupon he is called the god of this world, and the spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience. The children of disobedience are such as choose to disobey God, and to serve the Devil; in these he works very powerfully and effectually. As the good Spirit works that which is good in obedient souls, so this evil spirit works that which is evil in wicked men; and he now works, not only heretofore, but even since the world has been blessed with the light of the glorious gospel. The apostle adds, Among whom also we all had our conversation in times past; which words refer to the Jews, whom God signifies here to have been in the like sad and miserable condition by nature, and to have been as vile and wicked as the unregenerate Gentiles themselves; and whose natural state he further describes in the next words.

4. We are by nature drudges to the flesh, and to our corrupt affections, v. 3. By fulfilling the desires of the flesh and of the mind, men contract that filthiness of flesh and spirit which the apostle exhorts Christians to cleanse themselves from, 2 Cor. 7. 1. The fulfilling the desires of the flesh and of the mind, includes all the sin and wickedness that are acted in, and by, both the inferior and the higher and nobler powers of the soul. We lived in the actual commission of all those sins which corrupt nature inclined us unto. The carnal mind makes a man a perfect slave to his vicious appetite. Fulfilling the viles of the flesh, &c. so the word may be rendered; denoting the efficacy of these lusts, and what power they have over those who yield themselves up unto them.

5. We are by nature the children of wrath, even as others. The Jews were so, as well as the Gentiles; and one man is as much so as another by nature, not only by custom and imitation, but from the time when we began to exist, and by reason of our inherent inclinations and appetites. All men, being naturally children of disobedience, are also by nature children of wrath; God is angry with the wicked every day. Our state and course are such as deserve wrath, and would end in eternal wrath, if divine grace did not interpose. What reason have sinners then to be looking out for that grace that will make them, of children of wrath, children of God and heirs of glory! Thus far the apostle has described the misery of a natural state in these verses, which we shall find him pursuing again in some following ones.

4. But God, who is rich in mercy, for his great love wherewith he loved us. 5. Even when we were dead in sins, hath quickened us together with Christ, (by grace ye are saved.) 6. And hath raised us up together, and made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus: 7. That in the ages to come he might shew the exceeding riches of his grace in his kindness toward us, through Christ Jesus. 8. For by grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves: it is the gift of God: 9. Not of works, lest any man should boast: 10. For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them. 11. Wherefore remember, that ye being in time past Gentiles in the flesh, who are called Uncircumcision by that which is called the Circumcision in the flesh made by hands; 12. That at that time ye were without Christ, being aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenants of promise, having no hope, and without God in the world: 13. But now in Christ Jesus, ye who sometimes were far off are made nigh by the blood of Christ.

Here the apostle begins his account of the glorious change that was wrought in them by converting grace; where observe,

I. By whom, and in what manner, it was brought about and effected. 1. Negatively; not of yourselves, v. 5. Our faith, our conversion, and our eternal salvation, are not the mere product of our own merit and abilities. We see in the divine works, that no man should boast, v. 9. These things are not brought to pass by any thing done by us, and therefore all boasting is excluded; he who glorifies, must not glory in himself, but in the Lord. There is no room for any man's boasting of his own abilities and power; or as though he had done any thing that might deserve such immense favours from God. 2. Positively; But God, of his own good pleasure, &c. v. 4. God himself is the Author of this great and happy change, and his great love is the spring and fontal cause of it; thence he resolved to shew mercy. Love is his inclination to do us good, considered simply as creatures; Mercy respects us as apostate and as miserable creatures. Observe, God's eternal love or good-will toward his creatures, is the fountain whence all his mercies vouchsafed to us proceed; and that love of God is great love, and that mercy of his is rich mercy; inexpressibly great, and inexpressibly rich. And then by grace ye are saved, (v. 5.) and by grace are ye saved through faith—it is the gift of God, v. 8. Note, Every converted sinner is a saved sinner; such are delivered from sin and wrath; they are brought into a state of salvation, and have a right given them by grace to eternal happiness. The grace that saves them, is, the free undeserved goodness and favour of God; and we believe, by faith, to salvation, and obtain salvation through faith, is entirely owing to divine assistance and grace: God has ordered all so that the whole shall appear to be of grace. Observe,

II. Wherein this change consists: in several particulars, answering to the misery of our natural state; some of which are enumerated in this section, and others are mentioned below. 1. We were dead are quickened, &c. v. 4. We were dead from the quickness of sin, and have a principle of spiritual life implanted in us. Grace in the soul is a new life in the soul. As death locks up the senses, seals up all the powers and faculties, so does a state of sin, as to any thing that is good; grace unlocks and opens all, and enlarges the soul. Observe, A regenerate sinner becomes a new creature; he lives a life of already passed, being born of God; and he lives in the sense of the law, being delivered from the guilt of sin by pardoning and justifying grace. He hath quickened us together with Christ; our spiritual life results from our union with Christ; it is in him that we live: Because I live, ye shall live also. 2. We who were buried, are raised up, v. 6. What remains yet to be done, is where speaking of as though it were already passed, though indeed we are raised up in virtue of our union with him whom God hath raised from the dead. When he raised Christ from the dead, he did in effect raise up all believers together with him, he being their common Head; and when he placed him at his right hand in heavenly places, he advanced and glorified them in and with him, their raised and exalted Head and Forerunner. And made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus. This may be understood in another sense; sinners roll themselves in the dust; sanctified souls sit in heavenly places, are raised above the world; the world is as nothing to them, compared with what it has been, and compared with what the other world is. Saints are not only Christ's freemen, but they are assessors with him; by the assistance of his grace they have ascended with him above this world to a higher sphere, and from the universal expectation of it. They are not only servants to the best of Masters in the best work, but they are exalted to reign with him; they sit upon the throne with Christ, as he is set down with his Father on his throne.

III. Observe what is the great design and aim of God in producing and effecting this change: And this, 1. With respect to others, that in the ages to come he might shew the exceeding riches of his grace, &c. (v. 7.) We are here represented as a specimen and proof of his great goodness and mercy, for the encouragement of sinners in future time. Observe, The goodness of God in converting and saving sinners heretofore, is a proper encouragement to others in after-time to hope in his grace and mercy, and to apply themselves to these. God having this in his design, poor sinners should take great encouragement from it. As we have been saved, so shall others. We have a specimen in us, of the riches of grace and kindness, from riches of grace, and from exceeding riches of grace, to which this change is owing? Through Christ Jesus, by and through whom God conveys all his favour and blessings to us. 2. With respect to the regenerated sinners themselves; For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, &c. v. 10. It appears that all is of grace, because all our spiritual advantages are from God. We are his workmanship; he means in respect of the new creation, not only as men, but as saints. The new man is a new creature; and God is its Creator. It is a new birth, and we are born or begotten of his will. In Christ Jesus, on the account of what he has done and suffered, and by the influence and operation of his blessed Spirit. Unto good works, &c. The apostle having before ascribed this change to divine grace, in exclusion of works; lest he should seem thereby to discourage good works, he here observes, that though the change is to be ascribed to nothing of that nature, (for we are the workmanship of God,) yet God, in this new creation, has designed and prepared us for good works; Created unto good works, with a design that we should be fruitful in them. Wherever God by his grace implants good principles, they are intended to be for good works, which God hath before ordained, decreed and appointed. Or, the words may be read, To which God hath before prepared us, by blessing us with the knowledge of his will, and with the assistance of his Holy Spirit; and by producing such a change in us.

That we should walk in them, glorify God by an exemplary conversation, and by our perseverance in holiness.

In the eleventh and twelfth verses the apostle proceeds in his account of the miserable condition of these Ephesians by nature. Wherefore remember, &c. v. 11. As if he had said, "You should remember what you have been, and compare it with what you now are, in order to humble yourselves, and to excite your love and thankfulness to God." Note, Converted sinners ought frequently to reflect upon the sinfulness and misery of the estate they were in by nature. Store gathered in the flesh, lying in the corruption of their natures, and being destitute of circumscription, the outward sign of an interest in the covenant of grace. Who are called uncircumcision by that, &c. that is, "You were reproached and upbraided for it by the formal Jews, who made an external profession, and who looked no further than the outward ordinance. Note, Hypocritical professors are apt to value themselves chiefly on their external privileges, and to reproach and despise others who are destitute of them. The apostle describes the misery of their case in several particulars, v. 12. "At that time, while ye were Gentiles, and in an unconverted state, ye were," (1.) "In a Christless condition, without the knowledge of the Messiah, and without any saving interest in him or relation to him." It is true of all unconverted sinners, all those who are destitute of faith, that they have no saving interest in Christ; and it must be a sad and deplorable thing for a soul to be without Christ. Being without Christ, they were, (2.) Aliens from the commonwealth of Israel; they did not belong to Christ's church, and had no communion with it, that being confined to the Israelitish nation. It is no small privilege to be placed in the church of Christ, and to share with the members of it in the advantages peculiar to it. The apostle proceeds, (3.) from the covenants of promise. The covenant of grace has ever been the same for substance; though, having undergone various additions and improvements in the several ages of the church, it is called covenants; and the covenants of promise, because it is made up of promises, and particularly contains the great promise of the Messiah, and of eternal life through him. Now the Ephesians, in their Gentile state, never had any history or Scripture, or promise, by which they were bound to God; and they never had any interest or hope, or expectation, or promise, of salvation by the covenant of grace. And the covenant are the ground and foundation of all the Christian's hopes. (5.) They were in a state of distance and estrangement from God; Without God in the world; not without some general knowledge of a deity, for they worshipped idols; but living without any due regard to him, any acknowledged dependence on him, and any special interest in him. The words are, atheists in the world; for they denied many gods, yet they were without the true God.

The apostle proceeds, (v. 13.) further to illustrate the happy change that was made in their state; But now in Christ Jesus, ye who sometimes were far off, &c. They were far off from Christ, from his church, from the promises, from the Christian hope, and from God himself; and therefore from all good; like the prodigal son in the far country: this has been represented in the preceding verses. Unconverted sinners remove themselves at a distance from God, and God puts them at a distance; He beholds the proud afar off. "But now in Christ Jesus, &c. upon your conversion, by virtue of union with Christ, the distance is removed, you are nigh. They were brought home to God, received into the church, taken into the covenant, and possessed of all other privileges consequent upon these. Note, The saints are a people near to God. Salvation is far from the wicked; but God is a Help at hand to his people; and this is by the blood of Christ, by the merit of his sufferings and death. Every believing sinner owes his nearness to God, and his interest in his favour, to the death and sacrifice of Christ.

14. For he is our peace, who hath made both one, and hath broken down the middle wall of partition between us; 15. Having abolished in his flesh the enmity, even the law of commandments contained in ordinances; for to make in himself of twain one new man, so making peace; 16. And that he might reconcile both unto God in one body by the cross, having slain the enmity thereby: 17. And came and preached peace to you which were far off, and to them that were nigh. 18. For through him we both have access by one Spirit unto the Father. 19. Now therefore ye are no more strangers and foreigners, but fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the household of God; 20. And are built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief cornerstone; 21. In whom all the building fitly framed together groweth unto a holy temple in the Lord: 22. In whom ye also are builded together for a habitation of God through the Spirit.

We are now come to the last part of the chapter, which contains an account of the great and mighty privileges that converted Jews and Gentiles both receive from Christ. The apostle here shows that they who were in a state of enmity, are reconciled. Between the Jews and the Gentiles there had been a great enmity; so there is between God and every unregenerate man. Now Jesus Christ is our peace, v. 14. He made peace by the sacrifice of himself; and came to reconcile. 1. Jews and Gentiles to each other. He made both one, by reconciling these two divisions of men, who were wont to malign, to hate, and to reproach each other before. He broke down the middle wall of partition, the ceremonial law, that made the great feud, and was the badge of the Jews' peculiarity; called the partition-wall, by way of allusion to the partition in the temple, which separated the court of the Gentiles from that into which the Jews only had liberty to enter. Thus he abolished in his flesh the enmity, v. 15. By his sufferings in the flesh, taking away the binding power of the ceremonial law, so removing that cause of enmity and distance between them; which is here called the law of commandments contained in ordinances, because it enjoined a multitude of external rites and ceremonies, and consisted of many institutions and appointments about the outward parts of divine worship. The legal ceremonies were abrogated by Christ, having their accomplishment in him. By taking those out of the way, he formed one church of believers, whether they had been Jews or Gentiles. Thus he made in himself of twain one new man. He framed.
both these parties into one new society, or body of God's people, uniting them to himself as their common Head; they being renewed by the Holy Ghost, and now concurring in a new way of gospel-worship: so making peace between these two parties who were so much at variance before. There is an enmity between God and sinners, whether Jews or Gentiles; and Christ came to take up the quarrel, and to bring it to an end, by reconciling both Jew and Gentile, now collected and gathered into one body, to a provoked and an offended God: and this by the cross; or by the sacrifice of himself upon the cross: having slain the enmity thereby. He, being slain or sacrificed, slew the enmity, that thereby was between God and poor sinners. The apostle proceeds to illustrate the great advantages which both parties gain by the mediation of our Lord Jesus Christ, v. 17. Christ, who purchased peace on the cross, came, partly in his own person, as to the Jews, who are here said to have been nigh; and partly in his apostles, whom he commissioned to preach the gospel to the Gentiles, who are said to have been afar off. In the former case, he had preached peace, and published the terms of reconciliation with God, and of eternal life. Note here, When the messengers of Christ deliver his truths, it is in effect the same as if he did it immediately himself. He is said to preach by them; insomuch that he who receiveth them receiveth him: and he who despiseth them (acting by virtue of his commission, and delivering his message) despiseth and rejecteth Christ himself. Now the effect of this peace is the free access which both Jews and Gentiles have unto God; (v. 18.) For through him, in his name, and by virtue of his mediation, we both have access, admission, into the presence of God, who is become the common reconciled Father of both: the throne of grace is erected for us to come to; and liberty of approach to that throne is allowed us. Our access is by the Holy Spirit; Christ purchased for us leave to come to God; and the Spirit gives us a heart to come, and strength to come, even grace to serve God acceptably. Observe, We draw nigh to God, through Jesus Christ, by the help of the Spirit. The Ephesians, upon their conversion, having such an access to God, as well as the Jews, and by the same Spirit, the apostle tells them, Now therefore ye are no more strangers and foreigners, &c. v. 9. This he mentions by way of opposition to what he had observed in their conversion: they were now no longer aliens from the commonwealth of Israel; and no longer what the Jews were wont to account all the nations of the earth beside themselves, strangers to God; but fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the household of God, members of the church of Christ, and having a right to all the privileges of it. Observe here, The church is composed of all that believe, and not of any other in the world. It is also compared to a house, and every converted sinner is one of the domestics, one of the family; a servant, and a child in God's house. In v. 20. the church is compared to a building: the foundation of that building are the apostles and prophets. They may be so called in a secondary sense, Christ himself being the primary Foundation; but we are not to understand it of the doctrine delivered by the prophets of the Old Testament, and the apostles of the New. It follows, Jesus Christ himself being the chief Corner-stone. In him both Jews and Gentiles meet, and constitute one church; and Christ supports the building by his strength. In whom all the building, fifty framed together, &c. v. 21. All believers, of whom it consists, being united to Christ by faith, and among themselves by Christian charity, grew unto a holy temple, become a sacred so-

1. FOR this cause I Paul, the prisoner of Jesus Christ for you Gentiles, 2. If ye have heard of the dispensation of the grace of God which is given me to youward: 3. How that by revelation he made known unto me the mystery; as I wrote afore in few words; 4. Whereby, when ye read, ye may understand my knowledge in the mystery of Christ, 5. Which in other ages was not made known unto the sons of men, as it is now revealed unto his holy apostles and prophets by the Spirit; 6. That the Gentiles should be fellow-heirs, and of the same body, and partakers of his promise in Christ the gospel: 7. Wherefore I was made a minister, according to the effectual working of his power. 8. Unto me, whom am less than the least of all saints, is this grace given, that I should preach among the Gentiles the unspeakable riches of Christ; 9. And to make all men see what is the fellowship of the mystery, which from the beginning of the world hath been hid in God, which created all things by Jesus Christ: 10. To the intent that now unto the principalities and powers in heavenly places might be known by the church the manifold wisdom of God, 11. According to the eternal purpose which he purposed in Christ Jesus our Lord: 12.
In whom we have boldness and access with confidence by the faith of him. 13. Wherefore I desire that ye faint not at my tribulations for you, which is your glory.

Here we have the account which St. Paul gives the Ephesians concerning himself, as he was appointed by God the apostle of the Gentiles.

I. We may observe that he acquaints them with the tribulations and sufferings which he endured in the discharge of that office, v. 1. The first clause refers to the preceding chapter, and may be understood either of these two ways: For this cause, either, 1. "For having preached the doctrine contained in the foregoing chapter, and for asserting that the great privileges of the gospel belong not only to the Jews, but to believing Gentiles also, though they are not circumcised; for this I am now a prisoner: but a prisoner of Jesus Christ, as I suffer in his cause, and for his sake, and continuing his faithful servant, and the object of his special protection and care, while I am thus suffering for him." Observe, Christ's servants, if they come to be prisoners, are his prisoners; and he despises not his prisoners. He thinks never the worse of them for the ill character which the world gives them, or the evil treatment that they meet with in it. Paul adhered to Christ, and Christ owned him, when he was in the prison. For you Gentiles; the Jews did discover the great esteem and regard which they had for the doctrine delivered in his church. Paul, who am the prisoner of Jesus Christ, pray that you may be enabled to act as becomes persons thus favoured by God, and made partakers of so great privileges." To this purport you find him expressing himself, v. 14, where, after the digression contained in the several verses intervening, he proceeds with what he began in this first verse. Observe, Those who have received grace and special favours from God, do in necessity of times, they may improve and advance, and continue to act as becomes them. And seeing Paul, while he was a prisoner, employed himself in such prayers to God in behalf of the Ephesians, we should learn that no particular sufferings of our own should make us so solicitous about ourselves as to neglect the cases of others in our supplications and addresses to God.

He speaks again of his sufferings; Wherefore I desire that ye faint not at my tribulations for you, which is your glory, v. 15. While he was in prison, he suffered much there; and though it was upon their account that he suffered, yet he would not have them discouraged nor dismayed at this, seeing God had done such great things for them by his ministry. What a tender concern was here for these Christians! While seeing Paul, who has been so solicitous lest they should be discouraged and faint upon his tribulations, than about what he himself endured; and to prevent this, he tells them, that his sufferings were their glory; and would be so far from being a real discouragement, if they duly considered the matter, that they ministered to them for glorying and for rejoicing; as this circumstance of his having been a prisoner, is called a great mystery, because the several circumstances and peculiarities of it, such as the time and manner and means by which it should be effected) were concealed and the persecutions they underwent. Observe, Not only the faithful ministers of Christ themselves, but their people too, have some special cause for joy and glorying, when they suffer for the sake of dispensing the gospel.

II. The apostle informs them of God's appointing him to the office; and eminently fitting and qualifying him for it, by a special revelation that he made unto him.

God appointed him to the office; If ye have heard of the dispensation of the grace of God, which is given me to you-ward, v. 2. They could not but have heard of this, and therefore he does not design to speak doubtfully of this matter. Ely, is sometimes used in the sense of affirmatively, as in the particle, and we may read it, when ye have heard, &c. He styles the gospel the grace of God here, (as in other places,) because it is the gift of divine grace to sinful men; and all the gracious overtures that it makes, and the joyful tidings that it contains, proceed from the rich grace of God; and it is also the great instrument in the hands of the Spirit, by which God works grace in the souls of men. He speaks of the dispensation of this grace given to him, to be conveyed and administered by God to dispense the doctrine of the gospel; which commission and authority were given to him, chiefly for the service of the Gentiles; to you-ward. And again, speaking of the gospel, he says, Whereof I was made a minister, &c. v. 7. Here he again asserts his authority. He was MADE a minister, he did not make himself such; he was made a minister, he was appointed to himself that honour; and he was made such according to the gift of grace which was given unto him. God supplied and furnished him for his work; and in the discharge of it suitably assisted and helped him with all needful gifts and graces, both ordinary and extraordinary, and that by the effectual working of his power; in himself more especially; and also in great numbers of those to whom he preached; by which means his labours among them were such as he states in this verse. What God calls men to, he fits them for; and does it with an almighty power. An effectual working of divine power attends the gifts of divine grace.

As God appointed him to the office, so he eminently qualified him for it, by a special revelation that he made unto him. He makes mention both of the mystery that was revealed, and of the revelation of it.

The mystery revealed is, that the Gentiles should be fellow-heirs, and of the same body, and partakers of his promise in Christ, by the gospel; v. 6. that they should be joint-heirs with the believing Jews, of the heavenly inheritance; and that they should be members of the same mystical body, be received into the church of Christ, and be interested in the gospel-promises, as well as the Jews; and particularly in the great promise of the Spirit. And this in Christ, being appointed to Christ, from all eternity, all promises are ye and amen: by the gospel, that is, in the times of the gospel, as some understand it, or, by the gospel preached to them; which is the great instrument and means by which God works faith in Christ, as others. This was the great truth revealed to the apostle, that God would call the Gentiles to salvation by faith in Christ, and that without the gospel there was no salvation for the Gentiles.

Of the revelation of this truth, he speaks v. 3-5. Where we may observe that the coalition of Jews and Gentiles in the gospel-church was a mystery, a great mystery; what was designed in the counsel of God before all worlds, but what could not be fully understood for many ages, till the accomplishment expounded the prophecies of it. It is called a mystery, because the several circumstances and peculiarities of it, such as the time and manner and means by which it should be effected) were concealed and kept secret in God's own breast, till by an immediate revelation he made them known to his servant. See Acts 26: 16–18. And it is called the mystery of Christ, because it was revealed by him, (Gal. 1: 12,) and because it relates so very much to him. Of this the apostle had given some hints afore, or a little before; that is, in the preceding chapters. Whereby, when ye read; or, as those words may be read, or repeated. (Gal. 1: 12.) And it is this, that it is barely to read the scriptures, unless we attend unto them, and seriously consider and lay to heart what we read;) ye may understand my knowledge in the mystery of Christ; so as to perceive how God had fitted and qualified him to be an apostle to the Gentiles, which might be to them an evident token of his divine authority. This mystery, he says, in other ages was not made known unto the sons of men, as if it were reserved for his holy apostles and prophets by the Spirit; (v. 5.) that is, it was not so fully and clearly discovered in the ages before Christ, as it is now revealed unto the prophets of that age, the prophets of the New Testament, who were immediately inspired and taught by the Spirit. Let us observe, that the conversion of the Gentile world to the faith of Christ was an adorably mystery, and we ought to respect, and set it at a great price, and esteem it beyond all stone of which those who had been so long in the dark, and at so great a distance, should be enlightened with the marvellous light, and be made nigh? Let us learn hence not to despair of the worst; of the worst of persons, and of the worst of nations. Nothing is too hard for divine grace to do: none so unworthy but God may please to confer great grace upon them. And how much are we ourselves interested in this affair; not only as we live in a time in which this great mystery is here so revealed, but particularly as we are a part of the nations which in times past were foreigners and strangers, and lived in gross idolatry; but are now enlightened with the everlasting gospel, and partake of its promises!

III. The apostle acquaints them how he was employed in this office, and that with respect to the Gentiles, and to all men. 1. With respect to the Gentiles, he preached to them the unsearchable riches of Christ, v. 8. Observe, in this verse, how humbly he speaks of himself, and how highly he speaks of Jesus Christ. (1.) How humbly he speaks of himself; I am less than the least of all saints. St. Paul, who was the chief of the apostles, calls himself less than the least of all saints; he means on the account of his having been formerly a persecutor of the followers of Christ. He was, in his own esteem, as little as could be. We can be less than the least. To speak himself as little as could be, he speaks himself less than could be. Observe, Those whom God advances to honourable employments, he humbles, and makes low in their own eyes; and where God gives grace to be humble, there he gives all other grace. You may also observe in what a different manner the apostle speaks of himself, and of his office. While he magnifies that, he deprecates himself and his office. This may be very humble, and think very meanly of himself, even when he thinks and speaks very highly and honourably of his sacred function. (2.) How highly he speaks of Jesus Christ; The unsearchable riches of Christ. There is a mighty treasury of mercy, grace, and love, laid up in Christ Jesus, and that for Jews and Gentiles both. Or, the riches of the gospel. The apostle in reason, considers the riches which Christ purchased for, and bestows upon, all believers. And they are unsearchable riches, which we cannot find the bottom of; which human sagacity could never have discovered; and men could no otherwise attain to the knowledge of them but by revelation. Now it was the apostle's business and employment to preach these unsearchable riches of Christ among the Gentiles; and it was a favour he greatly valued, and looked upon it as an unspeakable honour to him; "Unto me is this grace given; this special favour God has granted to such an unworthy creature as I am." And it is an unspeakable favour to the Gentile world, that to them the unsearchable riches of Christ are preached. Though many remain poor, and are not enriched with these riches, it is hoped it is granted to some to be enriched among them, to have an offer of them made to us; and if we be not enriched with them, it is our own fault.

2. With respect to all men, v. 9. His business and employment were, to make all men see; to publish and make known to the whole world, what is the fellowship of the mystery, that the Gentiles, who have hitherto been strangers to the church, shall be admitted to a part in the great work of creation. It is true, that both the first creation, when God made all things out of nothing, and the new creation, whereby sinners are made new creatures by converting grace, are of God by Christ Jesus. The apostle adds, To the intent that now unto the principalities and powers in heavenly places might be known, by the church, the manifold wisdom of God, v. 10. This was one thing, among others, which God had in his eye in revealing this mystery, that the good angels, who have a pre-eminent in governing the kingdoms and principalities of the world, and who are induced with great power to execute the will of God on this earth, (though their ordinary residence is in heaven,) may be informed, from what passes in the church and is done in and by it, of the manifold wisdom of God, of the great variety with which God wisely dispenses things; or of his wisdom manifested in the many ways and methods he takes in ordering his church in the several ages of it, and especially in receiving the Gentiles into it. The holy angels, who look into the mystery of our redemption by Christ, could not but take notice of this branch of that mystery, that among the Gentiles is preached the unsearchable riches of Christ. And this is according to the eternal purpose which he purposed in Christ Jesus our Lord, v. 11. Some translate the words καί παραγενότος, thus, According to the fore-disposing of the ages which he made, &c. So Dr. Whitby, &c. "In the first of the ages," says the mentioned author, "his wisdom seeing fit to give the promise of a Saviour to a fallen Adam: in the second age, to typify and represent him to the Jews in sacred persons, rites and sacrifices; and in the age of the Gentiles, or the church, to reveal him to the Jews, and preach him to the Gentiles." Others understand it, according to our translation, of the eternal purpose which God purposed to execute in and through Jesus Christ: the whole of what he has done in the great affair of man's redemption, being in pursuance of his eternal decree about that matter. The apostle, having mentioned our Lord Jesus Christ, subjoins that in the church we have boldness and access with confidence by the faith of him; (v. 12.) that is, By, or through, whom we have liberty to open our minds freely to God, as to a Father, and a well-grounded persuasion of audience and of acceptance with him; and this by means of the faith we have in him, as our great Mediator and Advocate. We may come with humble boldness to hear-from God, knowing that the terror of the curse is done away; and we may expect to hear from him good words and comfortable. We may have access with confidence to speak to God, knowing that we have such a Mediator between God and us, and such an Advocate with the Father.”*

14. For this cause, I bow my knees unto the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, 15. Of whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named, 16. That he would grant you, according to the riches of his glory, to be strengthened with might by his Spirit in the inner man; 17. That Christ may dwell in your hearts by faith; that ye, being rooted and grounded in love, 18. May be able to comprehend with all saints what is the breadth, and length, and depth, and height; 19. And to know the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge, that ye might be filled with all the fulness of God. 20. Now unto him that is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think, according to the power that worketh in us, 21. Unto him be glory in the church by Christ Jesus, throughout all ages, world without end. Amen.

We are now come to the second part of this chapter, which contains St. Paul's devout and affectionate prayer to God for his beloved Ephesians. For this cause. This may be referred either to the immediately foregoing verse, That ye faint not, &c. or rather, the apostle is here resuming what he began at the first verse, from which he digressed in those which are interposed. Observe to whom he prays—to God, as the father of our Lord Jesus Christ, of which see ch. 1. 3. Observe further, his outward posture in prayer, which was humble and reverent; I bow my knees. Note, When we draw nigh to God, we should reverence him in our hearts, and express it in the most suitable and becoming behaviour and gesture. And here, having mentioned Christ, he cannot pass without an honourable encomium of his love, v. 15. The universal church has a dependence upon the Lord Jesus Christ; Of whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named. The Jews were wont to boast of Abraham as their father; but now Jews and Gentiles both are designated from Christ; so some. While others understand it of the saints in heaven, who wear the crown of glory, and of saints on earth, who are going on in the work of grace here. Both the one and the other make but one family, one household, one church, as the apostle himself says, Eph. 2. 19. CHRISTIANS, as they really are such; acknowledging their dependence upon, and their relation to, Christ. Observe what the apostle asks of God for these his friends—spiritual blessings; which are the best blessings, and the most earnestly to be sought and prayed for by every one of us, both for ourselves and for our friends.

1. Spiritual strength for the work and duty to which we are called, and in which we are employed; That he would grant you, according to the riches of his grace, to be strengthened, &c. The inner man is the heart or soul. To be strengthened with might, is to be mightily strengthened, much more than they were at present; to be endowed with a high degree of grace, and spiritual abilities for discharging duty, resisting temptations, enduring persecutions, &c. And the apostle prays that this may be according to the riches of his glory, or according to his glorious riches, answerable to that great abundance of grace, mercy, and power, which is in the soul, and is his glory; and this by his Spirit, who is the immediate Worker of grace in the souls of God's people. Observe from these things, that strength from the Spirit of God in the inner man is the best and most desirable strength; strength in the soul; the strength of faith and other graces; strength to serve God and to do our duty, and to persevere in the Christian course with vigour and with cheerfulness. And last of all observe, that as the work of grace is first begun, so it is continued and carried on, by the blessed Spirit of God.

II. The indwelling of Christ in our hearts, v. 17. Christ is said to dwell in his people, as he is always present with them by his gracious influences and operations. Observe, It is a desirable thing to have Christ dwell in our hearts; and if the law of Christ be written there, and the love of Christ be shed abroad there, then Christ dwells there. There is an Inhabitant in the soul of every good Christian. Where his Spirit dwells, there he dwells; and he dwells in the heart by faith; by means of the continual exercise of faith upon him. Faith opens the door of the soul, to receive Christ; faith admits him, and submits to him. By faith we are united to Christ: we have an interest in him.

III. The fruit of prayer, or knowing affections in the soul; That ye, being rooted and grounded in love, steadfastly fixed in your love to God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, and to all the saints, the beloved of our Lord Jesus Christ. Many have some love to God, and to his servants, but it is a flash; like the crackling of thorns under a pot, it makes a great noise, but is gone presently. We should earnestly desire that such affections may be fixed in us; that we may be rooted and grounded in love. Some understand it of their being settled and established in the sense of God's love to them; which would inspire them with greater ardours of holy love to him, and to one another. And how very desirable is it to have a settled fixed sense of the love of God and Christ to our souls; so as to be able to say with the apostle, at all times, He has love me, which is the best way to attain to this, is, to be careful that we maintain our relation to God in our souls; this will be the evidence of the love of God to us. We love him, because he first loved us. In order to this, he prays,

IV. For their experimental acquaintance with the love of Jesus Christ. The more intimate acquaintance we have with Christ's love to us, the more our love will be drawn out to him, and to those who are his, for whom, &c. That we may be able to comprehend with all saints, &c. (v. 18, 19,) more clearly, to understand, and firmly to believe, the wonderful love of Christ to his, which the saints do understand and believe in some measure, and shall understand more hereafter. Christians should not aim to comprehend above all saints; but be content that God deals with them, as he uses to do with those who love and fear his name; we should desire to comprehend with all saints, to have so much knowledge as the saints are allowed to have in this world. We should be ambitious of coming up with the first three; but not of going beyond what is the measure of the stature of other saints.

It is observable how magnificently the apostle speaks of the love of Christ. The dimensions of redeeming love are admirable. The breadth, and length, and depth, and height. By enumerating these dimensions, the apostle designs to signify the exceeding greatness of the love of Christ; the unsearchable riches of his love, which is higher than Ephesians, IV.

We have gone through the former part of this epistle, which consists of several important doctrinal truths, contained in the three preceding chapters. We enter now on the latter part of it, in which we have the most weighty and serious exhortations that can be given. We may observe, that in the first two most of these latter chapters, the former part is doctrinal, and fitted to inform the minds of men in the great truths and doctrines of the gospel: the latter is practical, and designed for the direction of their lives and concerns. The whole of this latter devo ture after soundness in the faith, and regularity in life and practice. In what has gone before, we have heard of Christian privileges, which are the matter of our comfort. In what follows, we shall hear of Christian duties, and what the Lord our God requires of us, in consideration of such privileges vouchsafed to us. The best way to un derstand the mysteries, and partake of the privileges, of which we have read before, is, conscientiously to practise the duties prescribed in them. In the other hand, a serious consideration and belief of the doc tines that have been taught us in the foregoing chapters, will be a good foundation on which to build the practice of the duties presented in them, which are yet before us. Christian faith and Christian practice mutually befriend each other.

In this chapter, we have divers exhortations to important duties. I. That is more general, v. 1-3. To shew the nes tation to mutual love, unity, and concord, with the proper means and motives to promote them, v. 2. 16. III. An exhortation to Christian purity and holiness of life; and that both more general, (v. 17. 24.) and in several par ticular instances, v. 25, to the end.

1. THEREFORE, the prisoner of the Lord, beseech you that ye walk worthy of the vocation wherewith ye are called,

This is a general exhortation to walk as becomes our Christian profession. St. Paul was now a pris orner at Rome; and he was the prisoner of the Lord, or in the Lord, which signifies as much as for the Lord. See of this, ch. 3. 1. He mentions this once and again, to shew that he was not ashamed of his bonds, well knowing that he suffered not as an evil doer: and likewise to recommend what he wrote to them, with the greater tenderness, and with some special advantage. It was a doctrine he thought worth suffering for, and therefore surely they should think it worthy their serious regards, and their duti ous observance. We have here the petition of a poor prisoner, one of Christ's prisoners; "I there fore, the prisoner of the Lord, beseech you, &c. Considering what God has done for you, and to what a state and condition he has called you, as has been discussed before; I now come, with all the affection and relief, or to use your interest for the obtaining my liberty, the first thing which poor prisoners are wont to solicit from their friends, but) that you would approve yourselves good Christians, and live up to your profession and calling; that ye walk worthy, agreeably, suitably, and congruously, to those happy circumstances into which the grace of God has brought you, whom he has called out of darkness into marvelous light. &c. Christians ought to accommodate themselves to the gospel by which they are called, and to the glory to which they are called; both are their voca tion. We are called Christians; we must an swear that name, and live like Christians. We are called to God's kingdom and glory; that kingdom and glory therefore we must mind, and walk as be comes the heirs of them.
2. With all lowliness and meekness, with long-suffering, forbearing one another in love; 3. Endeavouring to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace. 4. There is one body, and one Spirit, even as ye are called in one hope of your calling; 5. One Lord, one faith, one baptism; 6. One God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in you all. 7. But unto every one of us is given grace according to the measure of the gift of Christ. 8. Wherefore he saith, When he ascended up on high, he led captivity captive, and gave gifts unto men. 9. (Now, that he ascended, what is it but that he also descended first into the lower parts of the earth? 10. He that descended is the same also that ascended up far above all heavens, that he might fill all things.) 11. And he gave some, apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers; 12. For the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ: 13. Till we all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ: 14. That we henceforth be no more children, tossed to and fro, and carried about with every wind of doctrine, by the sleight of men, and cunning craftiness, whereby they lie in wait to deceive; 15. But speaking the truth in love, may grow up into him in all things, which is the head, even Christ: 16. From whom the whole body fitly jointed together, and compacted by that which every joint supplieth, according to the effectual working in the measure of every part, maketh increase of the body unto the edifying of itself in love.

Here the apostle proceeds to more particular exhortations. Two he enlarges upon in this chapter—To unity and purity, holiness and love, which Christians should very much study. We do not unworthy of the vocation whereunto we are called, if we be not faithful friends to all Christians, and sworn enemies to all sin.

This section contains the exhortation to mutual love, unity, and concord; with the proper means and motives to promote them. Nothing is pressed upon us more earnestly in the scriptures than this. Love is the law of Christ's kingdom, the lesson of his school, and the household family.

I. The means of unity; Lowliness and meekness, long-suffering, and forbearing one another in love, v. 2. By lowliness we are to understand humility, and entertaining mean thoughts of ourselves, which is opposed to pride. By meekness, that excellent disposition of soul, which makes men unwilling to provoke others, and not easily to be provoked or offended with their infirmities; and it is opposed to angry resentments and peevishness. Long-suffering implies a patient bearing of injuries, without seeking revenge. Forbearing one another in love, signifies bearing their infirmities out of a principle of love; and so as not to cease to love them on the account of these. The best Christians have need to bear one with another, and to make the best of one another; to provoke one another's graces, and not their passions. We find much in ourselves, which it is hard to forgive one another; and therefore we must not think it much if we find that others, we think hard to forgive them; and yet we must forgive them as we forgive ourselves. Now without these things unity cannot be preserved. The first step towards unity, is, humility; without that there will be no meekness, no patience, or forbearance; and without these no unity. Pride and passion break the peace, and make all the mischief. Humility and meekness restore the peace, and bring it only by pride comes contention; only by humility comes love. The more lowly-mindedness, the more like-mindedness. We do not walk worthy of the vocation wherewith we are called, if we be not meek and lowly of heart: for he by whom we are called, he to whom we are called, was eminent for meekness and lowliness of heart, and has commanded us therein our conversation with one another.

II. We have an account of the nature of that unity which the apostle prescribes: it is the unity of the Spirit, v. 3. The seat of Christian unity is in the heart or spirit: it does not lie in one set of thoughts, or in one form and mode of worship, but in one heart and one soul. This unity of heart and affection may be said to be of the Spirit of God; it is wrought by him, and is one of the fruits of the Spirit. This should be the earnest to keep. Endeavouring is a gospel-word. We must do our utmost. If others will quarrel with us, we must take all possible care not to quarrel with them. If others will despise and hate us, we must not despise and hate them. In the bond of peace. Peace is a bond, as it unites persons, and makes them live friendly one with another. A peaceable disposition and constant will to bind Christians together; whereas discord and quarrel disband and disunite their hearts and affections. Many slender twigs, bound together, become strong. The bond of peace is the strength of society. Not that it can be imagined that all good people, and all the members of societies, should be in every thing just of the same length, and the same sentiments, and the same judgment: but the bond of peace unites them all together, with a non obstante to these. As in the bundle of rods, they may be of different lengths, and different thicknesses, yet if they are tied together by one bond, they are much stronger than any, even than the thickest and strongest were of themselves.

III. We have next the motives proper to promote this Christian unity and concord. The apostle urges several, to persuade us to it.

1. Consider how many unities there are, that are the joy and glory of every Christian profession. There should be one heart; for there is one body, and one Spirit, v. 4. Two hearts in one body would be monstrous. If there be but one body, all that belong to that body should have one heart. The catholic church is one mystical body of Christ, and all good Christians make up but one body, incorporated by one charter, that of the gospel; animated by one spirit, the Holy Spirit, who, by his gifts and graces, quickens, animates, and governs, that body. If we belong to Christ, we are all actuated by one and the same Spirit, and therefore should be one; even as ye are called in one hope of your calling. Hope is here put for its object, the thing hoped for, the heavenly inheritance; to the hope of which we are called. All Christians are called to the same hope of eternal life. There is one Christ that they all hope in, and one heaven that they all hope for; and therefore they should be of one heart.
One Lord, (v. 5.) that is, Christ, the Head of the church, to whom, by God's appointment, all Christians are immediately subject. One faith, that is, the gospel, containing the doctrine of the Christian faith; or, it is the same grace of faith, (faith in Christ,) whereby all Christians are saved. One baptism, by which we profess our faith; being baptized in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; and so we are conducted to heaven, whereby we engage ourselves to the Lord Christ.

One body, v. 6. One God, who owns all the true members of the church for his children; for he is the Father of all such by special relation; as he is the Father of all men by creation: and he is above all, by his essence, and with respect to the glorious perfections of his nature; and as he has dominion over all creatures, and especially over his church; and through all; by his providence upholding and governing them: and in you all; in all believers, in whom he dwells, as in his holy temple, by his Spirit and special grace.

If then there be so many ones, it is pity but there should be one more; one heart, or one soul.

2. Consider the variety of gifts that Christ has bestowed among Christians; But unto every one of us is given grace, some gift of grace, in some kind or degree or other, for the mutual help of one another. Unto every one of us ministers is given grace; to some a greater measure of gifts, others a lesser measure. The different gifts of Christ's ministers proved a great occasion of contention among the first Christians; One was for Paul, and another for Apollos. The apostle shows that they had no reason to quarrel about them, but all the reason in the world to agree in the joint use of them, for common edification; because all was given according to the measure of the gift of Christ, in such a measure as seemed best to Christ to bestow upon every one. Observe, All the ministers, and all the members of Christ, owe all the gifts and graces that they are possessed of to him: and this is a good reason why we should love one another, because to every one of us is given grace. All to whom Christ has given grace, and on whom he has bestowed his gifts, (though they are of different sizes, different names, and different sentiments, yet,) ought to love one another.

The apostle takes this occasion to specify some of the gifts which Christ bestowed. And that they were bestowed by Christ, he makes appear by those words of David, wherein he foretold this concerning him; (Ps. 68. 18.) Wherefore he saith, (v. 8.) that is, the Psalmist saith, When he ascended up on high, he brought them thither, and gave gifts unto men. David prophesied of the ascension of Christ; the apostle descents upon it here, and in the three following verses. When he ascended up on high. We may understand the apostle both of the place into which he ascended in his human nature, that is, the highest heavens; and particularly of the state to which he was advanced, he being then highly exalted, and eminent, confirmed, by his Father. Let us set ourselves to think of the ascension of Christ; that our blessed Redeemer, being risen from the dead, is gone to heaven, where he seats at the right hand of the Majesty on high, which completed the proof of his being the Son of God. As great conquerors, when they rode in their triumphant chariots, used to be attended with the most illustrious of their captives led in chains, and were wont to scatter their largesses and bounty among the soldiers, and other spectators of their triumphs; so Christ, when he ascended into heaven, as a triumphant Conqueror, led captivity captive. It is a phrase used in the Old Testament, to signify a conquest over enemies, especially over such as formerly had led others captive; see Judges 5. 12. Captivity is here put for captives, and signifies all our spiritual enemies, who brought us into captivity before. He conquered them who had conquered us; such as sin, the world, and death. Indeed, he triumphed over these on the cross: but the triumph was completed at his ascension, when he became Lord over all, and had the keys of death and Hades put into his hands. And he gave gifts unto men: in the psalm it is, He received gifts for men. He received for them, that he might give them a large measure of gifts and graces; particularly, he enriched his disciples with the gift of the Holy Ghost for the accomplishment of the ascension of Christ, takes notice, that he descended first, v. 9. As much as if he had said, When David speaks of Christ's ascension, he intimates the knowledge he had of Christ's humiliation on earth: for when it is said, that he ascended, this implies that he first descended: for what is it, but a proof or demonstration of his having done so? Into the lower parts of the earth; this may refer either to his incarnation, according to that of Ps. 89. 10. My Subject was not hid from thee, when I was made in secret, and curiously wrought in the lowest parts of the earth: or, to his burial, according to that of Ps. 63. 9. They that seek my soul to destroy it, shall go into the lower parts of the earth. He calls his death (say some of the fathers) his descent into the lower parts of the earth. He descended TO the earth, and INTO the earth in his burial. As Jonas, for three days and three nights in the whale's belly, so was the Son of man in the heart of the earth. He that descended, is the same also that ascended up far above all heavens, (v. 10.) far above the airy and starry (which are the visible) heavens, into the heaven of heavens; that is, who fills all things, all the members of his church, with gifts and graces suitable to their several conditions and states. Observe, Our Lord humbled himself first, and then he was exalted. He descended first, and then ascended.

The apostle next tells us, what were Christ's gifts at his ascension; He gave some, apostles, &c. v. 11. Indeed he sent forth some of these before his ascension, Matt. 10. 1, 2, 5. But one was then added, Acts 1. 26. And all of them were more solemnly installed, and publicly confirmed, in their office, by the Holy Ghost, for the building up of the church; and as the apostles were the chief ministers of the sacred order in the church, so those who were the best of them, and the most eminent, were admitted into a higher office in the church: such were apostles, prophets, and evangelists. The apostles were chief; these Christ immediately called, furnished them with extraordinary gifts, and the power of working miracles, and with infallibility in delivering his truths: and they having been the witnesses of his miracles and doctrine, he sent them forth to spread the gospel, and to plant and govern churches. Ps. 132. 1. The prophets seem to have been such as expounded the writings of the Old Testament, and foretold things to come. The evangelists were ordained persons, (2 Tim. 1. 6.) whom the apostles took for their companions in travel, (Gal. 2. 1.) and sent them out to settle and establish such churches as the apostles themselves had planted: (Acts 19. 22.) not being fixed to any particular place, they were to continue till recalled, 2 Tim. 4. 5.

And in each of these offices, ministers employed, in a lower and narrower sphere; as

"pastors and teachers." Some take these two names to signify one office, implying the duties of ruling and teaching belonging to it. Others think they design two distinct offices, both ordinary, and of standing use in the church; and these "pastors" are such as are fixed at the head of particular churches, with design to guide, instruct, and feed their flock. As we hear of "elders" and "presbyters," they are frequently called "bishops and elders;" and the teachers were such, whose work it was also to preach the gospel, and to instruct the people by way of exhortation. We see here, that it is Christ's prerogative to appoint what officers and offices he pleases in his church. And how rich is the church, that had at first such a variety of officers, and has still such a variety of gifts! How rich is the Church of Christ, the Church of the Holy Ghost, and of its edification! When he ascended, he procured the gift of the Holy Ghost: and the gifts of the Holy Ghost are various; some have greater, others have lesser measures: but all for the good of the body. Which brings to the third argument,

3. Which is taken from Christ's great end and design in giving gifts unto men. The gifts of Christ were intended for the good of his church, and in order to advance his kingdom upon earth. Christ, the Head of the Church, gave them for that end, and of his edification. All these being designed for one common end, is a good reason why all Christians should agree in brotherly love; and not envy one another's gifts. All are for the perfecting of the saints, (v. 12.) that is, according to the import of the original, to bring them into an orderly, spiritual state and frame, which had been as it were dislocated and disjointed by sin; and then to strengthen, confirm, and advance them therein, as that so each, in his proper place and function, might contribute to the good of the whole. For the work of the ministry; or, for the work of dispensation; that they might dispense the doctrines of the gospel, and successfully discharge the several parts of their ministerial function. For the edifying of the body of Christ, to build up the church, which is Christ's mystical body, by increase of their graces, and an adding on to their bodies, which is necessary to make us fitted to serve us for heaven; Till we all come, &c. v. 13. The gifts and offices (some of them) which have been spoken of, are to continue in the church till the saints be perfected, which will not be till they all come in the unity of the faith, till all true believers meet together, by means of the same precious faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God: by which we are to understand, not a bare speculative knowledge, or acquaintance with Christ, but a knowledge of Christ the true God and the great Mediator; but such as is attended with approbation and affection, with all due honour, trust, and obedience. Unto a perfect man, to our full growth of gifts and graces, free from those childish infirmities, that we are subject to in the present world. Unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ, so as to be Christians of a full maturity and ripeness, as all equal parts of the body are of the same fulness; or, according to the measure of that stature which is to make up the fulness of Christ, which is to complete his mystical body. Now we shall never come to the perfect man, till we come to the perfect world. There is a fulness in Christ, and a fulness to be derived from him; and a certain "stature" of that fulness, and a measure of that stature, assigned in the counsel of God to his kingdom and church over all; we come to that measure till we come to heaven. God's children, as long as they are in this world, are growing.

Dr. Lightfoot understands the apostle as speaking here of Jews and Gentiles knit in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God; so making a perfect man, and the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ.

The apostle farther shews, in the following verses, what was God's design in his sacred institutions, and what effect they ought to have upon us. As,

(1.) That we henceforth be no more children, &c. (v. 14.) that is, that we may be no longer children in knowledge, weak in the faith, and inconsistent in our judgments; easily yielding to every temptation, readily complying with every one's humour, and being at every turn a party to all the errors of Christianity, are easily imposed upon; we must take care of that; therefore being tossed to and fro, like ships without a ballast; and carried about, like clouds in the air, with such doctrines, as have no true or solidit) in them, but nevertheless spread themselves far and wide, and are therefore compared to wind. By the sleight of men; it is a metaphor taken from gamblers, and signifies the mischiefous subtility of seducers; and cunning craftiness, by which they are finding out ways to seduce and deceive: for it follows, whereby they lie in wait to deceive, as in an ambush, in order to circumvent the weak, and draw them from the truth. Note, They must be very wicked and ungodly men, who set themselves to seduce and deceive others into false doctrines and errors. The apostle describes them here as base men, using a great deal of devilish art and cunning, in order therewith to confound and delude the world. Ver. 15. But we must be strong, and not slothful in the exercise of the gifts we were given ourselves against such, is, to study the sacred oracles, and to pray for the illumination and grace of the Spirit of Christ, that we may know the truth as it is in Jesus, and be established in it.

(2.) That we should speak the truth in love, (v. 15.) or follow the truth in love; or be sincere in love to our fellow-Christians. While we adhere to the doctrine of Christ, which is the truth, we should live in love one with another. Love is the rule of all, but we must be careful to preserve truth together with it. Truth is an excellent thing; yet it is requisite that we speak it in love, and not in contention. These two should go together—truth and peace.

(3.) That we should grow up into Christ in all things. Into Christ, so as to be more deeply rooted in him. In all things; in knowledge, love, faith, making the growth of the body of Christ, which is the truth, and the measure of the stature of fulness to which he brings us; and this growth toward maturity; which is opposed to the being children. Those are improving Christians, who grow up into Christ. The more we grow into an acquaintance with Christ, in love, faith, and hope, the more we shall grow toward the age of perfect maturity. And this is the age of perfect maturity; the age of the body of Christ; the age of the church, as it is called, Heb. 6. 19. The members of the church, and the church itself, as it is called, Ephes. 4. 15. Here the apostle makes a comparison between the natural body and Christ's mystical body, that body of which Christ is the Head: and he observes, that as there must be communion and mutual communications of the members of the body among themselves, in order to their growth and improvement, so there must be the same mutual communications among the members of the body, as these members of the church have been, having one spirit, Ephes. 4. 5. One spirit is, one spirit and soul; one soul and spirit; one common soul and spirit, by which they are to be understood, not a bare speculative knowledge, or acquaintance with Christ, but a knowledge of Christ the true God and the great Mediator; but such as is attended with approbation and affection, with all due honour, trust, and obedience. Unto a perfect man, to our full growth of gifts and graces, free from those childish infirmities, that we are subject to in the present world. Unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ, so as to be Christians of a full maturity and ripeness, as all equal parts of the body are of the same fulness; or, according to the measure of that stature which is to make up the fulness of Christ, which is to complete his mystical body. Now we shall never come to the perfect man, till we come to the perfect world. There is a fulness in Christ, and a fulness to be derived from him; and a certain "stature" of that fulness, and a measure of that stature, assigned in the counsel of God to his kingdom and church over all; we come to that measure till we come to heaven. God's children, as long as they are in this world, are growing.

ing in the measure of every part: that is, say some, according to the power which the Holy Ghost excers to make God's appointed means effectual for this great end; in such a measure as Christ judges to be sufficient and proper for every member, according to its respective place and office in the body. Or, as others, according to the power of Christ, who, as Head, influences and enlivens every member. Or, according to the effectual working of every member, in communicating to others of what it has received, nourishment is conveyed to all in their proportions, and, according to the state and exigence of every part, makes increase of the body, such an increase as is convenient for the body. Observe, Particular Christians receive their gifts and graces from Christ for the sake and benefit of the whole body. Unto the edifying of itself in love. We may understand this two ways. Either, that all the members of the church may attain to a greater measure of love to Christ and to one another. Or, that they are moved to act in the manner mentioned, from love to Christ and to one another. Observe, Mutual love among Christians is a great friend to spiritual growth: it is in love that the body edifies itself: whereas, A king- dom, divided against itself, cannot stand.

17. This I say therefore, and testify in the Lord, that ye henceforth walk not as other Gentiles walk, in the vanity of their mind. 18. Having the understanding darkened, being alienated from the life of God through the ignorance that is in them, because of the blindness of their heart: 19. Who, being past feeling, have given themselves over unto lasciviousness, to work all uncleanness with greediness. 20. But ye have not so learned Christ; 21. If so be that ye have heard him, and have been taught by him, as the truth is in Jesus: 22. That ye put off, concerning the former conversation, the old man, which is corrupt according to the deceitful lusts; 23. And be renewed in the spirit of your mind; 24. And that ye put on the new man, who after God is created in righteousness and true holiness. 25. Wherefore, putting away lying, speak every man truth with his neighbour: for we are members one of another. 26. Be ye angry, and sin not: let not the sun go down upon your wrath: 27. Neither give place to the devil. 28. Let him that stole steal no more: but rather let him labour, working with his hands the thing which is good, that he may have to give to him who need- eth. 29. Let no corrupt communication proceed out of your mouth, but that which is good to the use of edifying, that it may minister grace unto the hearers. 30. And grieve not the Holy Spirit of God, whereby ye are sealed unto the day of redemption. 31. Let all bitterness, and wrath, and an- ger, and clamour, and evil-speaking, be put away from you, with all malice: 32. And be ye kind one to another, tender-hearted, forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you.

The apostle having gone through his exhortation to mutual love, unity, and concord, in the foregoing verses; there follows in these an exhortation to Christian purity, and holiness of heart and life; and that both more general, (v. 17—24.) and in several particular instances, v. 25—32. This is solemnly introduced; "This I say therefore, and testify in the Lord; that is, seeing the matter is as above de- scribed; seeing ye are members of Christ's body, and that your lives are to be spent on such an account as I urged in the former verses, and bear witness to as your duty in the Lord's name, and by virtue of the authority I have derived from him." And then, the more general exhortation to purity and holiness of heart and life, begins thus; "That ye henceforth walk not as other Gentiles walk; that for the time to come ye do not live, and behave yourselves, as ignorant and unconverted heathens do, who are wholly guided by an understanding employed about vain things, their idols, and their worldly possessions; things which are no way profitable to their souls, and which will deceive their expectations." Converted Gentiles must not live as unconverted Gentiles do. Though they live among them, they must not live like them. Here the apostle takes occasion to describe the wickedness of the Gentile world, out of which re- generate Christians were snatched as brands out of the burning fire.

I. Their understandings were darkened, v. 18. They were void of all saving knowledge; yea, igno- rant of many things concerning God, which the light of nature might have taught them. They sat in darkness, and they loved it rather than light; and by their ignorance they were alienated from the life of God. They were estranged from, and had a dis- line and a disapprobation of, the light of God; it was not only that way of life which God requires and approves of, and by which we live to him, but which resembles God himself, in his purity, righteousness, truth, and goodness. Their wilful ignorance was the cause of their estrangement from this life of God, which begins in light and knowledge. Gross and affected ignorance is destructive to religion and godli- ness. And what was the cause of their being thus ingrown? It was because of the hardness of their heart. It was not because God did not make himself known to them by his works, but because they would not admit the instructive rays of the divine light. They were ignorant because they would be so. Their ignorance proceeded from their obstinacy, and the hardness of their hearts; they resisting the light, and rejecting all the means of illumination and knowledge.

II. Their consciences were debauched and scarred; Who being past feeling, v. 19. They had no sense of their sin, or of the misery and danger of their case by means of it; whereupon, they gave themselves over unto lasciviousness. They indulged themselves in their filthy lusts, and, yielding them- selves up to the dominion of these, they became the slaves and drudges of sin and the Devil; and they were all filled with such greediness that it became common practice to commit all sorts of uncleanness, and even the most unnatural and monstrous sins, and that with insatiable desires. Observe, When men's consciences are once scarred, there are no bounds to their sins. When they set their hearts upon the gratification of their lusts, what can be expected, but that the most abominable sensuality and uncleanness, and that their horrid enormities will abound?

This was the character of the Gentiles; but these Christians must distinguish themselves from such Gentiles; Ye have not so learned Christ, v. 20. It may be read, But ye not so; ye have learned Christ. Those who have learned Christ, are saved from the darkness and delusion which others lie under; and, as they know more, they are obliged to live in a better manner than others. It is a good argument against sin, that we have not so learned Christ. Learn Christ! Is Christ a Book, a Lesson, a Way, a Trade? The meaning is, "Ye have not so learned Christianity—the doctrines of Christ, and the rules of life prescribed by him. Not so, as the hollow, false, and deceitful, do. Ye have heard him, (ver. 21.) have heard his doctrine preached by us, and have been taught by him, inwardly and effectually, by his Spirit." Christ is the Lesson; we must learn Christ: and Christ is the Teacher; we are taught by him. As the truth is in Jesus, This may be understood two ways; either, 1. "Ye have been taught the real truth, as held forth by Christ himself, both in his doctrine and in his life." Or, 2. Thus, "The truth first presented to your hearts, in your measure, as it did upon the heart of Jesus." The truth of Christ then appears in its beauty and power, when it appears as in Jesus.

Another branch of the general exhortation follows in those words, That ye put off, concerning the former conversation, the old man, &c. v. 22—24.

"This is a great part of the doctrine which has been taught you, and that it is contrary to the holiness, and to the new nature, such an impression, as that in the heart, which the principles, habits, and dispositions of the soul must be changed, before there can be a saving change of the life. There must be sanctification, which consists of these two things:

1. The old man must be put off. The corrupt nature is called a man, because, like the human body, it consists of divers parts, naturally supporting and strengthening, and other. It is the holiness, from whom we derived it: it is bred in the bone, and we brought it into the world with us: it is subtle as an old man; but in all God's saints decaying and withering as an old man, and ready to pass away. It is said to be corrupt; for sin in the soul is the corruption of its faculties: and where it is not mortified, it grows daily worse and worse, and so tends to destruction. According to the deceitful lusts. Sinful inclinations and desires are deceitful lusts; they promise men happiness, but render men more miserable; and betray men into destruction, if they are not subdued and mortified. These therefore must be put off, as an old garment that we would be ashamed to be seen in; they must be subdued and mortified. These lusts prevailed against them in their former conversation, that is, during their state of unregeneracy and heathenism.

2. This must be put on. It is not enough to shake off corrupt principles; but we must be actuated by gracious ones. We must embrace them, espouse them, and get them written on our hearts: it is not enough to cease to do evil; but we must learn to do well. "Be renewed in the spirit of your mind;" (v. 23.) use the proper and prescribed means in order to have the mind, which is a spirit, renewed more and more. And ye put on the new man, (v. 24.) By the new man, is meant, to actuate the new creature, which is actuated by a new principle, even regenerating grace, enabling a man to lead a new life; that life of righteousness and holiness which Christianity requires. This new man is created, or produced, out of confusion and emptiness, by God's almighty power, whose workmanship it is, truly excellent and beautiful. After God; in imitation of him, he must be a new creation. "Old in pattern, after the emplar and Pattern." The loss of God's image upon the soul, was both the sinfulness and misery of man's fallen state; and that resemblance which it bears to God, is the beauty, the glory, and the happiness, of the new creature. In righteousness toward men, including all the duties of the second table; and in holiness toward God, signifying a sincere obedience to the commands of the first table: true holiness, in opposition to the outward and ceremonial holiness of the Jews. We are said to put on this new man, when, in the use of all God's appointed means, we are endeavouring after this divine nature, this new creature.

This is the more general exhortation to purity and holiness of heart and life. The apostle proceeds to some things more particular. Because generals are not so apt to affect, we are told what are those particular limbs of the old man, that must be mortified; those filthy rags of the old nature, that must be put off; and what the peculiar ornaments of the new man, wherewith we should adorn our Christian profession.

[1] Take heed of lying, and be ever careful to speak the truth; (v. 23.) "Wherefore, since ye have been so well instructed in your duty, and are under such obligations to discharge it, let it appear, in your future behaviour and conduct, that there is a great and real change wrought in you; particularly by putting away lying." Of this sin the heathens were very guilty, affirming that a profitable lie was better than a hateful truth: and therefore the apostle exhorts them to cease from lying, and by things that are just, God's, and true, the mouth, and the heart, by speech and action, to take the place of the deceitful lusts which they had inherited from Adam, in whom they were by nature affected. This is a part of the old man, that must be put off; and that branch of the new man, that must be put on in opposition to it, is, speaking the truth in all our converse with others. It is the character of God's people, that they are children who will not lie, who dare not lie, who hate and abhor lying. All who have grace, make conscience of speaking the truth, and would not tell a deliberate lie for the greater gain, or for the greater pleasure. This is the reason, which was given for veracity, is, We are members one of another. Truth is a debt we owe one another: and if we love one another, we shall not deceive or lie one to another. We belong to the same society or body, which falsehood and lying tend to dissolve: and therefore we should avoid that, and speak truth. Observe, Lying is a very great sin; a peculiar violation of the obligations which Christians are under, and very injurious and hurtful to Christian society.

[2] "Take heed of anger and unguarded passions. Be ye angry, and sin not," v. 26. This is borrowed from the LXX translation of Ps. 4. 4. where we render it, Stand in awe, and sin not. Here is an easy concession; for as such we should consider it, rather than as a command. Be ye angry. This we are apt enough to be, God knows: but we find it difficult to obey the restrictions, and sin not. "If ye have a just occasion to be angry at any time, see that it be without sin: and therefore take heed of excess in your anger." If we would be angry, and not sin, (says one,) we must be angry at nothing but sin: and we should be more jealous for the glory of God, than for any interest or reputation of our own. One great and common sin in anger is, to suffer it to burn into wrath, and to embitter the air, and to be angry, and sin not. If ye have a just occasion to be angry at any time, see that it be without sin: and therefore take heed of excess in your anger. If we would be angry, and not sin, (says one,) we must be angry at nothing but sin: and we should be more jealous for the glory of God, than for any interest or reputation of our own. One great and common sin in anger is, to suffer it to burn into wrath, and to embitter the air, and to be angry, words:) "let your ears be deaf to whisperers, tale-bearers, and slanderers."

3. We are here warned against the sin of stealing, the breach of the eighth commandment; and advised to honest industry and to beneficence; Let him that stole, steal no more, v. 28. It is a caution against all manner of wrong-doing, by force or fraud. Let those of you, who, in the time of your Gentilism, have been guilty of this enormity, be no longer guilty of it: but we are not guilty of the sin, but conscientiously abound in the opposite duty: not only not steal, but rather let him labour, working with his hands the thing that is good. Idleness makes thieves. So Chrysostom. Ἷὰρ καταφέρων·—Stealing is the effect of idleness. They who will not work, and who are ashamed to beg, expose themselves greatly to temptations to thievery. Men should labour, not in an unlawful way, but in some honest calling. Working the thing which is good. Industry, in some honest way, will keep people out of temptation of doing wrong. But there is another reason why men ought to be industrious, namely, that they may be capable of doing some good; as well as that they may be preserved from temptation; That he may have to give to him that needeth. Thus if they may Live their labours, and live honestly, but that they may distribute for supplying the wants of others. Observe, Even those who get their living by their labour, should be charitable out of their little to those who are disabled for labour. So necessary and incumbent a duty is it to be charitable to the poor, that even labourers and servants, and those who have but little for themselves, must cast their mite into the general common stock: God must have his dues, and the poor are his receivers. Observe further, those alms that are likely to be acceptable to God, must not be the produce of unrighteousness and robbery, but of honesty and industry. God hates robbery for burnt-offerings.

4. We are here warned against corrupt communication; and directed to that which is useful and edifying, v. 29. Filthy and unclean words and discourses, and impious, as putrid and rotten meat: they proceed from, and prove, a great deal of corruption in the heart of the speaker, and tend to corrupt the minds and manners of others who hear them; and therefore Christians should beware of all such discourse. It may be taken in general, for all that which provokes the lusts and passions of others. We must not only put off corrupt communication, but put on that which is good to the use of edifying. The great use of speech is to edify those with whom we converse. Christians should endeavour to promote useful conversation; that it may minister grace unto the hearers; that it may be good for, and acceptable to, the hearers; either in the way of information, counsel, pertinent reproof, or the like. Observe, It is the great duty of Christians to take care that they offend not with their lips; and that they improve discourse and converse, as much as may be, for the good of others.

5. Here is another caution against wrath and anger; and further advice to mutual love, and kindly dispositions toward each other, v. 31, 32.* By bitterness, wrath, and anger, are meant violent inward resentment and displeasure against others: and by clamour, big words, loud threatenings, and other intemperate speeches, by which bitterness, wrath, and anger, do vent themselves. Christians should not entertain these vile passions in their hearts; nor be clamorous with their tongues. Evil-speaking signifies all railing, reviling, and reproachful speeches, against such as we are angry with. And by malice we are to understand that rooted anger which prompts men to design and to do mischief to others.

The contrary to all this follows; Be ye kind one to another. This implies the principle of love in the heart, and the outward expression of it, in an affable, humble, courteous behaviour and carriage. It becomes the disciples of Jesus to be kind one to another, as those who have learned, and who teach, the art of obliging. Tender-hearted; merciful, and having a tender sense of the distresses and sufferings of others, so as to be quickly moved to compassion and pity. Forgiving one another. Occasions of difference will happen among Christ’s disciples; and therefore they must be placable, and ready to forgive; therein resembling God himself, who for Christ’s sake hath forgiven them, and that more richly. With God there is forgiveness; and he forgives sin for the sake of Jesus Christ, and on the account of that atonement which he has made to divin justice. Note again, They who are forgiven of God, should be of a forgiving spirit, and should forgive even as God forgives, sincerely and heartily, readily and cheerfully, universally and for ever, upon the sinner’s sincere repentance, as remembering that they purpose to receive, in like manner, as we forgive them, who trespass against us. Now, We may observe concerning all these particulars that the apostle has insisted on, that they belong to the second table; whence Christians should learn the strict obligations they are under to the duties of the second table; and that he who does not conscientiously discharge them, can never fear or love God in truth and in sincerity; whatever he may pretend to. In the midst of these exhortations and cautions the apostle interposes that general one, And forgive not the holy Spirit of God, v. 30. By looking to what precedes, and to what follows, we may see what it is that grieves the Spirit of God. In the verses before it is intimated, that all lewdness and filthiness, lying, and corrupt communications that stir up filthy appetites and lusts, grieve the Spirit of God. In what follows it is intimated, that those corrupt passions of bitterness, and wrath, and anger, and clamour, and evil-speaking, and malice, grieve this good Spirit. By this we are not to understand as though that blessed Being could properly be grieved or vexed as we are: but the design of the exhortation is, that we act not toward him in such a manner as is wont to be grievous and disquieting to our fellows: we must not do that which is contrary to his holy nature and his will: we must not refuse to hearken to his counsels, nor rebel against his government; which things would provoke him to act towards us, as men are wont to do toward them with whom they are displeased and grieved; withdrawing themselves and their wonted kindness from such, and abandoning them to their enemies. O provoke not the blessed Spirit: do not let his gracious influences from you! It is a great good reason why we should not grieve him, because by him we are sealed unto the day of redemption. There is to be a day of redemption; the body is to be redeemed from the power of the grave at the resurrection-day: and then God’s people will be delivered from all the effects of sin, as well as from all sin and misery; which they have been rescued out of the grave: and then their full and complete happiness commences. All true believers are sealed to that day. God has distinguished them from others, having set his mark upon them: and he gives them the earnest and assurance of a joyful and a glorious resurrection: and the Spirit of God is the Seal. Wherever that blessed Spirit is as a Sanctifier, he is the Earliest of all the joys and gloves of the redemption-day; and we should be undone, should God take away his Holy Spirit from us.

CHAP. V.

We had several important exhortations in the close of the foregoing chapter, and they are contained in this: particularly, 1. We have here an exhortation to mutual love and charity, v. 1. 2. Against all manner of uncleanness; with proper arguments and remedies proposed against such defections, and some further cautions are added, and other duties recommended, v. 3. 20. 3. The apostle directs to the conscientious discharge of relative duties, from v. 21. throughout this, and in the beginning of the next chapter.

1. Be ye therefore followers of God, as dear children: 2. And walk in love, as Christ also hath loved us, and hath given himself for us an offering and a sacrifice to God for a sweet-smelling savour.

Here we have the exhortation to mutual love, or to Christian charity. The apostle had been insisting on this in the former chapter, and particularly in the last verses of it, to which the particle therefore refers, and connects what he had said there, with what is contained in these verses, thus; “Because God, for Christ’s sake, has forgiven you, therefore be ye followers of God, or imitators of him;” for so the word signifies. Pious persons should imitate the good works of God, when they so freely, as far as they have revealed himself as imitable by them. They must conform themselves to his example, and have his image renewed upon them. This puts a great honour upon practical religion, that it is the imitation of God. We must be holy as God is holy, merciful as he is merciful, perfect as he is perfect. But there is no one attribute of God more recommended to our imitation than that of his goodness. Be ye imitators of God’s goodness, and resemble him, in every grace, and especially in his love, and in his pardoning goodness.

God is love; and they that dwell in love, dwell in God, and God in them. Thus he has proclaimed his name, Gracious and merciful, and abundant in goodness. As dear children, as children (who are wont to be greatly beloved by their parents) usually resemble them in the lineaments and features of their faces, and in the dispositions and qualifications of their minds: or as becomes the children of God, who are beloved and cherished by their heavenly Father. Children are obliged to imitate their parents in what is good; especially when dearly beloved by them. The character that we bear of God’s children, oblige us to resemble him, especially in his love and goodness, in his mercy and readiness to forgive. And they only are God’s dear children, who imitate him in these. It follows, And walk in love, v. 2. This Godlike grace should conduct and influence our whole conversation, which is meant by walking in it. It should be the principle from which we act, it should direct the ends at which we aim. We should be more careful to give proof of the sincerity of our love one to another. As Christ also hath loved us. Here the apostle directs us to the example of Christ, whom Christians are obliged to imitate, and in whom we have an instance of the most free and generous love that ever was; that great love wherewith he hath loved us. We are all joint sharers in that love, and partakers of the comfort of it, and therefore should love one another.

Christ having loved us all, and given such proof of his love to us: for he hath given himself for us. The goodness abundantly enlarges on the subject; for what can yield us more delightful matter for contemplation than this? Christ gave himself to die for us; and the death of Christ was the great sacrifice of atonement. An offering and a sacrifice to God; or an offering, even a sacrifice: a propitiatory sacrifice, to expiate our guilt, which had been prefigured in the legal oblations and sacrifices; and this for a sweet-smelling savour. Some observe, that the sacrifices were never said to be of a sweet-smelling savour: but this is said of the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world. As he offered himself with a design to be accepted of God, so God did accept, was pleased with, and appeased by, that sacrifice. Note, As the sacrifice of Christ was efficacious with God, so his example should be prevailing with us, and we should carefully copy after it.

3. But fornication, and all uncleanness, or covetousness, let it not be once named among you, as becometh saints; 4. Neither filthiness, nor foolish talking, nor jesting, which are not convenient: but rather giving of thanks. 5. For this ye know, that no whoremonger, nor unclean person, nor covetous man, who is an idolater, hath any inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and of God. 6. Let no man deceive you with vain words: for because of these things cometh the wrath of God upon the children of disobedience. 7. Be not ye therefore partakers with them. 8. For ye were sometimes darkness, but now are ye light in the Lord: walk as children of light; 9. (For the fruit of the Spirit is in all goodness and righteousness and truth;) 10. Proving what is acceptable unto the Lord. 11. And have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, but rather reprove them. 12. For it is a shame even to speak of those things which are done of them in secret. 13. But all things that are reproved are made manifest by the light: for whatsoever doth make manifest is light. 14. Wherefore he saith, Awake thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light. 15. See then that ye walk circumspectly, not as fools, but as wise, 16. Redeeming the time, because the days are evil. 17. Wherefore be ye not unwise, but understanding what the will of the Lord is. 18. And be not drunk with wine, wherein is excess; but be filled with the Spirit; 19. Speaking to yourselves in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs, singing and making melody in your heart to the Lord; 20. Giving thanks always for all things unto God and the Father in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ;

These verses contain a caution against all manner of uncleanness, with proper arguments and remedies proposed; some further cautions are added, and other duties recommended. Filthy lusts must be suppressed, in order to the supporting of holy love. Walk in love; and shun fornication, and all uncleanness. Fornication is forbidden between married persons, and all other sorts of filthy lusts, which were too common among the Gentiles. Or covetousness; which being thus connected, and mentioned as a thing which should not be once named, some understand it in the chaste style of the scripture, of unnatural lust: while others take it, in the more common sense, for an immoderate desire of gain, or an insatiable love of riches, which is spiritual adultery: for by this, the soul, which was espoused to God, goes astray from him, and embraces the bosom of a stranger; and therefore carnal worldlings are called adulterers. Ye adulterers and adulteresses, know ye not that the friendship of the world is enmity with God? Now, therefore, let him be divorced and detested to the highest degree. Let it not be once named among you, never in a way of approbation, and without abhorrence, as becometh saints, holy persons, who are separated from the world, and dedicated unto God. The apostle not only cautions against the gross acts of sin, but against what some may be apt to make light of, and think to be excusable. Neither filthiness, &c. By which may be understood all wantonness and unseemly gestures and behaviour. Nor foolish talking, obscene and lewd discourse; or, more generally, such vain discourse as betrays much folly and indiscretion, and is far from edifying the hearers. Nor jesting. The Greek word ὑπασπίζειν is the same which Aristotle, in his Ethics, makes a virtue; pleasantness of conversation. And there is, no doubt, an innocent and inoffensive jesting, which we cannot suppose the apostle here forbids. Some understand him of so scurrilous and abusive reflection, as to expose others, and to make them ridiculous. This is bad enough: but the context seems to restrain it to such pleasantness of discourse as is filthy and obscene; which he may also design by that corrupt, or putrid and rotten, communication he speaks of, ch. 4. 29. Of these things he says, They are not convenient. Indeed there is more than inconvenience in these great occasions of mischief, in them. They are so far from being pleasant things, that they pollute and poison the hearers. But the meaning is, Those things do not become Christians, and are very unsuitable to profession and character. Christians are allowed to be cheerful and pleasant; but they must be merry and wise. The apostle adds, but rather giving of thanks: so far let the Christian’s way of mirth be from that of obscene and lewd jesting, and from the corrupt gestures of his iniquity, that he may be found to have in his heart a grateful remembrance of God’s goodness and mercy to him, and by blessing and praising him on the account of these. Note, 1. We should take all occasions to render thanksgivings and praises to God for his kindness and favours to us. 2. A reflection on the grace and goodness of God to us, with a design to excite our thankfulness to him, is proper to refresh and delight the Christian’s mind, and to make him cheerful, by a grateful remembrance of God’s goodness and mercy to him, and by blessing and praising him on the account of these.

Dr. Hammond thinks that ἐγκαταστάσεως may signify gracious, pious, religious discourse in the general; by way of opposition to what the apostle condemns. Our cheerfulness, instead of breaking out into what is vain and sinful, and a profanation of God’s name, should express itself as becomes Christians, and in what may tend to his glory. If men abounded more in good and pious expressions, they would not be so apt to utter ill and unbecoming words: for shall blessing and cursing, lewdness and thanksgivings, proceed out of the same mouth? To fortify us against the sins of uncleanness, &c. the apostle urges several arguments, and prescribes several remedies, in what follows.

1. He urges several arguments. As,

1. Consider that these are sins which shut persons out of heaven; even this ye know, &c. v. 5. Then knew it, being informed of it by the Christian religion. By a covetous man, some understand a lewd, lascivious libertine, who indulges himself in those vile lusts which were accounted the certain marks of a heathen and an idolater: Others understand it in the common acceptance of the word; and such a man is an idolater, because there is spiritual idolatry in the love of this world. As the Epicure makes a god of his belly, so a covetous man makes a god of his money; sets those affections upon it, and places that hope, confidence, and delight, in worldly good, which should be reserved for God only. He serves mammon instead of God. Of these persons it is said, that they have no inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and of God; that is, the kingdom of Christ, who is God; or the kingdom which God’s nature, and Christ’s as he is Mediator: the kingdom which Christ has purchased, and which God bestows. Heaven is here described as a kingdom, (as frequently elsewhere,) with respect to its eminency and glory, its fulness and sufficiency, &c. In this kingdom, the saints and servants of God have an inheritance; for it is the inheritance of the saints in light. But those who are impenitent, and allow themselves, either in the world or in the loves of the world, are not Christians indeed, and so belong not to the kingdom of grace, nor shall they ever come to the kingdom of glory. Let us then be excited to be on our guard against those sins which would exclude and shut us out of heaven.

2. These sins bring the wrath of God upon those who are guilty of them; “Let no man deceive you with vain words, &c. v. 8. Let none flatter you, as though we trusted in our own sufficiency, &c. v. 5. The apostle urges the danger of being led away and ensnared of in Christ’s; or as though they were not very provoking and offensive unto God; or as though you might indulge yourselves in them, and yet escape with impunity. These are vain words.” Observe, They who flatter themselves and others with hopes of impurity in sin, do but put a cheat upon themselves and others. Thus Satan deceived our first parents, when he said to them, Ye shall not surely die. They find many who are ready to yield in this, for those who trust to them, will find themselves wretchedly imposed upon, for because of these things cometh the wrath of God upon the children of disobedience. By children of disobedience may be meant the Gentiles, who disbelieved, and refused to comply with, and to submit themselves to, the gospel: or more generally, all obstinate sinners, who will not bow their necks to the yoke of the kingdom of Christ. Disobedience is the very malignity of sin. And it is by a usual Hebraism that such sinners are called children of disobedience; and such indeed they are from their childhood, going astray as soon as they are born. The wrath of God comes upon such, because of their sins; sometimes in this world, but more especially in the next. And dare we make light of that which will lay us under the wrath of God? “Be not ye therefore partakers with them, v. 7. Do not partake with them in their sins, that ye may not share in their punishment.” We partake with other men in their sins, not only when we live in the same sinful manner that they do, and consent and comply with their temptations and solicitations to sin, but when we encourage them in their sins, prompt them to them, and do not prevent and hinder them, as far as it may be in our power to do so.

3. Consider what obligations Christians are under to live at another rate than such sinners do; “For ye were sometimes darkness, but now are ye, &c. v. 8. The meaning is, “Such courses are very unsuitable to your present condition: for whereas in your Gentile and your unregenerate state ye were darkness, ye have now undergone a great change. The apostle calls their former condition darkness in the abstract, to express the great darkness they were in. They lived wicked and profane lives, being destitute of the light of instruction without, and of the illumination and grace of the blessed Spirit within. Note, A state of sin is a state of darkness. Sinners, like men in the dark, are going they know not whither, and doing they know not what. But the grace of God hath produced a mighty change in their state; New are ye light in the Lord, savingly enlightened by the word and the Spirit of God. Now, upon your believing in Christ, and your receiving the gospel.

Walk as children of light. Children of light, according to the Hebrew dialect, are those who are in a state of light, endowed with knowledge and holiness. "Now, being such, let your conversation be suitable to God. They are not pursuing any standing, and therefore live up to the obligation you are under by that knowledge and those advantages you enjoy. Proving what is acceptable unto the Lord, (v. 10.) examining and searching diligently what God has revealed to be his will; and making it appear that ye approve it by conforming yourselves to it." Observe, We must not only dread and avoid that which is displeasing to God, but inquire and consider what will be acceptable to him; searching the scriptures repeatedly, thus keeping at the greatest distance from these sins.

II. The apostle prescribes some remedies against them. As,

1. If we would not be entangled by the lusts of the flesh, we must bring forth the fruit of the Spirit, v. 9. This is expected from the children of light; that, being illuminated, they be also sanctified by the Spirit. They must walk thus in all goodness, an inclination to do good and to shew mercy; and righteousness, which signifies justice in our dealings. Thus they are taken more strictly; but, more generally, all religion is goodness and righteousness. And in and with these must be truth, sincerity and uprightness of heart.

2. We must have no fellowship with sin or sinners, v. 11. Sinful works are works of darkness; they come from the darkness of ignorance, they seek the darkness of concealment, and they lead to the darkness of hell. These works of darkness are unfruitful works; there is nothing got by them in the long run; whatever profit is pretended by sin, it will by no means balance the loss; for it issues in the utter ruin and destruction of the impenitent sinner. We must therefore have no fellowship with these unfruitful works; as we must not practise them ourselves, so we must not encourage the practice of them. There are many ways of our being accessory to the sins of others; by commendation, counsel, consent, or concealment. And if we share with others in their sin, we must expect to share with them in their plagues. Nay, if we thus have fellowship with them, we shall be in the utmost danger of acting as they do; and long. But rather than have fellowship with them, we must reprove them; implying, that if we do so much as have the sins of others, we have fellowship with them. We must prudently and in our places witness against the sins of others, and endeavour to convince them of their sinfulness, when we can do it seasonably and pertinently, in our words; but especially by the holiness of our lives, and a religious conversation. Reprove their sins by abounding in the contrary duties. One reason why the apostle gives his precept thus, because he knew it was a charm even to some of those things, &c. v. 12. They are so filthy and abominable, that it is a shame to mention them, except in a way of reproof; much more must it be a shame to have any fellowship with them. The things which are done of them in secret. The apostle seems to speak here of the Gentile idolaters, and of their horrid mysteries, which abounded with detestable actions. But it is a charm even to some who are not ashamed to speak of carnal passions; and therefore it is permitted to divulge, upon pain of death. Observe, The man is ashamed to speak that which many wicked people are not ashamed to act: but as far as their wickedness appears, it should be reproved by good men. There follows another reason for such reproof; But all things that are reproved, are made manifest by the light, v. 13. The meaning of which passage may be this; "All things that are wholesome works of darkness which ye are called upon to reprove, are laid open, and made to appear in their proper colours to the sinners themselves, by the light of doctrine or of God's word in your mouths, as faithful provers; or by that instructive light which is diffused by the holiness of your lives, and by your exemplary walk." Observe, The light of God's word, and the exemplification of it in a Christian conversation, are proper means to convince some of the sin and wickedness. It follows, For whatsoever doth make manifest, is light; that is, it is the light that discovers what was concealed before in darkness; and accordingly it becomes those who are children of light, who are light in the Lord, to discover to others their sins, and to endeavour to convince them of the evil and danger of them, thus shewing as lights in the world. The apostle further makes all the duty of the latter part of this passage, to be the example of God or Christ; Wherefore saith, &c. (v. 14.) as if he had said, "In doing this, you will copy after the great God, who has set himself to awaken sinners from their sleep, and to raise them from the death of sin, that they might receive light from Christ." He saith. The Lord is constantly saying in his word what is more particularly expressed, Isa. 60. 1. Or, Christ, by his ministers, who preach the everlasting grace, upon their calling upon sinners to this effect: Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead. The same thing is the man is designed by these different expressions, and they serve to remind us of the great stupidity and the wretched security of sinners; how insensible they are of their danger, and how unapt they naturally are to spiritual motions, sensations, and actions. When God calls upon them to awake, and to arise, their care is, to clear their way from off their sins by repentance, and enter on a course of holy obedience; and he encourages them to essay and to do their utmost that way, by that gracious promise; And Christ shall give thee light; or, Christ shall enlighten thee, or, shall shine upon thee. "He shall bring thee into a state of knowledge, holiness, and comfort; assisting thee with his grace, and refreshing thy mind with joy and peace here, and whatever manner of things, to which we should hasten when called, to do the works of God, and to serve, when we are endeavouring to convince sinners, and to reform them from their sins, we are imitating God and Christ, in that which is their great design throughout the gospel. Some indeed understand this as a call to sinners and to saints: to sinners, to repent and turn; to saints, to stir up themselves to their spiritual death; and the other must awake from their spiritual sleep.

3. Another remedy against sin, is, circumspection, care, and caution; (v. 15.) See then, &c. This may be understood, either with respect to what immediately precedes; "If you are to reprove others for their sins, and would be faithful to your duty in this particular, you must look well to yourselves, and to your own behaviour and conduct!" (and, indeed, they only are fit to reproves others, who walk with due circumspection and care themselves;) or else, we have here another remedy, or rather preservative from the before-mentioned sins; and this I take to be the design of the apostle; it being impossible to maintain purity and holiness of heart and life without great circumspection and care. Walk circumspectly; or, as the word signifies, accurately, exactly, in the right way: in order to which, we must be free from old things. This, and the other directions we have in the sacred oracles. Not as fools, who walk at all adventures, and who have no understanding of their duty, or of the worth of their souls; and through neglect, supineness, and want of care, fall into sin, and destroy themselves: but as...
wise; as persons taught of God, and endued with wisdom from above. Circumspect walking is the effect of true wisdom; but the contrary of folly. It follows, redeeming the time, &c. (v. 16.) literally, buying the opportunity. It is a metaphor taken from merchants and traders, who diligently observe and buy up the seasons for merchandise and traffic. It is a great part of Christian wisdom to redeem the time. Good Christians must be good husbands of their time, and take care to improve it to the best purposes, by watching against temptations; by doing good while it is in the power of their hands; and by filling it up with proper employment—one special preservative from sin. They should make the best use of every moment of present seasons of grace. Our time is a talent given by God to every soul, and it is misspent and lost when it is not employed according to his design. If we have lost our time heretofore, we must endeavour to redeem it by doubling our diligence in doing our duty for the future. The reason given, is, because the days are evil: either by reason of the wickedness of those who dwell in them; or, rather, "as they are troublesome and dangerous times to you who live in them." These were times of persecution which the apostle wrote this: the Christians were in jeopardy every hour. When the days are evil, we have one superadded argument to redeem time; especially, because we know not how soon they may be worse. People are very apt to complain of bad times; it were well if that would stir them up to redeem time. Wherefore," says the apostle, (v. 17.) because of the badness of the times, be ye not unwise, ignorant of your duty and negligent about your souls: but understanding what the will of the Lord is. Study, consider, and further acquaint yourselves with, the will of God, as determining your duty. "Observe, Ignorance of our duty, and neglect of our souls, are evidences of the greatest folly; while an acquaintance with the will of God, and a care to comply with it, bespeak the best and truest wisdom.

In the three following verses the apostle warns against some other particular sins, and urges some other duties.

(1.) He warns against the sin of drunkenness: And be not drunk with wine, v. 18. This was a sin very frequent among the heathens, and particularly on occasion of the festivals of their gods; and more especially among the Corinthians: where they were wont to inebriate themselves with wine; and the inward of inordinate lusts were consequent upon it; and therefore the apostle adds, wherein, or in which drunkenness, is excess. The word απώπωθος may signify luxury or dissoluteness; and it is certain that drunkenness is no friend to chastity and purity of life; but it virtually contains all manner of extravagance, and transports men into gross sensuality and vice. Drunkenness is a sin that seldom goes alone, but often involves men in other instances of guilt: it is a sin very provoking to God, and a great hinderance to the spiritual life. The apostle may design all such intemperance and disorder as are opposite to the sober and prudent demeanour he intends in his advice, to redeem the time.

(2.) Instead of being filled with wine, he exhorts them to be filled with the Spirit. Those who are full of drink, are not likely to be full of the Spirit; and therefore this duty is opposed to the former sin. The meaning of the exhortation, is, that men should labour for a plentiful measure of the graces of the Spirit, that would fill their souls with holy joy, strength, and courage: which things sensual men expect their wine should inspire them with. We cannot be guilty of any excess in our endeavours after these things: nay, we ought not to be satisfied with a little of the Spirit, but to be aspiring after greater measures, so as to be filled with the Spirit. Now by this means we shall come to understand what the will of the Lord is; for the Spirit of God is given as a Spirit of wisdom and of understanding. And because those who are filled with the Spirit will be carried out in acts of devotion, and all the proper expressions of the proper reverence for God's name; therefore the Spirit shall understand the will of the Lord. (3.) To sing unto the Lord, v. 19. Drunkards are wont to sing obscene and profane songs. The heathens, in their Bacchanales, used to sing hymns to Bacchus, whom they called the god of wine. Thus they express their joy; but the Christian's joy should express itself in songs of praise to his God. In these they should speak to themselves in their assemblies and meetings together, for mutual edification. By psalms may be meant the Hymns of the Church, or psalms, or such composes as were fitted sung with musical instruments. By hymns may be meant such others as were confined to matter of praise, as those of Zacharias, Simeon, &c. Spiritual songs may contain a greater variety of matter, doctrinal, prophetic, historical, &c. Observe here, [1.] Singing of psalms and hymns is a gospel-ordinance: it is an ordinance of God, and appointed for his glory. [2.] Though Christians are anointed to profane mirth, yet it encourages joy and gladness, and the proper expressions of these in the professors of it. God's people have reason to rejoice, and to sing for joy. They are to sing and to make melody in their hearts; not only with their voices, but with inward affection; and then their doing this will be as delightful and acceptable to God as music is to us: and it must be with a design to please him, and to promote his glory, that we do this; and then it will be done to the Lord.

(4.) Thanksgiving is another duty that the apostle exhorts to, v. 20. We are appointed to sing psalms, &c. for the expression of our thankfulness to God: but though we are not always singing, we should be always giving thanks; we should never want a disposition for this duty, as we never want matter for it. We must continue it throughout the whole course of our lives; and we should give thanks for all things; not only for spiritual blessings enjoyed, and eternal ones expected; (for what of the former we have in hand, and for what of the other we have in hope;) but for temporal mercies too; not only for our comfort, but also for our sanctified affections; not only for what immediately concerns ourselves, but for the blessings of God's kindness and favour to others also. It is our duty to give every thing to give thanks unto God and the Father: to God as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, and our Father in him; in whose name we are to offer up all our prayers, and praises, and spiritual services, that they may be acceptable to God.

21. Submitting yourselves one to another in the fear of God. 22. Wives, submit yourselves unto your own husbands, as unto the Lord. 23. For the husband is the head of the wife, even as Christ is the head of the church: and he is the Saviour of the body. 24. Therefore, as the church is subject unto Christ, so let the wives be to their own husbands in every thing. 25. Husbands, love your wives, even as Christ also loved the church, and gave himself for it: 26. That he might sanctify and cleanse it with the washing of water by the word. 27. That he might present it to himself a glorious church, not having spot, or wrin-the church, in that superiority and headship which God has appointed to the husband. The apostle adds, and he is the Saviour of the body. Christ's authority is exercised over the church, in the saving her from evil, and the supplying her with every thing good for her. In like manner should the husband be employed for the protection and comfort of his spouse; and therefore she should the more cheerfully subject herself unto him. So it follows, Therefore as the church is subject unto Christ, (v. 24.) with cheerfulness, with fidelity, and humility, so also the wives be to their own husbands in every thing, in every way, why their authority justly extends itself; in every thing lawful, and consistent with duty to God.

2. The duty of husbands (on the other hand) is to love their wives; (v. 25.) for without this they would abuse their superiority and headship; and wherever this prevails as it ought to do, it will infer the other duties of the relation; it being a special and peculiar affection that is required in her behalf. The love of Christ to the church is proposed as an example of this; which love of his is a sincere, a pure, an ardent, and a constant affection; and that notwithstanding the imperfections and failures that she is guilty of. The greatness of his love to the church appeared in his giving himself unto the death for it. Observe, As the church's subject to Christ is proposed as an example to wives, so the love of Christ to his church is proposed as a pattern to husbands; and while such exemplars are offered to both, and so much required of each, neither has reason to complain of the divine injunctions. The love which God requires from the husband in behalf of his wife, will make an amends for the subjection which he demands from her to her husband: and the prescribed subjection of the wife is an appeal, and a return, that love of the husband which God has made her duty.

The apostle, having mentioned Christ's love to the church, enlarges upon it; assigning the reason why he gave himself for it, That he might sanctify it in this world, and glorify it in the next, v. 26, 27. That he might sanctify and cleanse it, with the washing of water by the word; (v. 26.) that he might endue all his members with a principle of holiness, and that the church might be cleansed, with the subjection, and the dominion of sin. The instrumental means whereby this is effected, are, the instituted sacraments, particularly the washing of baptism, and the preaching and reception of the gospel. And that he might present it to himself, &c. v. 27. Dr. Lightfoot thinks the apostle alludes here to the Jews' extraordinary curiosity in their washings for purification. They were careful that there should be no wrinkle to keep the flesh from the water, and no spot or dirt which was not thoroughly washed. Others understand him as alluding to a garment come new out of the fuller's hand, purged from spots, stretched from wrinkles; the former newly contracted, the latter by long time and custom. That he might present it to himself, that he might perfectly unite to himself, in the great day, a people chosen and peculiar, a new creation, not having spot or wrinkle, or any such thing, nothing of deformity or defilement remaining, but entirely amiable and pleasing in his eye; holy and without blemish, free from the least remains of sin. The church in general, and particular believers, will not be without spot or wrinkle till they come to glory. From this and the former verse together we may take notice, that the subjection of the church is intended in the sanctifying of it: and that those, and those only, who are sanctified now, shall be glorified hereafter. So ought men to love their wives as their own bodies, &c. v. 28. The wife being made one with her husband, (not in a natural,
CHILDREN, obey your parents in the Lord: for this is right. 2. Honour thy father and mother; (which is the first commandment with promise;) 3. That it may be well with thee, and thou mayest live long on the earth. 4. And, ye fathers, provoke not your children to wrath: but bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. 5. Servants, be obedient to them that are your masters, according to the flesh, with fear and trembling, in singleness of your heart, as unto Christ; 6. Not with eye-service, as men-pleasers; but as the servants of Christ, doing the will of God from the heart; 7. With good will doing service, as to the Lord, and not to men: 8. Knowing that whatsoever good thing ye do, the same shall he receive of the Lord, whether he be bond or free. 9. And, ye masters, do the same things unto them, forbearing threatening: knowing that your Master also is in heaven; neither is there respect of persons with him.

Here we have further directions concerning relative duties, in which the apostle is very particular.

1. The duty of children to their parents; Come, ye children, hearken to me, I will teach you the fear of the Lord. The great duty of children, is, to obey their parents, v. 1. Parents being the instruments of their being, God and nature having given them an authority to command, in subserviency to God; and if children will be obedient to their pious parents, they will be in a fair way to be pious as they are. That obedience which God demands from their children, in their behalf, includes an inward reverence, as well as the outward expressions and acts. Obey in the Lord. Some take this as a limitation, and understand it thus, “as far as is consistent with your duty to God.” We must not disobey our heavenly Father, in obedience to earthly parents; for our obligation to God is prior and superior to all others. I take it rather as a reason: “Children, obey your parents; for the Lord has commanded it; obey them therefore for the Lord’s sake, and with an eye to him.” Or it may be a particular specification of the general duty: “Obev your parents, especially in those things which relate to the Lord. Your parents teach you good manners, and therein you must obey them. They teach you what is for your health, and in that you must obey them; but the chief things in which you are to do it, are, the things pertaining to the Lord. Refer to them the ways of the Lord, Gen. 18. 19. They command them to be found in the way of their duty toward God, and to take heed of those sins that their age is most prone to commit; in these things especially they must see that they be obedient. There is a general reason given; for this is right, there is a natural equity in it, God has enjoined it, and it highly becomes Christians. It is the duty of parents, the command, and children obey. Though this may seem a hard saying, yet it is duty, and it must be done by such as would please God, and approve themselves to him. For the proof of this, the apostle quotes the law of the fifth commandment; which Christ was so far from designing to abrogate and repeal, that he came to confirm it; as appears by his vindicating it, Matt. 15. 4, &c.
Honour thy father and mother; (v. 2.) which honour implies reverence, obedience, and relief and maintenance, if these be needed. The apostle adds, which is the first commandment with promise. Some little difficulty arises from this, which we should not overlook; because some who plead for the lawfulness of images, bring this as a proof that we are not obliged, not that there is no manner of force in the argument. The second commandment has not a particular promise; but only a general declaration or assertion, which relates to the whole law of God's keeping mercy for thousands. And then by this is not meant the first commandment of the decalogue that has a promise; for there is no other after it that has, and therefore it would be improper to say it is the first: but the great commandmen t and have. This is a prominent with commandment, and it has a promise; it is the first commandment in the second table. The promise is, That it may be well with thee, &c. v. 3. Observ, Whereas the promise in the commandment has reference to the land of Canaan, the apostle hereby shews that that and other promises, which we have in the Old Testament relating to the land of Canaan, are to be understood more generally.
The promise to the Israelites, which God gave them, whom God gave the land of Canaan, were bound by the fifth commandment, he here gives it a further sense, That it may be well with thee, &c. Outward prosperity and long life are blessings promised to those who keep this commandment. This is the way to have it well with us; and obedient children are often rewarded with outward prosperity: not indeed that it is always so; there are instances of such children who meet with much affliction in this life; but ordinarily it is thus rewarded; and where it is not, it is made up with something better. Observe, 1. The gospel has its temporal promises, as well as spiritual ones. 2.
Although the authority of God be sufficient to engage us in our duty, yet we are allowed to have respect to the promised reward: and, 3. Though it contains some temporal advantage, even that may be considered as a motive and encouragement to our obedience.
II. The duty of parents; And ye fathers, v. 4.
Or, ye parents, 1. "Do not provoke your children to wrath. Though God has given you power, you must not abuse that power; remembering that your children are, in a particular manner, pieces of yourselves, and therefore ought to be governed with great tenderness and lenity. Bring them up with them; use no unreasonable severities, and lay no rigid injunctions upon them. When you caution them, when you counsel them, when you reprove them, do it in such a manner as not to provoke them to wrath.
In all such cases deal prudently and wisely with them, endeavouring to convince their judgments, and to work upon their reason. 2. "Bring them up well; in the nurture and admonition of the Lord; in the discipline of promise and of compassionate correction; and in the knowledge of that duty which God requires of them, and by which they may become better acquainted with him. Give them a good education." It is the great duty of parents to be careful in the education of their children; "Not only bring them up as the brutes do, taking care to provide for them; but bring them up in nurture and admonition, which is more than to feed them to their reasonable natures. Nay, not only bring them up as men, in nurture and admonition; but as Christians, in the admonition of the Lord. Let them have a religious education. Instruct them to fear sinning; and inform them of, and excite them to, the whole of their duty toward God." I III. The duty of servants; that also is summed up in one word, which is, obedience. He is largest on this article; as knowing there was the greatest need of it. These servants were generally slaves. Civil servitude is not inconsistent with Christian liberty.
They may be the Lord's freemen, who are slaves to men. "Your masters according to the flesh, (v. 5.) who have the command of your bodies, but not of your souls and consciences: God alone has dominion over these." Now with respect to servants, he ex-HORTS.
1. That they obey with fear and trembling. They are to reverence those who are over them; fearing to displease them, and trembling lest they should justly incur their anger and indignation.
2. That they be sincere in their obedience; in singleness of heart; not pretending obedience when they design disobedience, but serving them with faithfulness.
3. They should have an eye to Jesus Christ, in all the service that they perform to their masters; (v.
5—7.) doing service as to the Lord, and not to men; not to men only or principally. When servants, in the discharge of the duty of their places, have an eye to Christ, this puts an honour upon their obedience, and an acceptableness into it. Service done to their earthly masters with an eye to him, becomes acceptable service to him also. It is a part of the business of a servant to have an eye to Jesus Christ, is to remember that he sees them, and is ever present with them; and that his authority obliges them to a faithful and conscientious discharge of the duties of their station.
4. They must not serve their masters with eye-service; (v. 6.) that is, only when their master's eye is upon them; but they must be as conscientious in the discharge of their duty, when they are absent of it, out of the way; because then their Master in heaven beholds them; and therefore they must not act as men-pleasers; as though they had no regard to the pleasing of God, and approving themselves to him, if they can impose upon their masters. Observ, A steady regard to the Lord Jesus Christ will make men faithful and sincere in every station of life.
5. What they do, they must do cheerfully; doing the will of God from the heart; selling their masters, as God's stewards, not by constraint, by constraint, but from a principle of love to them and their concerns. This is doing it with good-will, (v.
7.) which will make their service easy to themselves, pleasing to their masters, and acceptable to the Lord Christ. There should be good-will to their masters; good-will to the families they are in; and especially a readiness to do their duty to God. Observe, Servants, performed with conscience, and from a regard to God, though it be to unrighteous masters, will be accounted by Christ as service done to himself.
6. Let faithful servants trust God for their wages, while they do their duty in his fear; Knowing that whatever good thing, (v. 8.) how poor and mean soever it may be, considered in itself, the same shall be receive of the Lord, that is, (by a metaphor) the reward of the same. Though his master on earth should neglect or abuse him, instead of rewarding him, he shall certainly be rewarded by the Lord Christ; whether he be bond or free, whether he be a poor bond-servant, or a freeman or master. Christ regards not these differences of men at present; nor will he in the great and final judgment. You think,
"A prince, or a magistrate, or a minister, that does his duty here, will be sure to receive his reward in heaven: but what capacity am I, a poor servant, in, of no recommendation, of no favor at all?" Why, God will as certainly reward thee for the meanest drudgery, that is done from a sense of duty, and with an eye to himself. And what can be said more proper, both to engage and to encourage servants to their duty?
IV. The duty of masters; "And ye, masters, do the same things unto them; (v. 9.) act after the same manip. Be just to them, as ye expect they should be to you: shew the like good-will and concern for them, and be careful herein to approve yourselves to God.” Observe, Masters are under as strict obligations to discharge their duty to their servants, as servants are to be obedient and dutiful to them. "Forbearing threatening; whereas—moderating threatening, and remitting the evils which you threaten them with. Remember that your servants are made of the same mould with yourselves, and therefore be not tyrannical and imperious over them, knowing that your Master also is in heaven;" some copies read, both your and their Master. “You have a Master to obey, who makes this your duty; and you and they are but fellow-servants in respect of Christ. You will be as punishable by him, for the neglect of your duty, or for acting contrary to it, as any others of meaner condition in the world. You are therefore to shew favour to others, even as you expect to find favour with him; and you will never be a match for him, though you may be too hard for your servants.” Neither in respect of persons with him; a rich, a wealthy, and a dignified master, if he be unjust, imperious, and abusive, is not a jot the nearer being accepted of God, for his riches, wealth, and honour. He will call masters and servants to an impartial account for their conduct one to another; and will neither spare the one, because they are more advanced, nor be severe toward the other, because they are inferior and mean in the world. If masters and servants would consider both their relation and obligation to God, and the account they must shortly give to him, they would be more careful of their duty to each other.

Thus the apostle concludes his exhortation to relative duties.

10. Finally, my brethren, be strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might. 11. Put on the whole armour of God, that ye may be able to stand against the wiles of the devil. 12. For we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places. 13. Wherefore take unto you the whole armour of God, that ye may be able to withstand in the evil day, and, having done all, to stand. 14. Stand therefore, having your loins girt about with truth, and having on the breast-plate of righteousness; 15. And your feet shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace; 16. Above all, taking the shield of faith, wherewith ye shall be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked. 17. And take the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God: 18. Praying always with all prayer and supplication in the Spirit, and watching thereunto with all perseverance and supplication for all saints.

Here is a general exhortation to constancy in our Christian course, and to courage in our Christian warfare. Is not our life a warfare? It is so; for we struggle with the common calamities of human life. Is not our religion much more a warfare? It is so; for we struggle with the opposition of the powers of darkness, and with many enemies who would keep us from God and heaven. We have enemies to fight against, a Captain to fight for, a banner to fight under, and certain rules of war by which we are to govern ourselves. “Finally, my brethren; (v. 16.) it yet remains that ye apply yourselves to your work, and duty as Christian soldiers.” Now it is requisite that a soldier have a good heart, and that he be well armed. If Christians be soldiers of Jesus Christ,

I. They must see that they have a good heart for it. This is prescribed here; Be strong in the Lord. Sec. Those who have so many battles to fight, and who, in their way to heaven, must dispute every step, like a pass, with dint of sword, have need of a great deal of courage. Be strong therefore, strong for service, strong for suffering, strong for fighting. Let a soldier be ever so well armed without, if he have not within a good heart, his armour will stand him in little stead. Note, Spiritual strength and courage are very necessary for our spiritual warfare. 1st. When in the Lord; find what need we have, and for his sake; or rather, in his strength. We have no sufficient strength of our own. Our natural courage is as perfect cowardice, and our natural strength as perfect weakness; but all our sufficiency is of God. In his strength we must go forth, and go on. By the actions of faith, we must fetch in grace and help from heaven, to enable us to do that which of ourselves we cannot do, in our Christian work and warfare. We must rely on ourselves to resist temptations in a reliance upon God's all-sufficiency, and the omnipotence of his might.

II. They must be well armed; “Put on the whole armour of God;” (v. 11.) make use of all the proper defensives and weapons for repelling the temptations and stratagems of Satan, get and exercise all the Christian graces, the whole armour, that no part be neglected and exposed to the enemy. Observe, They who would approve themselves to have the grace, must aim at all grace; the whole armour. It is called the armour of God, because he both prepares and bestows it. We have no armour of our own, that will be armour of proof in a trying time. Nothing will stand us in stead but the armour of God. This armour is prepared for us, but we must put it on; we must pray for grace; and use the grace as there is occasion. The reason assigned, why the Christian should be completely armed, is, that ye may be able to stand against the wiles of the Devil, that ye may be able to hold out, and to overcome, notwithstanding all his assaults, both of force and fraud; all the deceits he puts upon us, all the snares he lays for us, and all his machinations against us. This the apostle enlarges upon here, and shews,

When a soldier is longer in the service, he is to put on this whole armour: considering what sort of enemies we have to deal with—the Devil, and all the powers of darkness; For we wrestle not against flesh and blood, &c. v. 12. The combat for which we are to be prepared, is not against ordinary human enemies; not barely with men compounded of flesh and blood; nor against our own corrupt natures singly considered; but against the several ranks of devils, who have subordinates in several powers which they exercise in this world. We have to do,

(1.) With a subtle enemy; an enemy who uses wiles and stratagems, as v. 11. He has a thousand ways of beguiling unstable souls: hence he is called, a serpent for subtlety; an old serpent, experienced in the art and trade of tempting.

(2.) He is a powerful enemy; principaltities, and powers, and rulers. They are numerous, they are vigorous; and rule in these heathen nations which are yet in darkness. The dark parts of the world are the seat of Satan’s empire. Yea, they are usurp-
(3.) They are spiritual enemies; spiritual wickedness in high places; or wicked spirits, as some translate it. The Devil is a spirit, a wicked spirit; and our danger is the greater from our enemies, because they are unseen, and assault us ere we are aware of them. The devils are wicked spirits, and they chiefly annoy the saints with, and provoke them to, spiritual wickednesses, pride, envy, malice, &c. These enemies are said to be in high places, or in heaven; and the word is, taking heaven (as one says) for the whole expanse, or spreading out of the air between the earth and the stars; the air being the place from which the devils assault us. Or the meaning may be, We wrestle about heavenly places, or heavenly things; so some of the ancients interpret it. Our enemies strive to prevent our ascent to heaven, to deprive us of heavenly blessings, and to obstruct our communion with heaven. They assault us in the things that belong to our souls, and labour to deface the heavenly image in our hearts; and therefore we have need to be upon our guard against them. We have need of faith in our Christian warfare, because we have spiritual enemies to grapple with, as well as faith in our Christian work, because we have spiritual strength to fetch down upon us.

2. What our duty is; to take and put on the whole armour of God, and then to stand our ground, and withstand our enemies.

(1.) We must withstand, v. 13. We must not yield to the Devil’s allurements and assaults, but oppose them. Satan is said to stand up against us, 1 Chron. 21. 1. If he stand up against us, we must stand against him; set up, and keep up, an interest in opposition to the Devil. Satan is the principal adversary, and his kingdom is the kingdom of sin; to stand against Satan, is to strive against sin. That ye may be able to withstand in the evil day, in the temptation, or of any sore affliction.

(2.) We must stand our ground; And having done all, to stand. We must resolve, by God’s grace, not to yield to Satan. Resist him, and he will flee. If we give back, he will get ground. If we distrust, either our cause, or our Leader, or our armour, we give him advantage. Our present business is, to withstand the assaults of the Devil, and to stand it out; and then having done all, that is incumbent on the good soldiers of Jesus Christ, our warfare will be accomplished, and we shall be finally victorious.

(3.) We must stand armed; and this is here most enlarged on. The Christian in complete armour: and the armour is divine.

Armour of Light, Rom. 13. 12. Armour of righteousness, 2 Cor. 6. 7. The apostle specifies the particulars of this armour, both offensive and defensive. Here is the military girdle or belt; the breast-plate; the greaves, or soldier’s shoes; the shield; the helmet, and the sword. It is observable, among them all, there is none for the back; if we turn our backs, they are all upon us; and our enemies are on our exposed side.

[1.] Truth or sincerity is our girdle, v. 14. It was prophesied of Christ, (Isa. 11. 5,) that righteousness should be the girdle of his loins, and faithfulness the girdle of his reins. That which Christ was girt with, all Christians must be girt with. God desires truth, that is, sincerity, in the inward parts. This is the strength of our loins; and it is the girdle of our sinews, or our reins, and therefore is first mentioned. I know no religion without sincerity. Some understand it of the doctrine and the truths of the gospel; they should cleave to us, as the girdle doth to the loins. Jer. 13. 11. This will restrain from all heresies and licentiousness; as a girdle restrains and keeps in the body. This is the Christian-soldier’s belt: ungodly with this, he is unblest.

[2.] Righteousness must be our breast-plate. The breast-plate secures the vitals, shelters the heart. The righteousness of Christ, imputed to us, is our breast-plate against the arrows of divine wrath. The righteousness of Christ, implanted in us, is our breast-plate to fortify the heart against the attacks which Satan makes against us. The apostle explains this in 1 Thess. 5. 8. Putting on the breast-plate of faith and love. Faith and love include all Christian graces, and all the graces of our being are united to Christ, and by love to our brethren. These will infer a diligent observance of our duty to God; and a righteous deportment toward men, in all the offices of justice, truth, and charity.

[3.] Resolution must be as the greaves upon our legs; And their feet shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace, v. 15. Shoes, or greaves of brass, or the like, were formerly part of the military armour; (1 Sam. 17. 6,) the use of them was to defend their feet against the gall-traps, and sharp sticks, which were wont to be laid privily in the way, to obstruct the marching of the enemy; they who fell upon them being unfit to march. The preparation of the gospel of peace, signifies a prepared and resolved frame of heart, to adhere to the gospel, and abide by it; which will enable us to walk with victory, in all our way towards the religion, notwithstanding the difficulties and dangers that we may by it meet. It is styled the gospel of peace, because it brings all sorts of peace; peace with God, with ourselves, and with one another.

It may also be meant of that which prepares for the entertainment of the gospel; and that is repentance. With this our feet must be shod: for by living a life of repentance, we are armed against all temptations to sin, and the designs of our great enemy.

Dr. Whitby thinks this may be the sense of the words; That ye may be ready for the combat, be ye shod with the gospel of peace; or in order to secure from the peaceable and quiet mind which the gospel calls for. Be not easily provoked, or prone to quarrel; but shew all gentleness, and all long-suffering to all men; and this will as certainly preserve you from many great temptations and persecutions, as did those shoes of brass the soldiers from those gall-traps,* &c.
that, acted upon the grace of Christ, and improving that, quench not the darts of temptation. 7. Salvation must be our helmet; (v. 17.) that is, Hope, which has salvation for its object; so 1 Thess. 5. 8. The helmet secures the head. A good hope of salvation, well founded, and well built, will both purify the soul, and keep it from being defiled by Satan: and it will comfort the soul, and keep it from being troubled and tormented by Satan. He would tempt us to despair; but good hope keeps us trusting in God, and rejoicing in him.

[6.] The word of God is the sword of the Spirit. The sword is a very necessary and useful part of a soldier's furniture. The word of God is very necessary, and of great use to the Christian, in order to his maintaining, and his succeeding in, the spiritual warfare. It is called the sword of the Spirit, because it is of the Spirit's inditing; and he renders it efficacious and powerful, and sharper than a two-edged sword, (Heb. 4. 12.) and like that; with this we assault the assailants. Scripture-arguments are the most powerful arguments to repel a temptation with. Christ himself resisted Satan's temptations with, It is written, Matt. 4. 1, 2 &c. This, being hid in the heart, will preserve from sin, (Ps. 119. 11.) and will mortify and kill those lusts and corruptions that are latent there.

[7.] Prayer must be our other arm, and the other parts of our spiritual armour, Eph. 6. 14. v. 18. We must join prayer with all these graces, for our defence against these spiritual enemies; imploring help and assistance of God, as the case requires: and we must pray always. Not as though we were to do nothing else but pray; for there are other duties of religion, and of our respective stations in the world, that are to be done in their place and season: but we should keep up constant times of prayer, and be constant to them. We must pray upon all occasions, and as often as our own and others' necessities call us to it. We must always keep up a disposition to prayer; and should intermix ejaculatory prayers with our duties, and with common business. Though set and solemn prayer may sometimes be unserviceable, (as when other duties are to be done,) yet pious ejaculations cannot be so. We must pray with all prayer and supplication; with all kinds of prayer, public, private, secret and secret; solemn and sudden; with all the parts of prayer; confession of sin, petition for mercy, and thanksgivings for favours received. We must pray in the Spirit; our spirits must be employed in the duty; and we must do it by the grace of God's good Spirit. We must watch thereunto, endeavouring to keep our hearts in a praying frame; and take all occasions, and improve all opportunities, for thus we must watch to all the motions of our own hearts toward the duty. When God says, Seek ye me face; our hearts must comply, Ps. 27. 8. This we must do with all perseverance. We must abide by the duty of prayer, whatever change there may be in our outward circumstances; and we must continue in it as long as we live in the world. We must persevere in a particular prayer; not cutting it short, when our hearts are disposed to enlarge, and there is time for it, and our occasions call for it. We must likewise persevere in particular requests, notwithstanding some present discouragements and repulsions. And we must pray with supplication, not for ourselves only, but for all saints; for we are members one of another. Observe, None are so much saints, and in so good a condition in this world, but they need our prayers; and they ought to have them.

The apostle passes hence to the conclusion of the epistle.

And for me, that utterance may be given unto me, that I may open my mouth boldly, to make known the mystery of the gospel. 20. For which I am an ambassador in bonds; that therein I may speak boldly, as I ought to speak. 21. But that ye also may know my affairs, and how I do, Tychicus, a beloved brother and faithful minister in the Lord, shall make known to you all things: 22. Whom I have sent unto you for the same purpose, that ye might know our affairs, and that he might comfort your hearts. 23. Peace be to the brethren, and love with faith, from God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ. 24. Grace be with all them that love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity. Amen.

Here, I. He desires their prayers for him, v. 19. Having mentioned supplication for all saints, he puts himself into the number. We must pray for all saints; and particularly, for God's faithful ministers. Brethren, pray for us, that the word of the Lord may run and be glorified. Observe, what it is he would have them pray for in his behalf; thus utterance may be given unto me; that I may be enlarged from my present restraints, and so have liberty to propagate the faith of Christ; that I may have ability to express myself in a suitable and becoming manner, and that I may open my mouth boldly; that I may deliver the whole counsel of God, without any base fear, shame, or partiality.

To mark the meaning of the word of the Lord, some understand it of that part of the gospel which concerns the calling of the Gentiles, which had hitherto, as a mystery, been concealed. But the whole gospel was a mystery, till made known by divine revelation; and it is the work of Christ's ministers to publish it. Observe, St. Paul had a great command of language; they called him Mercury, because he was the chief speaker; (Acts 14. 12.) and yet we would have the mystery of the gospel. Some understand it of what he says, it is I that open the mouth, and my Spirit shall put words in my mouth. But this is a way of speaking, and not a real act of God; God only putting words into our mouths. Can it be supposed that the apostle should recommend an utterance which he could not have himself? He was a man of great courage, and often signalized himself for it; yet he would have them pray that God would give him boldness. He knew as well what to say as any man; yet he desires them to pray for him, that he may speak as he ought to speak. The argument with which he enforces his request, is, that for the sake of the gospel he was an ambassador in bonds, v. 20. He was persecuted and imprisoned for preaching the gospel; though, notwithstanding, he continued in the embassy committed to him by Christ; and persisted in preaching it. Observe, 1. It is no new thing for Christ's ministers to be in bonds. 2. It is a hard thing for them to speak boldly, when that is their case. And, lastly, The best and most eminent ministers have need of, and may receive advantage by, their prayers to God. As they are Christians, and therefore should earnestly desire them. Having thus desired their prayers, II. He recommends Tycheius unto them, v. 21. 22. He sent him with this epistle, that he might acquaint them with what other churches were informed of, that is, how he did, and what he did; how he was used by the Romans in his bonds; and how he beheld himself in his present circumstances. It is desirable to good ministers, both that their Christian friends should know their state, and likewise to be acquainted with the condition of their friends; for by this means they may the better help each other in their prayers. And that he might comfort their hearts: by giving such an account of.
their sufferings, of the cause of them, and of the temper of his mind, and his behaviour under them, as might prevent their fainting at his tribulations and even minister matter of joy and thanksgiving unto them. He tells them, that Tychicus was a beloved brother, and faithful minister in the Lord. He was a sincere Christian, and so a brother in Christ: he was a faithful minister in the work of Christ; and he was very dear to St. Paul: which makes his love to these Christian Ephesians the more observable, in that he should now part with so good and dear a friend for their sakes, when his company and conversation must have been peculiarly delightful and serviceable to himself. But the faithful servants of Jesus Christ are wont to prefer the public good to their own private or personal interests.

III. He concludes with his good wishes and prayers for them; and not for them only, but for all the brethren, v. 23, 24. His usual benediction was, grace and peace: here it is, Peace be to the brethren, and love with faith. By peace we are to understand all manner of peace; peace with God, peace with conscience, peace among themselves: and all outward prosperity is included in the word; as if he had said, "I wish the continuance and increase of all happiness to you." And love with faith. This in part explains what he means in the following verse by grace: not only grace in the fountain, or the love and favour of God; but grace in the streams, the grace of the Spirit flowing from that divine principle; faith and love including all the rest. It is the continuance and increase of these that he desires for them, in whom they were already begun. It follows, from God the Father, &c. All grace and blessings are derived to the saints from God, through the merit and intercession of Jesus Christ our Lord.

The closing benediction is more extensive than the former; for in this he prays for all true believers at Ephesus, and every where else. It is the undoubted character of all the saints, that they love our Lord Jesus Christ. Our love to Christ is not acceptable, unless it be in sincerity; indeed there is no such thing as love to Christ, whatever men may pretend, where there is not sincerity. The words may be read, Grace be with all them who love our Lord Jesus Christ in incorruption, who continue constant in their love to him, so as not to be corrupted out of it by any blots or seductions whatsoever; and whose love to him is uncorrupted by any opposite lust, or the love of any thing displeasing to him. Grace, that is, the favour of God, and all good, (spiritual and temporal,) that is, the product of it, is and shall be with all them who thus love our Lord Jesus Christ. And it is, or ought to be, the desire and prayer of every lover of Christ, that it may be so with all his fellow-Christians. Amen, so be it.

AN
WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS,
OF THE
EPISTLE OF ST. PAUL TO THE PHILIPPIANS.

Completed by Dr. W. Harris.

PHILIPPI was a chief city of the western part of Macedonia, πρὸ το ὁμήρος τῆς Μακεδονίας πόλις, Acts 16. 12. It took its name from Philip, the famous king of Macedon, who repaired and beautified it; and was afterward made a Roman colony. Near this place were the Campus Philippici, remarkable for the famous battles between Julius Caesar and Pompey the Great; and that between Augustus and Antony on one side, and Cassius and Brutus on the other. But it is most remarkable among Christians for this epistle, which was written when Paul was prisoner at Rome, A. D. 62.

St Paul seems to have had a very particular kindness for the church at Philippi, which he himself had been instrumental in planting; and though he had the care of all the churches, he had, upon that account, a particular fatherly tender care of this. Those whom God has employed us to do any good to, we should look upon ourselves both encouraged and engaged to study to do more good to. He locked upon them as his children, and, having begotten them by the gospel, he was desirous by the same gospel to nourish and nurse them up.

I. He was called in an extraordinary manner to preach the gospel at Philippi, Acts 16. 9. A vision appeared to Paul in the night; There stood a man of Macedonia, and prayed him, saying, Come over into Macedonia, and help us. He saw God going before him, and was encouraged to use all means for carrying on the good work which was begun among them, and building upon the foundation which was laid.
II. At Philippi he suffered hard things; he was scourged, and put into the stocks; (Acts 16. 35.) yet he had not the less kindness for the place for the hard usage he met with there. We must never love our friends the less for the ill treatment which our enemies give us.

III. The beginnings of that church were very small; Lydia was converted there, and the jailer, and a few more; yet that did not discourage him. If good be not done at first, it may be done afterward; and the last works may be more abundant. We must not be discouraged by small beginnings.

IV. It seems, by many passages in this epistle, that this church at Philippi grew into a flourishing church; and, particularly, was very kind to St. Paul. He had resented of their temporal things, and he made a return in spiritual things. He acknowledges the receipt of a present they had sent him, (ch. 4. 18.) and that when no church communicated with him as concerning giving and receiving besides; (v. 15.) and he gives them, "prophet's, an apostle's reward," in this epistle, which is of more value than thousands of gold and silver.

PHILIPPIANS, I.

CHAP. I.

He begins with the inscription and benediction, v. 1, 2. He gives thanks for the saints at Philippi, v. 3. 8. He speaks of his great affection and concern for their spiritual welfare, (v. 7, 8.) his prayers for them, (v. 9, 11.) his care to prevent their offence at his sufferings, (v. 12, 20.) his readiness to glorify Christ by life or death; (v. 21, 26.) and then concludes with a double exhortation to strictness and constancy, v. 27, 30.

1. Paul and Timotheus, the servants of Jesus Christ, to all the saints in Christ Jesus who are at Philippi, with the bishops and deacons: 2. Grace be unto you, and peace, from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ.

We have here the inscription and benediction, Observe,

I. The persons writing the epistle—Paul and Timotheus. Though Paul was alone divinely inspired, he joins Timothy with himself, to express his own humility, and put honour upon Timothy. They who are aged, and strong, and eminent, should pay respect to, and support the reputation of, those who are younger, and weaker, and of less note. The servants of Jesus Christ, not only in the common relation of his disciples, but in the peculiar work of the ministry, the high office of an apostle and evangelist. Observe, The highest honour of the greatest apostle, and most eminent ministers, is, to be the servants of Jesus Christ; not the masters of the churches, but the servants of Christ. Observe,

II. The persons to whom it is directed.

1. To all the saints in Christ who were at Philippi. He mentions the church before the ministers, because the ministers are for the church, and for their edification and benefit; not the churches for the ministers, and for their dignity, dominion, and wealth. Not that we have dominion over your faith, but are helpers of your joy, 2 Cor. 1. 24. They are not only the servants of Christ, but the servants of the church for his sake. Ourselves your servants for Jesus' sake, 2 Cor. 4, 5.

Observe, The Christians here are called saints; set apart for God, or sanctified by his Spirit, either by visible profession or real holiness. And they who are not really saints on earth, will never be saints in heaven. Observe, It is directed to all the saints, one as well as another, even the meanest, the poorest, and those of the least gifts. Christ makes no difference; the rich and the poor meet together in him; and the ministers must not make a difference in their care and tenderness upon these accounts. We must not have the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ with respect of persons, James 2. 1. Saints in Christ Jesus; saints are accepted only by virtue of their being in Christ Jesus, or as they are Christians. Out of Christ the best saints will appear sinners, and unable to stand before God.

2. It is directed to the ministers, or church-officers; with the bishops and deacons. The bishops or elders, in the first place, whose office it was to teach and rule; and the deacons, or overseers of the poor, who took care of the outward business of the house of God; the place, the furniture, the maintenance of the ministers, and provision for the poor. These were all the offices which were then known in the church, and which were of divine appointment. The apostle, in the direction of his epistle to a Christian church, acknowledges but two orders, which he calls bishops and deacons. And whosoever shall consider, that the same characters and titles, the same qualifications, the same acts of office, and the same honour and respect, are everywhere ascribed throughout the New Testament to those who are called bishops and presbyters, (as Dr. Hammond and other learned men allow,) will find it difficult to make them a different office or distinct order of ministry in the scripture times.

III. Here is the apostolical benediction, (v. 2.) Grace be unto you, and peace, from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ. This is the same, almost word for word, in all the epistles; to teach us, that we must not be shy of forms, though we are not to be tied down to them, especially such as are not scriptural. The only form in the Old Testament is that of a benediction, (Num. 6. 23-26.) On this wise ye shall bless the children of Israel, saying unto them, The Lord bless thee and keep thee: the Lord make his face shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee: the Lord lift up his light of his countenance upon thee, and give thee peace.

So in the New Testament, the good which is wished is spiritual good, grace and peace; the free favour and good-will of God; and all the blessed fruits and effects of it; and that from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ; jointly from them both, though in a different way. Observe, 1. No peace without grace. Inward peace springs from a sense of divine favour. 2. No grace and peace but from God our Father, the Fountain and Original of all blessings; the Father of lights, from whom cometh down every good and perfect gift, James 1. 17. 3. No grace and peace bestowed upon a Father, but in and through our Lord Jesus Christ. Christ, as Mediator, is the Channel of conveyance of all spiritual blessings to the church, and directs the disposal of them to all his members.

3. 1 thank my God upon every remembrance of you, 4. (Always in every prayer of mine for you all making request with joy. 5. For your fellowship in the gospel, from the first day until now. 6. Being confident of this very thing, that he which hath begun a good work in you will perform it until the day of Jesus Christ:

The apostle proceeds, after the inscription and benediction, to thanksgiving for the saints at Philippi. He tells them what it was he thanked God for, upon their account. Observe here,

I. Paul remembered them: he bore them much in his thoughts: and though they were out of sight, and were at a distance from him, yet they were not out of his mind: or, Upon every mention of you—upon every recollection of you. As he often thought of them, so he often spake of them, and delighted to hear them spoken of. They were a comfort to him: it was a pleasure to hear of the welfare of an absent friend.

II. He remembered them with joy. At Philippi he was evil entreated; there he was scourged and put into the stocks, and for the present saw little of the fruit of his labour; and yet he remembers Philippi with joy. He looked upon his sufferings for Christ as his credit, his comfort, his crown, and was pleased at every mention of the place where he suffered. He gives us no sign that he was ashamed of them, or loath to hear of the scene of his sufferings, that he remembered it with joy.

III. He remembered them in prayer; Always in every prayer of mine for you all, v. 4. The best remembrance of our friends, is, to remember them at the throne of grace. Paul was much in prayer for his friends, for all his friends, for these particularly. It should seem by this manner of expression, that in it, it formed at the throne of grace the several churches he was interested in, and concerned for, particularly and by name. He had seasons of prayer for the church at Philippi. God gives us leave to be thus free with him; though, for our comfort, he knows whom we mean, when we do not name them.

IV. He thanked God upon every joyful remembrance of them. Observe, Thanksgiving must have a particularity in it. We thank God not generally for what we know of, but matter of our rejoicing, ought to be the matter of our thanksgiving. What we have the comfort of, God must have the glory of. He thanked God, as well as much requests with joy. As holy joy is the heart and soul of thankful praise, so thankful praise is the lip and language of holy joy.

V. As in our prayers, so in our thanksgiving, we must pray and thank, for what we know of. If thanksgiving encourages us in prayer, and enlarges the heart in praise, to see every mercy coming from the hand of God, as our God. I thank my God upon every remembrance of you. We must thank our God for others' graces and comforts, and gifts and usefulness, as we receive the benefit of them, and God receives glory by them.

But what is the matter of this thanksgiving? 1. He thanks to God for the comfort he had in them; (v. 5.) for your fellowship in the gospel, from the first day until now. Observe, Gospel-fellowship is a good fellowship; and the meanest Christians have fellowship in the gospel with the greatest apostles; for the gospel salvation is a common salvation (Judg. 3.) and they obtain like previous faith with them. 2 Pet. 1. 1. They who sincerely receive and embrace the gospel, have fellowship with a first day: a new-born Christian, if he be true-born, is interested in all the promises and privileges of the gospel from the first day of his becoming such. Until now. Observe, It is a great comfort to ministers, when they who begin well, hold on and persevere.

Some, by their fellowship in the gospel, understand their liberality toward propagating of the gospel, and translate xarisis, not communication, but communion. But comparing it with Paul's thanksgiving on the account of other churches, it rather seems to be taken more generally, for the fellowship which they had, in faith and hope and holy love, with all good Christians: a fellowship in gospel promises, ordinances, privileges, and hopes; and this from the first day until now.

2. For the confidence he had concerning them; (v. 6.) Being confident of this very thing, &c. Observe, The confidence of Christians is the great comfort of Christians, and we may fetch matter of praise from our hopes as well as from our joys; we must give thanks not only for what we have the present possession and evidence of, but for what we have the future prospect of. Paul speaks with much confidence concerning the good estate of others, hoping well concerning them in the judgment of charity, and being confident in the judgment of faith, that if they were sincere they should be happy. That he who hath begun a good work in you, will perform it unto the day of Jesus Christ. A good work among you—begin, so may be read; understand it in the general, of the planting of the church among them. He who hath planted Christianity in the world, preserves it as long as the world stands. Christ will have a church till the mystery of God shall be finished, and the mystical body completed. The church is built upon a rock, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. But it is rather to be applied to particular persons, and then it speaks of the certain accomplishment of the work of grace wherever it is begun.

Observe here, (1.) The work of grace is a good work, a blessed work; for it makes us good, and is an earnest of good to us. It makes us like God, and fits us for the enjoyment of God. That may well be called a good work, which does us the greatest good.

(2.) Wherever this good work is begun, it is of God's beginning; He hath begun a good work in you. We could not begin it ourselves, for we are by nature dead in trespasses and sins: and what can dead men do toward raising themselves to life? or how can they begin to act, till they are enlivened in the same respect in which they are said to be dead? It is God who quickens them who are thus dead, Eph. 2. 1. Col. 2. 13.

(3.) The work of grace is but begun in this life; it is not finished here; as long as we are in this imperfect state, there is still something more to be done.

(4.) If the same God who begins the good work, did not undertake the carrying and finishing it, it would be for ever unfinished. He must perform it, who began it.

(5.) We may be confident, or well persuaded, that God not only will not forsake, but that he will finish and crown, the work of his own hands. For, as for God, his work is perfect.

(6.) The work of grace will never be perfected till the day of Jesus Christ, the day of his power, when he shall come to judge the world, and finish his mediation, then this work will be complete, and the top-stone will be brought forth with shouting. We have the same expression, v. 10.

7. Even as it is meet for me to think this of you all, because I have you in my heart: inasmuch as both in my bonds, and in the defence and confirmation of the gospel, ye all are partakers of my grace. 3. For God is my record, how greatly I long after you all in the bowels of Jesus Christ.
The apostle expresses the ardent affection he had for them, and his concern for their spiritual welfare; (v. 7.) I have you in my heart. He loved them as his own soul, and they lay near his heart. He thought much of them, and was in care about them.

1. Why he had them in his heart; Inasmuch as both in my bonds, and in the defence and confirmation of the gospel, we all are partakers of my grace; they had received benefit by him and by his ministry; they were partakers of that grace of God which by him, and through his hands, was communicated to them. This makes people dear to their ministers — they receiving benefit by their ministry. Or, "Ye are partakers of my grace, ye have joined with me in long and suffering." They were partakers of his affliction by sympathy and concern, and readiness to assist him. This he calls being partakers of his grace: for they who suffer with the saints, are, and shall be, comforted with them; and they shall share in the reward, who bear the part of the burden. He loved them because they adhered to him in his bonds, and in the defence and confirmation of the gospel. They were as ready to appear in their places, and according to their capacity, for the defence of the gospel, as the apostle was in his; and therefore he had them in his heart. Fellow-sufferers should be dear one to another; they who have ventured and suffered in the same good cause of God and religion, should for that reason love one another dearly; or, because you have me at heart—διεστεφάνων και διαθέσαντων ὑμᾶς τῷ κόσμῳ θαυμαστόν. They distinguished the respect to him, by adhering firmly to the doctrine he preached, and readily suffering for it along with him. The true mark of respect towards our ministers, is, receiving and abiding by the doctrine they preach.

2. The evidence of it; It is meet for me to think this of you all, because I have you in my heart. By this it appeared that he had them in his heart, because he had a good opinion of them, and good hopes concerning them. Observe, It is very proper to think the best of other people, and as well as we can of them; to suppose as well of them as the matter will admit in all cases.

3. An appeal to God concerning the truth of this; (v. 8.) For God is my record, how greatly I long after you all in the bowels of Jesus Christ: having them in his heart, he longed after them; either he longed after them, as a stinking sore; or he longed after them, and wished for more of them, as he wished for more of his word, which was as nourishment to him. He longed for their spiritual welfare, and their increase and improvement in knowledge and grace. He had joy in them, (v. 4.) because of the good he saw and heard of among them; yet still he longed after them, to hear more of it among them; and he longed after them all; not only those among them who were witty and wealthy, but even the meanest and poorest; and he longed greatly after them, or with strong desire of them. He was anxious for God's welfare. For to the example of Christ, Paul had a compassion for them, and longed after them all in the bowels of Jesus Christ, with that tender concern which Christ himself has, and has shewn to precious souls. Paul was herein a follower of Christ, and all good ministers should aim to be so. The bowels of compassion which are in Jesus Christ to poor souls! It was in compassion to them that he undertook their salvation, and put himself to so vast an experiment. That is so far from being fixed or stony, as to be of the same bowels of Christ. Shall we not pity and love those souls whom Christ had such a love and pity for? For this he appeals to God; God is my record. It was an inward disposition of mind that he expressed toward them, which God only was Witness to the sincerity of, and therefore to him he appeals. "Whether you know it or not, or are scabell a't or it, God, who knows the heart, knows it."
to give offence to God or their brethren; to live in all good conscience before God, (Acts 23. 1.) and to exercise ourselves to have always a conscience void of offence toward God and toward men, Acts 24. 16. And we must continue to the end blameless, that we may be presented so at the day of Christ. He will present the church without spot or wrinkle; (Eph. 5. 27.) and present believers faultless before the presence of his glory, with exceeding joy, Jude 14.

6. That they might be a fruitful, useful people; (v. 11.) Being filled with the fruits of righteousness, &c. From God is our fruit found, and therefore from him it must be asked. The fruits of righteousness are the evidences and effects of our sanctification; the duties of holiness springing from a renewed heart, the root of the matter in us; being filled with them. Observe, They who do much good, should still endeavour to do more. The fruits of righteousness, brought forth for the glory of God and edification of his church, should really fill us, and wholly take us up. Fear not being emptied by bringing forth the fruits of righteousness, for you will be filled with them. These fruits are by Jesus Christ, by his strength and grace, for without him we can do nothing. He is the Root of the good olive, from which it derives its fatness. We are strong in the grace which is in Christ Jesus, (2 Tim. 2. 1.) and strengthened with might by his Spirit; (Eph. 3. 16.) and they are unto the glory and praise of God. We must not aim at our own glory in our fruitfulness, but at the praise and glory of God; that God may be glorified in all things; (1 Pet. 4. 11.) and whatsoever we do, we must do all to the glory of God, 1 Cor. 10. 31. It is much for the honour of God, when Christians not only are good, but do good, and abound in good works.

12. But I would ye should understand, brethren, that the things which happened unto me have fallen out rather unto the furtherance of the gospel; 13. So that my bonds in Christ are manifest in all the palace, and in all other places; 14. And many of the brethren in the Lord, waxing confident by my bonds, are much more bold to speak the word without fear. 15. Some indeed preach Christ even of envy and strife; and some also of good-will. 16. The one preach Christ of contention, not sincerely, supposing to add affliction to my bonds: 17. But the other of love, knowing that I am set for the defence of the gospel.

18. What then? Notwithstanding, every way, whether in pretence or in truth, Christ is preached; and I therein do rejoice, yea, and will rejoice. 19. For I know that this shall turn to my salvation through your prayer, and the supply of the Spirit of Jesus Christ, 20. According to my earnest expectation and my hope, that in nothing I shall be ashamed, but that with all boldness, as always, so now also Christ shall be magnified in my body, whether it be by life, or by death.

We see here the care the apostle takes to prevent their being offended at his sufferings. He was now a prisoner at Rome; this might be a stumbling-block to those who had received the gospel by his minis-

Try. They might be tempted to think, If this doctrine was indeed of God, God would not suffer one who was so active and instrumental in preaching and propagating it, to be thrown by as a despised broken vessel. They might be shy of owning this doctrine, lest they should be involved in the same trouble themselves. Now, to take off the office of the cross, he expands this dark and hard chapter of his sufferings, and makes it very easy, intelligible, and reconcilable to the wisdom and goodness of God who employed him.

1. He suffered by the sworn enemies of the gospel, who laid him in prison, and aimed at taking away his life; but they should not be stilled at this, for good was brought out of it, and it tended to the furtherance of the gospel; (v. 12.) The things which happened unto me, have fallen out rather unto the furtherance of the gospel. A strange chemistry of Providence this, to extract so great a good out of so great an evil, as the enlargement of the gospel by the confinement of the apostle. I suffer trouble as an evil-doer, even unto bonds; but the word of God is not bound, 2 Tim. 2. 9. They cannot imprison the word of God; that has its free course, though I am confined. But how was this?

1. It alarmed those who were without; (v. 13.) "My bonds in Christ, or for Christ, are manifest in all the palace, and in all other places. The emperor, the courtiers, the magistrates, are convinced that I do not suffer as a sinner, but as a saint, with a good conscience. They know that I suffer for Christ, and not for any wickedness." Observe, (1.) Paul's sufferings made him known at court, where perhaps he would never have otherwise been known; and might lead some of them to inquire after the gospel for which he suffered, which they might otherwise have never heard of. (2.) When his bonds were manifest in the palace, they were manifest in all other places. The weight of the court have a great influence on the sentiments of all people—Regin ad exemplum totus componitur orbis.

2. It imboldened them who were within. As his enemies were startled at them, so his friends were heartened by them. Upright men shall be astonished at this, and the innocent shall stir up himself against the hypocrite. The righteous also shall hold on his way, and he who hath clean hands shall be stronger and stronger, Job 17. 8. 9. So it was here; (v. 14.) Many of the brethren in the Lord waxing confident by my bonds. The expectation of trouble for their religion, in general, perhaps disheartened and discouraged them; but when they saw Paul imprisoned for Christ, they were so far from being deterred from preaching Christ, and praising his name, that it made them the more bold; for they could gloriilly suffer in Paul's conquering. If they should be hurried from the pulpit to the prison, they could be reconciled to it, because they would be there in such good company. Besides, the comfort which Paul had in his sufferings, his extraordinary consolations received from Christ in a suffering state, greatly encouraged them. They saw that they who served Christ, served a good Master, who had both both his hands and feet, and became their sufferings for him. Waxing confident by my bonds. Paxiv. They were more fully satisfied and persuaded by what they saw. Observe the power of divine grace; that which was intended by the enemy to discourage the preachers of the gospel, was over-ruled for their encouragement. And are much more bold to speak the word without fear; they see no worse than the apostle, the kingdom of heaven is at hand. Their confidence gave them courage, and their courage preserved them from the power of fear.

II. Paul suffered from false friends as well as from enemies; (v. 15. 16.) Some preach Christ even of enjoy turns to our salvation, is by the supply of the aids and assistance of the Spirit of Christ; and prayer is the appointed means of fetching in that supply. The prayers of the people may bring a supply of the Spirit to their ministers, to enable them in suffering, as well as preaching the gospel.

2. Because it would turn to the glory of Christ; (v. 26.) where he takes occasion to mention his own entire devotedness to the service and honour of Christ. According to my earnest expectation and hope, that in nothing I shall be ashamed, &c. Here observe,

(1.) The great desire of every true Christian is, that Christ may be magnified and glorified; that his name may be great, and his kingdom come.

(2.) They who truly desire that Christ may be magnified, desire that he may be magnified in their body. They present their bodies a living sacrifice, (Rom. 12. 1.) and yield their members as instruments of righteousness unto God, Rom. 6. 13. They are willing to serve his designs, and be instrumental to his glory, with every member of their body, as well as faculty of their souls.

(3.) If it be to avoid the glory of Christ, that we should serve him boldly, and not be ashamed of him, with freedom and liberty of mind, and without discouragement. That in nothing I shall be ashamed, but that with all boldness Christ may be magnified. The boldness of Christians is the honour of Christ.

(4.) They who make Christ's glory their desire and design, may make it their expectation and hope. If it be truly aimed at, it shall certainly be attained. If, in sincerity we pray, Father, glorify thy name, we may be sure of the same answer to that prayer which Christ had; I have glorified it, and I will glorify it again, John 12. 26.

(5.) They who desire Christ may be magnified in their bodies, have a holy indifference whether it be by life or by death. They refer it to him, which way he will make them serviceable to his glory, whether by their labour or suffering; by their diligence or patience; by their living to his honour in working for him, or dying to his honour in suffering for him.

21. For to me to live is Christ, and to die is gain. But if I live in the flesh, this is the fruit of my labour: yet what I shall choose I wot not. For I am in a strait betwixt two, having a desire to depart, and to be with Christ; which is far better: Nevertheless to abide in the flesh is more needful for you. 25. And having this confidence, I know that I shall abide and continue with you all for your furtherance and joy of faith; 26. That your rejoicing may be more abundant in Jesus Christ for me by my coming to you again.

We have here an account of the life and death of blessed Paul: his life was Christ, and his death was gain. Observe, 1. It is the undoubted character of every good Christian, that to him to live is Christ. The glory of Christ ought to be the end of our life, the grace of Christ the principle of our life, and the word of Christ the rule of it. The Christian life is derived from Christ, and directed to him. He is the Principle, Rule, and End of it. 2. All those to whom to live is Christ, to them to die will be gain: it is great gain, a present gain, everlasting gain. Life is a great loss to a Christian man for, he loses all his comforts and all his hopes: but to a good Christian it is gain, for it is the end of all his weakness and misery, and the perfection of his comforts, and accomplishment of his hopes: it delivers him from all the evils of life, and brings him to the possession of the chiefest good. Or, To me to die is gain, that is, "to the gospel as well as to myself, which will receive a further confirmation by the account of his life to be given by the labours of my life." So Christ would be magnified by his death, v. 20. Some read the whole expression thus; To me, living and dying, Christ is gain; "I desire no more, neither while I live nor when I die, but to win Christ and be found in him."

It might be thought, if death was gain to him, he would be weary of life, and impatient for death. N. B. says he, (v. 22.) For in life as in the flesh, this is the fruit of my labour—exp: ipse—observe pretern. It is worth while for a good Christian and a good minister to live in the world, as long as he can glorify God and do good to his church. Yet what I shall choose I know not. This was an organic and voluntary act of his own will, and so it is to him. This was a blessed stratagem which Paul was in, not between two evil things, but between two good things. David was in a strait by three judgments—sword, famine, and pestilence: Paul was in a strait between two blessings—living to Christ, and being with him. Here we have him reasoning with himself upon the matter.

His inclination was for death. See the power of faith and of divine grace; it can reconcile the mind to death, and make us willing to die, though death is the destruction of our present nature, and the greatest natural evil. We have naturally an aversion to death, but he had an inclination to it; (v. 23.) having a desire to depart, and to be with Christ. Observe, 1. It is being with Christ, which makes a departure desirable to a good man. It is not simply dying, or putting off the body; it is not of itself and for its own sake a desirable thing; but it may be necessarily connected with something else, which may make it truly so. If I cannot be with Christ without departing, I shall reckon it desirable on that account to depart. Observe, 2. As soon as ever the soul departs, it is immediately with Christ. This day shall thou be with me in paradise, Luke 23. 43. Absent from the body, and present with the Lord. 2. Cor. v. 8. So much more is our condition in this world, Which is far better, μετ' αυτοῦ παρακολουθεῖν ααίνων—very much exceeding, or vastly preferable. They who know the value of Christ and heaven, will readily acknowledge it far better to be in heaven than to be in this world, to be with Christ than to be with any creature; for in this world we are compassed about with sin, born to trouble, born again to it: but if we come to be with Christ, farewell sin and temptation, far better to dwell in death, than to die in the midst of life.

II. His judgment was rather to live a while longer in this world, for the service of the church; (v. 24.) Nevertheless to abide in the flesh is more needful for you. It is needful for the church to have ministers; and faithful ministers can ill be spared, when the harvest is plentiful and the labourers few. Observe, They who have most reason to desire to depart, should also, for Love in a strait, fear more the need as long as God has any work for them to do. Paul's strait was not between living in this world and living in heaven; between these two there is no comparison: but his strait was between serving Christ in this world and enjoying him in another. Still it was Christ that his heart was upon: though, to advance the interest of Christ and his church, he chose rather to tarry here, where he met with oppositions and difficulties, and to deny himself for a while the satisfaction of his reward.

And having this confidence, I know that I shall able and continue with you all for your furtherance and joy of faith. v. 25. Observe here, 1. What a great confidence Paul had in the Divine Providence, that it would order all for the best to him. "Having this confidence, that it will be needful for you that I should abide in the flesh, I know that I shall abide." 2. Whatsoever is best for the church, we may be sure God will do. If we know what is needful for building up the body of Christ, we may certainly know what will be; for he will take care of its interests, and do what is best, all things considered, in every condition it is in. 3. Observe what ministers are concerned for: for our furtherance and joy of faith, our furtherance and comfort, 4. What promotes our faith and joy of faith, is very much for our furtherance in the way to heaven. The more faith, the more joy, and the more faith and joy, the more we are furthered in our Christian course. 5. There is need of a settled ministry, not only for the conviction and conversion of sinners, but for the edification of saints, and their furtherance in spiritual attainments. That your rejoicing may be more abundant in Jesus Christ for me, by my coming to you again, v. 26. They rejoice in the hopes of seeing him, and enjoying his further labours among them. Observe, (1.) The continuance of ministers with the church, ought to be the rejoicing of all who wish well to the church, and to its interests. (2.) All our joys should terminate in Christ. Our joy in good ministers should be for their sake in Christ Jesus; and as for them, they are but the friends of the Bridegroom, and are to be received in his name, and for his sake.

27. Only let your conversation be as it becometh the gospel of Christ; that, whether I come and see you, or else be absent, I may hear of your affairs, that ye stand fast in one spirit, with one mind, striving together for the faith of the gospel. 28. And in nothing terrified by your adversaries, which is to them an evident token of perdition, but to you of salvation, and that of God. 29. For unto you it is given in the behalf of Christ, not only to believe on him, but also to suffer for his sake; 30. Having the same conflict which we saw in me, and now hear to be in me.

The apostle concludes the chapter with two exhortations.

I. He exhorts them to strictness of conversation; (v. 27.) Only let your conversation be as it becometh the gospel of Christ. Observe, They who profess the gospel of Christ, should have their conversation as becomes the gospel, or in a suitableness and agreeableness to it. Let it be as becomes those who believe gospel-truths, submit to gospel-laws, and depend upon gospel-promises; and with an answerable faith, holiness, and comfort. Let it be in all respects as those who belong to the kingdom of God should be, and are, and have been in the church of God. It is an ornament to our profession, when our conversation is of a piece with it. That whether I come and see you, or else be absent, I may hear of your affairs. He had spoken in v. 26. of his coming to them again, and had spoken it with some assurance, though he was now a prisoner; but he would not have them build upon that. Our religion must not be bound up in the hands of our ministers; "Whether I come or no, let me hear well of you, and do you stand fast." Whether ministers come or no, Christ is always at hand. He is nigh to us, never far from us; and hastens his second coming; the PHILIPPIANS, II.

This page contains a continuation of the text discussing the apostle Paul's letter to the Philippians, covering material from 1:27 to 2:10. The text is primarily in the King James Version, a key historical translation of the New Testament. The content involves a discussion on the necessity of suffering for the sake of Christ, the importance of steadfastness, and the communal life of believers. The page highlights themes like unity, suffering for the gospel, and the value of the cross of Jesus Christ. This segment is part of a larger exposition on the righteousness of faith, the importance of obedience, and the importance of inner transformation in the life of a believer.

1. If there be therefore any consolation in Christ, if any comfort of love, if any fellowship of the Spirit, if any bowels and mercies, 2. Fulfil ye my joy, that ye may be like-minded, having the same love, being of one accord, of one mind. 3. Let nothing be done through strife or vain-glory; but in lowliness of mind let each esteem other better than themselves. 4. Look not every man on his own things, but every man also on the things of others. 5. Let this mind be in you, which was also in Christ Jesus: 6. Who, being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God: 7. But made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men: 8. And being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross. 9. Wherefore God also hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name: 10. That at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth; 11. And that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father.

The apostle proceeds to further exhortations to several duties, to be like-minded, and to walk in the same manner as the example of the Lord Jesus, the great Pattern of humility and love. Where we may observe,

1. The great gospel-precept pressed upon us; that is, to love one another. This is the law of Christ's kingdom, the lesson of his school, the liveliness of his family. This he represents, (v. 2.) by being like-minded, having the same love, being of one accord, of one mind. We are of a like mind when we have the same love. Christians should be one in affection, whether they can be one in apprehension or no. This is always in their power, and always their duty, and is the likeliest way to bring them nearer in judgment. Having the same love. Observe, The same love that we are required to express to others, others are obliged to express to us. Christian love ought to be mutual love. Love, and you shall be loved. Being of one accord, and of one mind; not crossing and thwarting, or driving on separate interests; but unanimously agreeing in the great things of God, and keeping the unity of the Spirit in all other differences. Here observe,

1. The pathetic pressing of the duty. He is very importunate with them, knowing what an evidence it is of our sincerity, and what a means of the preservation and edification of the body of Christ. The inducements to brotherly love are these:

(1.) "If there is any consolation in Christ. Have you experienced consolation in Christ? Evidence that experience by loving one another. The goodness you have died to the earth, Christ should sweeten our spirits. Do we expect consolation in Christ? If we would not be disappointed, we must love one another. If we have not consolation in Christ, where else can we expect it? They who have an interest in Christ, have consolation in him; strong and everlasting consolation; (Heb. 6. 18. 2 Thess. 2. 16.) and therefore ought to love one another.

(2.) Comfort of love. If there is any comfort in Christian love, in God's love to you, in your love to God, or in your brethren's love to us, in consideration of all this, be ye like-minded. If ye have ever found that comfort, if ye would find it, if ye indeed believe that the grace of love is a comfortable grace, abound in it.

(3.) "Fellowship of the Spirit. If there is such a thing as communion with God and Christ by the Spirit, such a thing as the communion of saints, by virtue of their being animated and actuated by one and the same Spirit; be ye like-minded: for Christian love and like-mindedness will preserve to us our communion with God, and with one another."

(4.) "Any bounties and mercies, in God and Christ, toward you. If ye expect the benefit of God's compassion to yourselves, be ye compassionate one to another. If there is such a thing as charity, it may be found in God and Christ, if all who are sanctified have a disposition to holy pity; make it appear this way."

Another argument he insinuates, is the comfort it would be to him; "fulfil ye my joy. It is the joy of ministers to see people like-minded, and living in love. He had been instrumental in bringing them to peace with God. The love of God became so great a part of his nature that he says, "if ye have found any benefit by your participation of the gospel of Christ, if ye have any comfort in it, or advantage by it, "fulfil the joy of your poor minister who preached the gospel to you." 2. He proposes some means to promote it.

(1.) Do nothing through strife and vain-glory, v. 3. There is no greater enemy to Christian love than pride and passion. If we do things in contradiction to one another, they are more than through strife; if we do them through ostentation of ourselves, that is, doing them through vain-glory; both are destructive of Christian love, and kindle unchristian heats. Christ came to slay all enmities; therefore let there be not among Christians a spirit of opposition. Christ came to humble us, and therefore let there be not among us a spirit of pride.

(2.) We must esteem others in lowliness of mind better than ourselves; be severe upon our own faults, and charitable in our judgment of others; be quick in observing our own defects and infirmities, but ready to overlook, and make favourable allowances for, the defects of others. We must esteem the good which is in others above that which is in ourselves; for we best know our own unworthiness and imperfections.

(3.) We must interest ourselves in the concerns of others, not in a way of curiosity and censurableness, or as busy-bodies in other men's matters, but in Christian love and sympathy; (v. 4.) Look not every man on his own things, but every man also on the things of others. A selfish spirit is destructive of Christian love. We must be concerned not only for our own credit, and ease, and safety, but for those of others also; and rejoice in the prosperity of others, as truly as in our own. We must love our neighbour as ourselves, and make his case our own.

II. Here is a gospel-pattern proposed to our imitation, and that is the example of our Lord Jesus

(1.) His estate of humiliation. He not only took upon him the likeness and fashion of a man, but the form of a servant, that is, a man of mean estate.
He was not only God's Servant whom he had chosen, but he came to minister to men, and was among them as one who serveth in a mean and servile state. One would think that the Lord Jesus, if he would be a Man, should have been a Prince, and appeared in the likeness of a man. But quite the contrary; he took upon him the form of a servant. He was brought up meanly, probably working with his supposed father at his trade. His whole life was a life of humiliation, meanness, poverty, and disgrace; he had not where to lay his head, lived upon alms, was a Man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief; did not appear with external pomp, or any marks of distinction from other men. This was the humiliation of his life, and the lowest step of his exaltation. While dying the death of the cross; He became obedient to death, even the death of the cross. He not only suffered, but was actually and voluntarily obedient; he obeyed the law which he brought himself under as Mediator, and by which he was obliged to die; I have power to lay down my life, and I have power to take it again: this commandment have I received of my Father, John 10. 18. And he was made under the law, Gal. 4. 4. There is an emphasis laid upon the manner of his dying, which had in it all the circumstances possible which are humbling; even the death of the cross, a cursed, painful, and shameful death; a death accursed by the law; Curset is he that hangeth on a tree: full of pain, the body nailed through the nervous parts, (the hands and feet,) and hanging with all its weight upon the cross; and the death of a malefactor and a slave, not of a free-man; exhibited as a public spectacle. Such was the condescension of the blessed Jesus.

(2.) His exaltation; Wherefore God also hath highly exalted him. His exaltation was the reward of his humiliation; because he humbled himself, God exalted him; and he highly exalted him, σωιησας, raised him to an exceeding height. He exalted his whole Person, the human nature as well as the divine; for he is spoken of as being in the form of God, as well as in the fashion of a man. As it respects the divine nature, it could only be a recognizing his rights, or the display and appearance of the glory he had with the Father before the world was; (John 17. 5.) not any new acquisition of glory; and so the Father himself is said to be exalted. But the proper exaltation was of his human nature, which alone seems to be capable of it, though in conjunction with the divine. His exaltation here is made to consist in being elevated; and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord; every nation and language should publicly own the universal empire of the exalted Redeemer; and that all power in heaven and earth is given to him, Matt. 28. 18. Observe the vast extent of the kingdom of Christ; it reaches to heaven and earth, and to all the creatures in each; to angels as well as men, and to the dead as well as the living. It is the majesty of God the Father. Observe, It is to the glory of God the Father, that Jesus Christ is Lord; for it is his will, that all men should honour the Son as they honour the Father, John 5. 23. Whatever respect is paid to Christ, redounds to the honour of the Father; He who receiveth me, receiveth him who sent me, Matt. 10. 40.

12. Wherefore, my beloved, as ye have always obeyed, not as in my presence only, but now much more in my absence, work out your own salvation with fear and trembling: For it is God who worketh in you both to will and to do of his good pleasure.

He exHORTs them to diligence and seriousness in the Christian course; Work out your own salvation. It is the salvation of our souls, (1 Pet. 1. 9,) and our eternal salvation, (Heb. 5. 9,) and contains deliverance from all the evils sin had brought upon us, and exposed us to; and the possession of all good, and whatsoever is necessary to our complete and final happiness. Observe, It concerns us above all things to secure the wealth and happiness that becomes of other things, let us take care of our best interests. It is our own salvation, the salvation of our souls. It is not for us to judge other people, we have enough to do to look to ourselves; and though we must promote the common salvation, (Jude 3,) as much as we can, yet we must upon no account neglect our own. We are required to work out our salvation, (Phil. 2. 12,) The word signifies working as if we had a thing, and that we might not become enemies of one another; work out our salvation, that we might not become enemies of one another. Observe, We must be diligent in the use of all the means which conduct to our salvation. We must not only work at our salvation, by doing something new and then about it; but we must work out our salvation, by doing all that is to be done, and persevering therein to the end. Salvation is the great thing we should mind, and set our hearts upon; and we cannot attain salvation without the most care and diligence. He adds, With fear and trembling, that is, with great care and circumspection; "Tremble for fear lest you miscarry and come short. Be careful to do every thing in religion in the best manner; and fear lest under all your advantages you should so much, as seem to come short," Heb. 4. 1. Fear is a great guard and preservative from evil. He urges this from the consideration of their readiness always to obey the gospel; "As we have always obeyed, not as in my presence only, but now much more in my absence, v. 12. Ye have been always willing to comply with every discovery of the will of God; and that in my absence as well as presence. Ye make it appear, that regard to Christ, and care of your souls, sway more with you than any other mode of shewing respect whatsoever." They were not merely awed by the apostle's presence, but did it even much more in his absence. "And because it is God who worketh in you, do ye work out your salvation; for it is God who worketh in you. Work, for he worketh." It should encourage us to do our utmost, because our labour shall not be in vain. God is ready to concur with his grace, and assist our faithful endeavours. Observe, Though we must use our utmost endeavours in working out our salvation, yet we shall never work out our salvation, in the sense of doing all that could be done, and go on, in a way to promote the grace of God. His grace works in us in a way suitable to our nature, and in concurrence with our endeavours; and the operations of God's grace in us are so far from excusing, that they are intended to quicken and engage, our endeavours. And work out your salvation with fear and trembling, for he worketh in you. All our working depends upon his working in us. Do not say with God, (Isa. 64. 7,) You have not wrought all our works in us. Thou hast wrought all our works in us, Isa. 26. 12. Of his good pleasure. As there is no strength in us, so there is no merit in us. As we cannot act without God's grace, so we cannot claim it, or pretend to deserve it. God's good will to us is the cause of his good work in us; and he is under no engagements to his creatures, but those of his gracious promise.

14. Do all things without murmuring and disputings; 15. That ye may be blameless and harmless, the sons of God, without rebuke, in the midst of a crooked and perverse nation; among whom ye shine as lights in the world: 16. Holding forth the word of life; that I may rejoice in the day of Christ, that I have not run in vain, neither laboured in vain. 17. Yea, and if I be offered upon the sacrifice and service of your faith, I joy, and rejoice with you all. 18. For the same cause also do ye joy, and rejoice with me.

The apostle exhorts them in these verses to adorn their Christian profession by a suitable temper and behaviour several things. 1. By a cheerful obedience to the commands of God; (v. 14.) "Do all things, do your duty in every branch of it, without murmuring. Do it, and do not find fault with it. Mind your work, and do not quarrel with it." God's commands were given to be obeyed, not to be disputed. This greatly adorns our profession, and shews we serve a good Master, whose service is freedom, and whose work is its own reward. 2. By peaceableness, and love one to another. "Do all things without disputings, wrangling, and debating one with another; because the light of truth and the life of religion are often lost in the heats and mists of disputation. 3. By a blameless conversation towards all men; (v. 15.) "That ye may be blameless and harmless, the sons of God, without rebuke; that ye be not injurious to any in word or deed, and give no just occasion of offence." We should endeavour not only to be harmless, but to be blameless; not only not to do hurt, but not to come under the just suspicion of it. Blameless and sincere; so some read it. Blameless before men, sincere toward God. The sons of God. It becomes them to be blameless and harmless, who stand in such a relation, and are favoured with such a privilege. The children of God should differ from the sons of men. Without reproach. Moment was a carpenter among the Greeks, mentioned by Hesiod and Lucian, who did nothing himself, and found fault with every body and every thing. From him all carpers at other men, and rigid censurers of their works, were called Momi. The sense of the expression is, "Walk so circumspectly, that Moment himself may have no occasion to cavil at you, that the severest censurer may find no fault with you." We should aim at it, and endeavour it, not only to get to heaven, but to get thither without a blot; and, like Demetrius, to have a good report of all men, and of the truth, 3 John 12. In the midst of a crooked and perverse generation; that is, among the heathens, and those who are without. Observe, Where there is no true religion, little is to be expected but crookedness and perverseness; and the more crooked and perverse others are, among whom we live, and the more apt to cavil, the more careful we should be to keep ourselves blameless and harmless. Abraham and Lot must not strive, because the Canaanite and Pe- rizzite dwelt in the land, Gen. 13. 7. Among whom ye shine as lights in the world. Christ is the Light of the world, and good Christians are lights in the world. When God raises up a good man in any place, he sets up a light in that place. Of this there may be read immaturely; Among whom shine ye as lights: Compare Matt. 5. 16. Let your light so shine before men. Christians should endeavour not only to approve themselves to God, but to recommend themselves to others, that they may also glorify God. They must shine as well as be sincere.

Hold forth the word of life, v. 16. The gospel is called the word of life, because it reveals light, and proposes to us eternal life through Jesus Christ. Life and immortality are brought to light by the gospel, 2 Tim. 1. 10. It is our duty not only to hold fast, but to hold forth, the word of life; not only to hold it fast for our own benefit, but to hold it forth for the benefit of others; to hold it forth, as the candlestick holds forth the candle, which makes it appear to advantage all round, or as the luminaries of the heavens, which shed their influence far and wide. This Paul tells them would be his joy; that I may rejoice in the day of Christ; not only rejoice in your steadfastness, but in your usefulness. He would have them think his pains well bestowed, and that he had not run in vain, nor laboured in vain.

Observe, (1.) The work of the ministry requires the putting forth of the whole man; all that is within us is little enough, if we are not industrious in preaching and labouring. Running denotes vehemence and vigour, and continual pressing forward; labouring denotes constancy, and close application. (2.) It is a great joy to ministers, when they perceive that they have not run in vain, nor laboured in vain; and it will be their rejoicing in the day of Christ, when their converts will be their crown. What is one hope, or joy, or crown of rejoicing? Are not even ye in the presence of our Lord Jesus Christ at his coming? For ye are our glory and joy. 1 Thess. 2. 19. The apostle not only ran and laboured for them with satisfaction, but shews that he was ready to suffer for their good; (v. 17.) "Yea, and if I be offered upon the sacrifice and service of your faith; I joy and rejoice with you all. He could reckon himself happy, if he could promote the honour of Christ, the perfection of the church, and the welfare of the souls of men; though it were not only by hazard, but by laying down, his life: he could willingly be a sacrifice at their altars, to serve the fame of God's elect. Could Paul think it worth while to shed his blood for the service of the church; and shall we think much to take a little pains? Is not that worth our labour, which he thought worth his life? If I be saved, or poured out as the wine of the drink-offerings, matt. 2. 14. 6. I am now ready to be offered. He could rejoice to seal his doctrine with his blood; (v. 18.) For the same cause also do ye joy and rejoice with me. It is the will of God that good Christians should be much in rejoicing; and they who are happy in good ministers, have a great deal of reason to joy and rejoice with them. If the minister loves the people, and is willing to spend and be spent for their welfare, the people have reason to love the minister, and to joy and rejoice with him.

19. But I trust in the Lord Jesus to send Timotheus shortly unto you, that I also may be of good comfort when I know your state. 20. For I have no man like-minded, who will naturally care for your state. 21. For all seek their own, not the things which are Jesus Christ's. 22. But ye know the proof of him, that, as a son with the father, he hath served me with the gospel. 23. Him therefore I hope to send presently, so soon as I shall see how it will go with me. 24. But I trust in the Lord that I also my self shall come shortly. 25. Yet I supposed it necessary to send to you Epaphroditus, my brother, and companion in labour, and fellow-soldier, but your messenger, and him that ministered to my wants. 26. For he longed after you all, and was full of heaviness, because that ye had heard that he had been sick. 27. For indeed he was sick, nigh unto death: but God had mercy on him; and not on him only, but on me also, lest I should have sorrow upon sorrow. 28. I sent him therefore the more carefully, that when ye see him again, ye may rejoice, and that I may be the less sorrowful. 29. Receive him therefore in the Lord with all gladness; and hold such in reputation: 30. Because for the work of Christ he was nigh unto death, not regarding his life, to supply your lack of service toward me.

St. Paul takes particular notice of two good ministers; for though he was himself a great apostle, and laboured more abundantly than they all, yet he took all occasions to speak with respect of those who were far his inferiors.

I. He speaks of Timothy, whom he intended to send to the Philippians, that he might have an account of their state. See Paul's care of the churches, and the comfort he had in their well-doing. He was in pain, when he had not heard of them a good while, and therefore would send Timothy to inquire, and bring him an account; For I have no man like-minded, who will naturally care for your state. Timothy was a non-sucho. There were, no doubt, many good ministers, who were in care for the souls of those for whom they preached; but none comparable to Timothy; a man of an excellent spirit and tender heart; who will naturally care for your state. Observe, it is best with us, when our duty becomes a natural matter to us. Timothy was a genuine son of blessed Paul, and walked in the same spirit and the same steps. Naturally, that is, sincerely, and not in pretence only: with a willing heart and upright view, so agreeably to the make of his mind. Note, 1. It is the duty of ministers to care for the state of their people, and be concerned for their welfare; I seek not your's, but you, 2 Cor. 12. 14. 2. It is a rare thing to find one who does it naturally: such a one is remarkable, and distinguished among his brethren.

All seek their own, not the things which are Jesus Christ's, v. 21. Did Paul say this in haste, as David said, All men are liars? Ps. 116. 11. Was there so general a corruption among ministers so early, that there was not one among them, who cared for the state of their people? We must not understand it so, he means not that they did not care, or all in comparison of Timothy. Note, Seeking his own interest, with the neglect of Jesus Christ, is a very great sin, and very common among Christians and ministers. We are apt to prefer our own credit, ease, and safety, before truth, holiness, and duty; the things of our own pleasure and reputation before the things of Christ's kingdom, and his honour and interest in the world: but Timothy was none of those.

Ye know the proof of him, v. 22. Timothy was a man who had been tried, and had made full proff of his ministry, (2 Tim. 3. 5.) and was faithful in all which betell him. All the churches with whom he had acquaintance, knew the proof of him. He was a man of good as he seemed to be; and made Christ so as to be acceptable to God, and approved of men, Rom. 14. 18. "Ye not only know the name of him, and the face of him, but the proof of him, and have experienced his affection and fidelity in your service: that, as a son with a father, he hath served me in the gospel." He was Paul's assistant in many places where he preached, and served with him in the gospel with the utmost respect with which a child serves a father, and with all the love and cheerfulness with which a child is serviceable to his father. Their ministrations together were with great respect on the one side, and great tenderness and kindness on the other.—An admirable example to elder and younger ministers, joined together in the same service.

Paul designed to send him shortly; Him therefore I hope to send presently, as soon as I shall see how it will go with me, v. 23. He was now a prisoner, and did not know what would be the issue; but, according as it turned, he would dispose of Timothy. Nay, he hoped to come himself; (v. 24.) But I trust in the Lord, that I also myself shall come shortly. He hoped he should soon be set at liberty, and be able to give them a visit. Paul desired his liberty, not that he might take his pleasure, but that he might be better able to serve his Master. I trust in the Lord, v. 24. His hope and confidence of seeing them, with a humble dependence and submission to the divine will; (1 Cor. 4. 19.) But I will come to you shortly, if the Lord will, James 4. 15. For that ye ought to say, If the Lord will, we shall live, or do this and that; so Acts 18. 21. and Heb. 6. 3.

II. Concerning Epaphroditus, whom he calls his brother, and companion in labour, and fellow-soldier, a Christian brother, to whom he bore a tender affection, his companion in the work and sufferings of the gospel, who submitted to the same labours and hardships with himself,—and their messenger, one who was sent by them to him; probably, to consult him about some affairs relating to their church, or to bring a present from them for his relief; for he adds, and him who ministered to my wants. He seems to be the same who is elsewhere called Epaphras, Col. 4. 12. He had an acquaintance with them, and Paul was willing he should. It seems,

1. Epaphroditus had been sick; They had heard that he had been sick, v. 26. And indeed he was sick nigh unto death, v. 27. Sickness is a calamity common to men, to good men and ministers. But why did not the apostle heal him, who was indured with a power of curing diseases, as well as raising the dead? Acts 10. 10. Probably, because that was intended as a sign to others, and to confirm the truth of the gospel, and therefore needed not to be exercised one towards another. These signs shall follow them who believe; they shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover, Mark 16. 17, 18. And perhaps they had not that power at all times, and at their discretion, but only when some great end was to be served by it, and when God saw fit. It was proper to the apostles to had the power, but not to others. 2. The Philippians were exceedingly sorry to hear of his sickness. They were full of heaviness, as well as he, upon the tidings of it: for he was one, it seems, whom they had a particular respect and affection for, and thought fit to choose out to send to the apostle.

3. It pleased God to recover and spare him; But God had mercy on him, v. 27. The apostle own it a great mercy to himself, as well as to Epaphroditus and others. Though the church was blessed at that time with extraordinary gifts, they could even then ill spare a good minister. He was sensibly touched with the thoughts of so great a loss; "Let him and others sorrow, and by no means rejoice; besidethe sorrow of my own imprisonment, I should have the sorrow of his death." Or perhaps some other good ministers had died lately; which had been a great affliction to him: and if this had died, now, it would have been a fresh grief to him, and sorrow added to sorrow. 4. Epaphroditus was willing to make a visit to the Philippians, that he might be comforted with those who had sorrowed for him when he was sick; "That when ye see him again, ye may rejoice; (v. 28.) that ye may yourselves see how well he is recovered, and what reason ye have for thankfulness and joy upon his account." He gave himself the pleasure of comforting them by the sight of so dear a friend. 5. Paul recommends him to their esteem and affection; "Receive him therefore in the Lord with all gladness, and hold such in estimation: account such men valuable, who are zealous and faithful, and let them be highly loved and regarded. Shew your joy and respect by all the expressions of hearty affection and good opinion." It seems, he had caught his illness in the work of God; "It was for the work of Christ that he was nigh to death, and to supply their lack of service to him. The apostle does not blame him for his indiscretion in hazarding his life, but reckons the one of the means that attended that account. Observe, (1.) They who truly love Christ and are hearty in the interests of his kingdom, will think it very well worth their while to hazard their health and life, to do him service, and promote the edification of his church. Observe, (2.) They were to receive him with joy, as newly recovered from sickness. It is an endearing consideration to have our mercies restored to us after danger of removal; and it should make them the more valued and improved. What is given us in answer to prayer, should be received with great thankfulness and joy.

CHAP. III.

He cautions them against judging seducers; (v. 1. 3.) and proposes his own example: and here he enumerates the disadvantages of the state whereof he wrote (v. 4. 8.) describes the matter of his own choice, (v. 9. 16.) and closes with an exhortation to beware of wicked men, and to follow his example, v. 17. 21.

1. FINALLY, my brethren, rejoice in the Lord. To write the same things to you, to me indeed is not grievous, but for you it is safe. 2. Beware of dogs, beware of evil-workers, beware of the concision. 3. For we are the circumcision, who worship God in the Spirit, and rejoice in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh: It seems, the church of the Philippians, though a faithful and flourishing church, was disturbed by the judaizing teachers, who endeavoured to keep up the law of Moses, and mix the observances of it with the doctrine of Christ and his institutions. He begins the chapter with warnings against these seducers.

1. He exhorts them to rejoice with the he re; (v. 1.) to be satisfied in the interest they had in him, and the benefit they hoped for by him. It is the character and temper of sincere Christians to rejoice in Christ Jesus. The more we take of the comfort of our religion, the more closely we shall cleave to it: the more we rejoice in Christ, the more willing we shall be to do and suffer for him, and the less danger we shall be in of being drawn away from him. The joy of the Lord is our strength, Neh. 8. 10. 2. He cautions them to take heed of those false teachers: To write the same things to you, to me in stead is not grievous, but for you it is safe; that is, the same things which I have already preached to you; as he had said, "What has been presented to your ears, shall be presented to your eyes: what I have spoken expressly shall now be written; to shew that I am still of the same mind. This deed is not grievous." Observe, (1.) Ministers must not think any thing grievous to themselves, which they have reason to believe is safe and edifying to the people. Observe, (2.) It is good for us often to hear the same truths, to revive the remembrance and strengthen the impression of things of importance. It is a wanton curiosity to desire always to hear some new things.

It is a needful caution he here gives; Beware of dogs, v. 2. The prophet calls the false prophets "dumb dogs"; (Isa. 56. 10.) to which the apostle here seems to refer. Dogs, for their malice against the faithful professors of the gospel of Christ, barking at them and biting them. They cried up good works in opposition to the faith of Christ; but Paul calls them evil workers: they boasted themselves to be of the circumcision; but he calls them the concision: they rent and tore the church of Christ, and cut it to pieces; or contended for an abolished rite, a mere insignificant cutting of the flesh.

3. He describes true Christians, who are indeed the circumcision, the circumcised spirit, the peculiar people of God, who are in covenant with him, as the Old Testament Israelites were; We are the circumcision, who worship God in the spirit, and rejoice in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh. Here are three characters: (1.) They worshipped in the spirit, in opposition to the carnal ordinances of the Old Testament, which consisted in meats and drinks and divers washings, &c. Christianity takes us off from these things, and teaches us to be inward with God in all the duties of religious worship. We must worship God in spirit, John 4. 24. The work of religion is to no purpose, any further than the heart is employed in it. Whatev er we do, we must do it heartily, as unto the Lord; and we must worship God in the strength and grace of the divine Spirit, which is so peculiar to the gospel-state, which is the ministration of the Spirit, 2 Cor. 3. 8. (2.) They rejoice in Christ Jesus, and not in the peculiar privileges of the Jewish church, or what answers to them in the Christian church—mere outward enjoyments and performances. They rejoice in their relation to Christ, and interest in him. God made it the duty of the Israelites to worship him in the courts of his house; but now that the substance is come, the shadows are done away, and we are to rejoice in Christ Jesus only. (3.) They have no confidence in the flesh, those carnal ordinances and outward performances. We must be taken off from trusting in our own bottom, that we may build only on Jesus Christ, the everlasting Foundation. Our confidence, as well as our joy, is proper to him.

4. Though I might also have confidence in the flesh. If any other man thinketh that he hath whereof he might trust in the flesh, I more: 5. Circumcised the eighth day, of the stock of Israel, of the tribe of Benjamin, a Hebrew of the Hebrews; as touching the law, a Pharisee; 6. Concerning zeal, persecuting the church; touching the righteousness which is in the law, blameless. 7. But what things were gained to me, those I counted loss for Christ. 8. Yea doubtless, and I count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord: for whom I have suffered the loss of all things, and do count them but dung, that I may win Christ.

The apostle here proposes himself for an example of trusting in Christ only, and not in his privileges as a Gentile. 1. He shews what he had to boast of as a Jew and a Pharisee. Let none think that the apostle despised these things, (as men commonly do,) because he had them not himself to glorify. No, if he would have gloried and trusted in the flesh, he had as much cause to do so as any man; If any other man thinketh that he hath whereof to trust in the flesh, I more, v. 5.

He had as much to boast of as a Gentile Jew of them all. 1. His birth-right privileges. He was not a proudeye, but a native Israelite; of the stock of Israel. And he was of the tribe of Benjamin, in which tribe the temple stood, and which adhered to Judah when all the other tribes revolted. Benjamin was the father's darling, and this was a favorite tribe. A Hebrew of the Hebrews, an Israelite on both sides, by father and mother, and from one generation to another; none of his ancestors had matched with Gentiles. 2. He could boast of his relation to the church and the covenant, for he was circumcised the eighth day: he had the token of God's covenant in his flesh, and was circumcised the very day which God had appointed. 3. For learning, he was a Pharisee, brought up at the feet of Gamaliel, an eminent doctor of the law: and was a scholar learned in all the learning of the Jews; taught according to the perfect manner of the law of the fathers, Acts 22. 3. He was a Pharisee, the son of a Pharisee, (Acts 23. 6.) and after the most strict sect of his religion, lived a Pharisee, Acts 26. 5. 4. He had a blameless conversation; touching the righteousness which is of the law, blameless: as far as the Pharisees' exposition of the law went, and as to the more letter of the law, and outward observance of it, he could acquit himself from the breach of it, and could not be accused by any. 5. He had been an active man for his religion. As he made a strict profession of it, under the title and character of a Pharisee, so he persecuted those whom he looked upon as enemies to it. Concerning zeal, persecuting the church. 6. He shewed that he was in good earnest, though he had a zeal without knowledge to direct and govern the exercise of it; I was zealous toward God, as the all Israel, I was zealous for the commandments of God, v. 2.

Then he shews the issue of his zeal, and the issue of what he counted loss for Christ, and what he counted gain. He had reckoned all his honours and advantages, as a Jew and a Pharisee, and submitted to all the disgrace and suffering which attended the profession and preaching of the gospel. When he embarked in the bottom of the Christian religion, he ventured all in it, and suffered the loss of all for the privileges of a Christian. Nay, he not only counted them loss, but dung, oves - oves--oofos thrown to dogs; they are not only not less valuable than Christ, but in the highest degree contemptible, when they come in competition with him.

Note, The New Testament never speaks of saving grace in any terms of diminution, but, on the contrary, represents it as the fruits of the divine Spirit, and the image of God in the soul of man; as a divine nature, and the seed of God: and faith is called precious faith; and meekness is in the sight of God of great price, 1 Pet. 3. 4. 2 Pet. 1. 1, &c.

9. And be found in him, not having mine own righteousness, which is of the law, but that which is through the faith of Christ, the righteousness which is of God by faith: 10. That I may know him, and the power of his resurrection, and the fellowship of his sufferings, being made conformable unto his death; 11. If by any means I might attain unto the resurrection of the dead. 12. Not as though I had already attained, or were already perfect: but I follow after, if that I may apprehend that for which also I am apprehended of Christ Jesus. 13. Brethren, I count not myself to have apprehended; but this one thing I do, forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, 14. I press toward the mark, for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus.

We have heard what the apostle renounced; let us now see what he laid hold on, and resolved to cleave to, and that was, 1. Christ; and, II. Heaven.
He had his heart on these two great peculiarities of the Christian religion.

I. The apostle had his heart upon Christ, as his Righteousness. This is illustrated in several instances:—

1. He desired to win Christ; and an unspacious gainer he would reckon himself, if he had but an interest in Christ and his righteousness, and if Christ became his Lord and his Saviour. That I may win him; as the runner wins the prize, as the sailor makes the port he is bound for. The expression intimates that we have need to strive for him, and reach after him; and that all is little enough to win him.

2. That he might be found in him, (v. 9.) as the manseflower was found in the city of refuge, where he was safe from the avenger of blood, Numb. 35. 25. Or it alludes to a judicial appearance; so we are to be found of our Judge in heaven, 2 Pet. 3. 14. We are undone without a righteousness wherein to appear before God, for we are guilty. There is a righteousness provided for us in Jesus Christ, and it is a complete and perfect righteousness. None can have interest or benefit by it but those who come off from confidence in themselves, and are brought heartily to believe in him. "Not having my own righteousness, which is of the law; not thinking that my outward observances and good deeds are able to atone for my bad ones; or that by setting the one over against the other, and giving a name to the accounts with God. No, the righteousness which I depend upon, is that which is through the faith of Christ; not a legal, but evangelical righteousness.

The righteousness which is of God: by faith, ordained and appointed of God." The Lord Jesus Christ is the Lord our Righteousness, Isa. 45. 24. Had he not been God, he could not have been our Righteousness; the transcendent excellence of the divine nature put such a value upon, and such a virtue into, his sufferings, that they became sufficient to satisfy for the sins of the world, and to bring in a righteousness which will be effectual to all who believe. Faith is the ordained means of actual interest and saving benefit in all the purchase of his blood. It is by faith in his blood, Rom. 3. 25.

3. That he might know Christ; (v. 10.) That I may know him, and the power of his resurrection and the fellowship of his sufferings. Faith is called knowledge, Isa. 33. 11. Knowing him, here, believing him: it is an experimental knowledge of the power of his resurrection, and fellowship of his sufferings, or feeling the transforming efficacy and virtue of them. Observe, The apostle was as ambitious of being sanctified as he was of being justified. He was as desirous to know the power of Christ's death and resurrection; killing sin in him, and raising him up to a measure of life, as he was to receive the benefit of Christ's death and resurrection in his justification.

4. That he might be conformable unto him; and that also is meant of his sanctification. We are then made conformable to his death, when we die to sin, as Christ died for sin; when we are crucified with Christ, the flesh and affections of it mortified, and the world is crucified to us, and we to the world, by working in us, to lay aside the action of the dead at the last day, when soul and body shall be glorified together. "Aριστικος, sometimes signifies the future state. This the apostle had his eye upon; this he would attain. There will be a resurrection of the unjust, who shall arise to shame and everlasting contempt; and our care must be, to escape that: but the joyful and glorious resurrection of saints is called the resurrection, after the manner of the living, for their exaltation by eminence, because it is in virtue of Christ's resurrection, as their Head and First-fruits; whereas the wicked shall rise only by the power of Christ, as their Judge. To the saints it will be indeed a resurrection, a return to bliss and life and glory; while the resurrection of the wicked is a rising from the grave, but a return to a second death. It is called the final resurrection.—It is called the resurrection, "after the manner of the living," (John 5. 29.) and they are counted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead, Luke 20. 35.

This joyful resurrection the apostle pressed toward. He was willing to do anything, or suffer any thing, that he might attain that resurrection. The hope and prospect of it carried him with courage and constancy through all the difficulties he met with in his work. Observe, 1. He speaks as if they were in danger of missing it, and coming short of it. A holy fear of coming short, is an excellent means of perseverance. Observe, 2. His care to be found in Christ, was in order to his attaining the resurrection of the dead. Paul himself did not hope to attain it through his own merit and righteousness, but through the merit and righteousness of Jesus Christ. "Let no one esteem himself to have attained, in Christ, that I may attain the resurrection of the dead; he being a believer in him, and interested in him by faith."

He looks upon himself to be in a state of imperfection and trial; "Not as though I had already attained, or were already perfect, v. 12. Observe, The best men in the world will readily own their imperfection in the present state. We have not yet attained, are not already perfect; there is still much difficulty, and uncertainty, in it. Paul says, If Paul had not attained to perfection, (who had reached to so high a pitch of holiness,) much less have we. Again, Brethren, I count not myself to have apprehended, (v. 13.) ἧν ἀνέμνησα; "I make this judgment of the case; I thus reason with myself." Observe, They who think they have grace enough, give proof that they have little enough, or rather, that they have none at all; because, whereas there is a desire of grace, and a pressing toward the perfection of grace, Observe here, (1.) What the apostle's actions were, under this conviction. Considering that he had not already attained, and had not apprehended, he pressed forward; "I follow after, (v. 12.) ὄχι ὁποιον ἔχω, as a way following after the game. I endeavour to get more grace, and do more good; and never think I have done enough, if I may apprehend that for which also I am apprehended of Christ Jesus." Observe, [1.] From whence our grace comes; from our being apprehended of Christ Jesus. It is not our laying hold of Christ first, but his laying hold of us, which is our happiness and salvation. We love him, because he first loved us, 1 John 4. 19. Not our keeping hold of Christ, but his keeping hold of us. That which will be, "by his mighty power through faith unto salvation, 1 Pet. 1. 5. Observe, [2.] What the happiness of heaven is: it is to apprehend that for which we are apprehended of Christ. When Christ laid hold of us, it was to bring us to heaven; and to apprehend that for which he apprehended us, is to attain the perfection of our bliss. He adds further, (v. 13.) This one thing I do; this was his great care and concern: forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth to those things which are before. There is a sinful forgetting of past sins and past mercies, which ought to be remembered for the exercise of constant repentance and thankfulness to God. But he forgot the things which are behind, so as not to be content with present measures of grace: he was still for having more and more. So he reached forth, and stretched himself forward, bearing toward his point: expressions of a vehement concern.

(2.) The apostle's aim in these acts: I press toward the mark, for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus, v. 14. He pressed toward the mark. As he who runs a race, never takes up short of the end, but is still making forward as fast as he can; so they who have heaven in their eye, must still be pressing forward to it in holy desires and hopes, and constant endeavours and preparations.
The fitter we grow for heaven, the fester we must press towards it. Heaven is called here the mark, because it is that which every good Christian has in his eye; as the archer has his eye fixed upon the mark he designs to hit. For the prize of the high calling. Observe, A Christian's calling is a high calling: it is from heaven, as its original; and it is to heaven in its tendency. Heaven is the prize of the high calling; ταὶ βασιλείας— the prize we fight for, and run for, and wrestle for; what we aim at in all we do, and what will reward all our pains. It is of great use in the Christian course, to keep our eye upon heaven. This is proper to give us measures in all our service, and to quicken us every step we take; and it is of God, from him we are to expect it. Eternal life is the gift of God; (Rom. 6:23) it is purchased, and the purchase is laid up for him, to whom it shall come to us, as it is procured for us by him. There is no getting to heaven as our home but by Christ as our Way.

13. Let us therefore, as many as are perfect, be thus minded: and if in any thing ye be otherwise minded, God shall reveal even this unto you. 16. Nevertheless, whereunto we have already attained, let us walk by the same rule, let us mind the same thing.

The apostle, having proposed himself as an example, urges the Philippians to follow it. Let the same thing in us which was in him, as it was in Paul, be in us also. See here, how he was minded; let us be like-minded; and set our hearts upon Christ and heaven, as he did. 1. He shews that this was the thing wherein all good Christians were agreed; to make Christ all in all, and set their hearts upon another world. This is that whereunto we have all attained. However good Christians may differ in their sentiments about other things, this is what they are agreed in, that Christ is a Christian's all; that to win Christ, and to be found in him, is our happiness both here and hereafter. And therefore let us walk by the same rule, and mind the same thing. Having made Christ our all to us, to us to live must be Christ. Let us agree to press toward the mark, and make heaven our end.

2. That this is a good reason why Christians who differ in lesser matters, should yet bear with one another, because they are agreed in the main matter: "If in any thing ye be otherwise minded, if ye differ from one another, and are not of the same judgment as to meats and days, and other matters of the Jewish law; yet ye must not judge one other, while ye all meet now in Christ as your Centre, and hope to meet shortly in heaven as your home. As for other matters of difference, lay no great stress upon them, God shall reveal even this unto you. Whatever it is wherein ye differ, ye must wait till God give you a better understanding, which he will do in his due time. In the mean time, as far as ye have attained, ye must go together in the ways of God, join together in all the great things in which ye are agreed, and wait for further light in the lesser things wherein ye differ."

17. Brethren, be followers together of me, and mark them which walk so as ye have us for an example. 18. (For many walk, of whom I have told you often, and now tell you even weeping, that they are the enemies of the cross of Christ: 19. Whose end is destruction, whose God is their belly; and whose glory is in their shame, who mind earthly things.) 20. For our conversation is in heaven; from whence also we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ; 21. Who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body, according to the working whereby he is able even to subdue all things unto himself.

He closes the chapter with warnings and exhortations.

1. He warns them against following the examples of seducers and evil teachers; (v. 18, 19.) Many walk, of whom I have told you often, and now tell you weeping, that they are the enemies of the cross of Christ: These through spiritual pride, and the name of Christ's name, who yet are enemies to Christ's cross, and the design and intention of it. Their walk is a sure evidence what they are than their profession. By their fruits ye shall know them, Matt. 7:20. The apostle warns people against such: 1. Very frequently, I have told you often.
We so little heed the warnings given us, that we have need to have them repeated. To write the same thing again is given them safe, v. 1. 2. Feelingly and affectionately; I now tell you weeping.
Paul was upon proper occasions a weeping preacher, as Jeremiah was a weeping prophet. Observe, An old sermon may be preached with new affections; what we say often we may say again, if we say it affectionately, and are ourselves under the power of it. He gives us the characters of those who were the enemies of the cross of Christ.

(1.) They walk in God's body; they mind nothing but their sensual appetites. A wretched idol it is,
and a scandal for any, but especially for Christians, to sacrifice the favour of God, the peace of their conscience, and their eternal happiness, to it. Gluttons and drunkards make a god of their belly, and all their care is to please it, and make provision for it. The same observance which good people give to God, enures give to their appetites. Of such he says, They serve not the Lord Jesus Christ, but their own bellies, Rom. 16:18.

(2.) They glory in their shame; they not only sinned, but boasted of it, and gloried in that which they ought to be ashamed of. Sin is the sinner's shame, especially when it is gloried in. They value themselves for what is their blemish and reproach.

(3.) They mind earthly things. Christ came by his cross to crucify the world to us, and us to the world; and they who mind earthly things, act directly contrary to the cross of Christ, and this great design of it. They relish earthly things, and have no relish of the things which are spiritual and heavenly; they set their hearts and affections on earthly things; they love them, and even dote upon them, and have a confidence and complacency in them.
Of Christ the apostle gives this character, to shew how apt it would be for Christians to follow the example of such, or be led away by them. To deter us all from it, he reads their doom:
(4.) Whose end is destruction. Their way seems pleasant, but death and hell are at the end of it. What fruit had ye then in those things whereof ye are now ashamed? For the end of those things is death, Rom. 6. 21. It is dangerous following them, though it is going down the stream; for if we choose their way, we have reason to fear their end. Perhaps he alludes to the total destruction of the Jewish nation.

II. He proposes himself and his brethren for an example, in opposition to these evil examples; Brethren, be followers together of me, and mark them who walk so, as ye have us for an example, v. 17. Mark them out for your pattern. He explains himself, (v. 20.) by their regard to Christ and heaven: for our conversation is in heaven. Observe, Good Christians, even while they are here on earth, have their conversation in heaven. Their citizenship is there, which is that, we stand related to that world, and are citizens of the New Jerusalem. This world is not our home, but that is. There our greatest privileges and concerns lie. And because our citizenship is there, our conversation is there; being related to that world, we keep up a correspondence with it. The life of a Christian is in heaven, where his head is, and his home is, and where he hopes to be shortly: he sets his affections upon things above; and where his heart is, there will his conversation.

The apostle had pressed them to follow him, and other ministers of Christ; "Why," might they say, "you are a company of poor, despised, persecuted people; who make no figure, and pretend to no advantages in the world; who will follow you?" "Nay," says he, "but our conversation is in heaven. We have a near relation, and a great pretension, to the other world; and are not so mean and despicable as we are represented." It is good having fellowship with those who have fellowship with Christ, and conversation with those whose conversation is in heaven.

1. Because we look for the Saviour from thence; (v. 20.) From whence also we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ. He is not here, he is ascended, he is entered within the veil for us; and we expect his second coming from thence, to gather in all the citizens of that New Jerusalem to himself.

2. Because at the second coming of Christ we expect to be happy and glorified there. There is good reason to have our conversation in heaven, not only because Christ is now there, but because we hope to be there shortly; Who shall change our vile bodies; they may be fashioned like unto his glorious body, v. 21. There is a glory reserved for the bodies of the saints, which they will be instated in at the resurrection. The body is now at the best a vile body, πατήρ ανθρώπου; the body of humiliation; it has its rise and original from the earth, it is supported out of the earth, and is subject to many diseases, and to death at last. Besides, it is often the occasion, and instrument of much pain and trouble, which is called the body of this death, Rom. 7. 24. Or it may be understood of its vileness when it lies in the grave; at the resurrection, it will be found a vile body, resolved into rottenness and dust; the dust will return to the earth as it was, Eccl. 12. 7. But it will be made a glorious body; and not only raised again to life, but raised to great advantage. Observe, a change of the body is the grand glory of the children of the resurrection, and happy is the glorious body of Christ; when he was transfigured upon the mount, his face did shine as the sun, and his raiment was white as the light, Matt. 17. 2. He went to heaven, clothed with a body, that he might take possession of the inheritance in our nature, and be not only the First-born from the dead, but the First-born of the children of the resurrection. We shall be conformed to the image of his Son, that he might be the First-born among many brethren, Rom. 8. 29. Observe, (2.) The power by which this change will be wrought: according to the working whereby he is able even to subdue all things unto himself. There is an efficacy of power, an exceeding greatness of power, and the working of mighty power, Eph. 1. 19. It is matter of comfort to us that he can subdue all things to himself, and sooner or later will bring over all into his interest. And the resurrection will be wrought by this power. I will raise him up at the last day, John 6. 44. Let this confirm our faith of the resurrection, that we not only have the scriptures, which assure us it shall be, but we know the power of God, which can effect it, Matt. 22. 29. As Christ's resurrection was a glorious instance of the divine power, and therefore he is declared to be the Son of God with power, by the resurrection from the dead; (Rom. 1. 4.) so will our resurrection be; and his resurrection is a standing evidence, as well as pattern, of ours. And then all the enemies of the Redeemer's kingdom will be completely conquered. Not only he who had the power of death, that is, the Devil, (Heb. 2.14.) but the last enemy shall be destroyed, that is, death, 1 Cor. 15. 26. Death will be swallowed up in victory, v. 54.

CHAP. IV.

Exhortations to several Christian duties, as steadfastness, unanimity, joy, &c. v. 1. 9. The apostle's grateful acknowledgments of the Philippians' kindness to him, with expressions of his own content, and desire of their good, v. 10. 20. He concludes the epistle with praise, salutations, and blessing, v. 21. 25.

1. THEREFORE, my brethren dearly beloved and longed for, my joy and crown, so stand fast in the Lord, my dearly beloved. 2. I beseech Euodias, and beseech Syntyche, that they be of the same mind in the Lord. 3. And I entreat thee also, true yoke-fellow, help those women which laboured with me in the gospel, with Clement also, and with other my fellow-labourers, whose names are in the book of life. 4. Rejoice in the Lord alway: and again I say, Rejoice. 5. Let your moderation be known unto all men. The Lord is at hand. 6. Be ye careful for nothing; but in every thing by prayer and supplication, with thanksgiving, let your requests be made known unto God. 7. And the peace of God, which passeth all understanding, shall keep your hearts and minds through Christ Jesus. 8. Finally, brethren, whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report; if there be any virtue, and if there be any praiseworthy things, think on these things. 9. Those things which ye have both learned, and received, and heard and seen in me, do: and the God of peace shall be with you.

The apostle begins the chapter with exhortations to divers Christian duties.

1. To steadfastness in our Christian profession, v. 1. It is inferred from the close of the foregoing chapter; Therefore stand fast, &c. Seeing our conversation is in heaven, and we look for the Saviour to come from thence, and fetch us thither: therefore let us stand fast. Note, The believing hope and prospect of eternal life should engage us to be steady, watchful, and constant, in our Christian course. Observe here,

1. The compulsions are very endearing; My brethren, dearly beloved, and longed for, my joy and crown; and again, My dearly beloved. Thus he expresses the pleasure he took in them, the kindness he had for them, to convey his exhortations to them with so much the greater advantage. He looked upon them as his brethren; though the word was not given to the apostle, All we are brethren. There is difference of gifts, graces, and attainments, yet, being renewed by the same Spirit, after the same image, we are brethren; as the children of the same parents, though of different ages, statures, and complexions. Being brethren, (1.) He loved them, and loved them dearly; Dearly beloved; and again, My dearly beloved. Warm affections become ministers and Christians toward one another. Brothers love must always go along with the brotherly relation. (2.) He loved them, and longed for them; longed to see them, and hear from them; longed for their welfare, and was earnestly desirous of it; I long after you all in the bowels of Jesus Christ, ch. 1. 3. (3.) He loved them, and rejoiced in them. They were his joy; he had no greater joy than to hear of their spiritual health and prosperity. I rejoiced greatly that I found of them that walk in the same spirit and in the same manner as we; and gloried in them: they were his crown as well as his joy. Never was proud ambitions man more pleased with the ensigns of honour than Paul was with the evidences of the sincerity of their faith and obedience. All this is to prepare his way to greater regard.

2. The exhortation itself; So stand fast in the Lord. Being in Christ, they must stand fast in him, even as the walls of a city, as close and constant unto the end. Or, To stand fast in the Lord, is to stand fast in his strength, and by his grace; not trusting in ourselves, and disclaiming any sufficiency of our own; we must be strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might, Eph. 6. 10. So stand fast, so as you have done hitherto, stand fast unto the end, so as you are my beloved, and my joy and crown; so stand fast, as those in whose wellfaring and perseverance I am so nearly interested and concerned.

II. He exhorts them to unanimity and mutual assistance; (v. 2, 3.) I beseech Euodias and Syntyche, that they be of the same mind in the Lord. This is directed to some particular persons. Sometimes there is need of applying the general precepts of the gospel to particular persons and cases. Euodias and Syntyche, it seems, were at variance, either one with the other, or with the church; either upon a civil account, it may be they were engaged in a lawsuit; or upon a religious account, it may be they were of different opinions and sentiments. Pray, says he, "desire them from me to be of the same mind in the Lord; to keep the peace, and live in love; to be of the same mind one with another, not thwarting and contradicting; and that they be of the same mind in the Lord, the rest of the church, not acting in opposition to this verse."

Then he exhorts to mutual assistance; (v. 3.) and that he directs to particular persons; I entreat thee also, true yoke-fellow. Who this person was, whom he calls true yoke-fellow, is uncertain. Some think Epaphroditus, who is supposed to be one of the pastors of the church of the Philippians. Others think it was some eminent good woman, perhaps Paul's wife, because he exorts his yoke-fellow to help the women who laboured with him. Whoever was the yoke-fellow with the apostle, must be a yoke-fellow too with his friends. It seems, there were women who laboured with Paul in the gospel, not in the public ministry; (for the apostle expressly finds the doctrines of the gospel to be the first thing to teach;) but by entertaining the ministers, visiting the sick, instructing the ignorant, convincing the erroneous. Thus women may be helpful to ministers in the work of the gospel. Now, says the apostle, do thou help them. They who help others, should be helped themselves, when there is occasion. Help them, join with them, strengthen their hands, encourage them in their difficulties.

With Clemens and other my fellow-labourers. Paul had a kindness for all his fellow-labourers; and as he had found the benefit of their assistance, he concluded how comfortable it would be to them to have the assistance of others. Of his fellow-labourers he says, Whose names are in the book of life; either they were chosen of God from all eternity, or registered and enrolled in the corporation and society to which the privilege of eternal life belongs, alluding to the custom among the Jews and Gentiles, of registering the inhabitants of the freemen of a city. So we read of their names being written in heaven, (Luke 10. 20.) not blotting his name out of the book of life, (Rev. 3. 5.) and of them who are written in the Lamb's book of life, Rev. 21. 27. Observe, There is a book of life; there are names in that book, and not characters and conditions only. We cannot search into that book, or know whose names are there; but the assurance of our acceptance and enrolment of charity, conclude that they who labour in the gospel, and are faithful to the interest of Christ and souls, have their names in the book of life.

III. He exalts holy joy and delight in God; Rejoice in the Lord always; and again I say, Rejoice, v. 4. All our joy must terminate in God, and our thoughts of God must be delightful thoughts. Delight thyself in the Lord; (Ps. 37. 4.) in the multitude of thy thoughts within us, (Ps. 139. 3.) his comforts delight our souls, (Ps. 94. 19.) and our meditation of him is sweet, Ps. 104. 34. Observe, It is our duty and privilege to rejoice in God, and to rejoice in him always; at all times, in all conditions; even when we suffer for him, or are afflicted by him. We must not think the worse of him or of his ways, for the hardships we meet with in his service. There is enough in the Lord to fill the soul with joy and love, with the world could not give. Circumstance on earth. He had said it before, (ch. 3. 1.) Finally, my brethren, rejoice in the Lord. Here he says it again, Rejoice in the Lord always; and again I say, Rejoice. Joy in God is a duty of great consequence in the Christian life; and Christians need to be again and again called to it. If good men have not a continual feast, it is their own fault.

IV. We are here exhorted to candour and gentleness, and good temper towards our brethren from verse to verse. The reason is, The Lord is at hand. The consideration of our Master's approach, and our final account, should keep us from smiting our fellow-servants, support us under present sufferings, and moderate our affections to outward good. He will take vengeance on your enemies, and reward your patience.

V. Here is caution against distrusting perplexing care; (v. 6.) Be careful for nothing—worry: the same expression with that Matt. 6. 25. Take no thought for your life; that is, anxious care and distracting thought in the wants and difficulties of life. Observe, it is the duty of all Christians to live agreeably and dutifully. There is a care of diligence which is our duty, and consists in a wise forecast and due concern; but there is a care of diffidence and distrust, which is our sin and folly, and which only perplexes and distracts the mind. "Be careful for nothing, so as by your care to distract God, and unfit yourselves for his service." 1.

VI. As a sovereign antidote against perplexing care, in common with us constant prayer. In every thing by prayer and supplication, with thanksgiving, let your requests be made known to God. Observe, 1. We must not only keep up stated times for prayer, but we must pray upon every particular emergency. In every thing by prayer. When any thing burthen our spirits, we must ease our minds by prayer; when our affairs are perplexed or distressed, we must seek direction and support. 2. We must join the angels with the prayers or supplications: we must not only seek supplies of good, but own receipts of mercy. Grateful acknowledgments of what we have, argue a right disposition of mind, and are prevailing motives for further blessings. 3. Prayer is offering up our desires to God, or making them known to him; Let your request be made known to God. Not that God needs to be told either our wants or desires; for he knows them better than we can tell him, but he will know them from us, and have us shew our regards and concern, express our value of the mercy, and sense of our dependence on him. 4. The effect of this will be the peace of God keeping our hearts, v. 7. The peace of God, that is, the comfortable sense of our reconciliation to God, and interest in his favour, and the hope of the heavenly blessedness, and enjoyment of God, which fashions all our desires and e-tending, is a greater good than any that can be sufficiently valued or duly expressed. It has not entered into the heart of man, 1 Cor. 2. 9. This peace will keep our hearts and minds through Jesus Christ; it will keep them from sinning under our troubles, and from sinking under them; keep them calm and sedate, without discomposure of passion, and with inward satisfaction. Thou shalt keep him in perfect peace, whose mind is stayed on thee.

VII. We are exhorted to get and keep a good name; a name for good things with God and good men; Whatever things are true and honest; (v. 8.) a regard to truth in our words and engagements, and to decency and becomingness in our behaviour, suitable to our circumstances and condition of life. Whatever things are just and pure; agreeable to the rules of justice and righteousness in our dealings with men, and witty, the impurities or mixture of sin. Whatever things are lovely and of good report, that is, amiable; that will render us beloved, and make us well spoken of, as well as well thought of, by others. If there is any virtue, if there is any praise; any thing really virtuous in any kind, and worthy of commendation. Observe, 1. The apostle would have the Christians learn to value every thing which was good of their heathen neighbours; "If there be any virtue, think of these things: imitate them in what is truly excellent among them; and let not them outdo you in any instance of goodness." We should not be ashamed to learn any good thing of bad men, or those who have not our advantages. 2. Virtue has its praise, and will have. We should walk in all the ways of virtue, and abide therein; and then, whether our favour be with men or not, it will be of God, Rom. 2. 20.

In these things he proposes himself to them for an example; (v. 9.) Those things which ye have learned, and received, and heard and seen in me, do. Observe, Paul's doctrine and life were of a piece. What they saw in him, was the same thing with what they heard from him. He could propose himself as well as his doctrine to their imitation. It gives a great force to what we say to others, having something to do with what they have seen in us. And this is the way to have the God of peace with us—to keep close to our duty to him. The Lord is with us while we are with him. 10. But I rejoiced in the Lord greatly, that now at the last your care of me hath flourished again; wherein ye were also careful, but ye lacked opportunity. 11. Not that I speak in respect of want: for I have learned, in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content. 12. I know both how to be abased, and I know how to abound: every where, and in all things, I am instructed both to be full and to be hungry, both to abound and to suffer need. 13. I can do all things through Christ who strengtheneth me. 14. Notwithstanding ye have well done, that ye did communicate with my affliction. 15. Now, ye Philippians, know also, that in the beginning of the gospel, when I departed from Macedonia, no church communicated with me as concerning giving and receiving, but ye only. 16. For even in Thessalonica ye sent once and again unto my necessity. 17. Not because I desire a gift: but I desire fruit that may abound to your account. 18. But I have all, and abound: I am full, having received of Epaphroditus the things which were sent from you, an odour of a sweet smell, a sacrifice acceptable, well-pleasing to God. 19. But my God shall supply all your need according to his riches in glory by Christ Jesus.

In these verses we have the thankful grateful acknowledgment which the apostle makes of the kindness of the Philippians in sending him a present for his support, now that he was a prisoner at Rome. And here,

1. He takes occasion from thence to acknowledge their former kindnesses to him, and to make mention of them, v. 15, 16. Paul had a grateful spirit: for though what his friends did for him was nothing in comparison of what he deserved from them, and the obligation he had laid upon them; yet he speaks of their kindness as if it had been a piece of generous charity, when it was really far short of a just debt. If they had each of them contributed half their estates to him, they had not given him too much, since they owed it to him even their own souls; and yet, when they sent a small present to him, how kindly does he take it, how thankfully does he mention it, even in this instance, in which he was to be left upon record, and read in the churches, through all ages; so that wherever this epistle shall be read, there shall this which they did to Paul be told for a memorial of them. Surely never was present so well repaid.

He reminds them, that in the beginning of the gospel no church communicated with him as to giving and receiving, but they only, v. 15. They not only maintained him comfortably while he was with them, but when he departed from Macedonia they sent tokens of their kindness after him; and this, when no other church did so besides. None besides sent after him of their carnal things, in considera-of what they had reaped of his spiritual things. In works of charity, we are ready to ask, "What do other people do?" But the church of the Philippians never considered that. It redounded so much more to their honour, that they were the only church who were thus just and generous. Even in Thebes, when Paul was departed from Macedonia, ye sent once and again to my necessity, v. 16.

Observe, 1. It was but little which they sent; they sent only to his necessity; just such things as he had need of; perhaps it was according to their ability, and he did not desire superfluities or dainties.

2. It is an excellent thing to see those to whom God has abounded in the gifts of his grace, abounding in grateful returns to his people and worshippers, according to their ability, and their necessity; Ye sent once and again. Many people make it an excuse for their charity, that they have given once; why should the charge come upon them again? But the Philippians sent once and again; they often relieved and refreshed him in his necessities. He makes this mention of their former kindness, not only in his own gratitude, but for their encouragement.

II. He excurses their neglect of late. It seems, for some time they had not sent to inquire after him, or sent him any present; but now at the last their care of him, flourished again, (v. 10.) like a tree in the spring, which seemed all the winter to be quite dead. Now, in conformity to the example of his great Master, instead of upbraiding them for their neglect, he makes an excuse for them; Whereas ye were also careful, but ye lacked opportunity. How could they lack opportunity, if they had been resolved upon it? They might have sent a messenger on purpose. But the apostle is willing to suppose, in favour of them, that they would have done it if a fair opportunity had offered. How contrary is this to the conduct of many to their friends, by whom neglects which really are excusable, are resented very heinously; when Paul excused that which he had reason enough to resented.

III. He commendeth their present liberality; Notwithstanding, ye have well done, that ye did communicate with my affliction, v. 14. It is a good work to succour and help a good minister in trouble. Here see what is the nature of true Christian charity; not only to be concerned for our friends in their troubles, but to do what we can to help them. They communicated with him in his affliction, in relieving him under it. He who says, Be ye warmed, be ye filled, and that are the things they have need of; what doth it profit? Jam. 2. 15.

He rejoiced greatly in it, (v. 10.) because it was an evidence of their affection to him, and the success of his ministry among them. When the fruit of their charity abounded toward the apostle, it appeared that the fruit of his ministry abounded among them.

IV. He takes care to obviate the ill use some might make of his taking so much notice of what was sent him. It did not proceed either from discontent and distrust, v. 11.) or from covetousness and love of the world, v. 12.

1. It did not come from discontent, or distrust of Providence; Not that I speak in respect of want: (v. 11.) not in respect of any want he felt, or of any want he feared. As to the former, he was content with the little he had, and that satisfied him; as to the latter, he knew it was not necessary that he should have the suppliance of God to provide for him from day to day, and that satisfied him. So that he did not speak in respect of want any way; for I have learned, in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content. We have here an account of Paul's learning, not that which he got at the feet of Gamaliel, but that which he got at the feet of Christ. He had learnt to be content; and that was a lesson he had as much need to learn as most men, considering the hardships and sufferings with which he was exercised. He was in bonds and imprisonments, and necessities, often; but in all he had learnt to be content, to bring his mind to his condition, and make the best of it.

2. It is known how to abound, v. 12. This is a special act of grace, to accommodate ourselves to every condition of life, and carry an equal temper of mind through all the varieties of our state. (1.) To accommodate ourselves to an afflicted condition; to know how to be abased, how to be hungry, how to suffer want, so as not to be overcome by the temptations of it, either to lose our comfort in God, or distrust his providence, or to be at all discouraged at our condition. (2.) To know how to abound, to be in a prosperous condition; to know how to abound, how to be full, so as not to be proud, or secure, or luxurious. And this is as hard a lesson as the other; for the temptations of fulness and prosperity are not less than those of affliction and want. But how must we learn it? I can do all things through Christ who strengthens me, v. 13. We have need of strength from Christ, to enable us to perform not only those duties which are purely Christian, but even those which are the fruit of moral virtue. We need his strength to teach us to content in every condition. The apostle had seemed to boast of himself, and of his own strength; I know how to be abased; (v. 12.) but here he transfers all the praise to Christ. "What do I talk of knowing how to be abased, and how to abound? It is only through Christ who strengthens me, that I can do it, not in my own strength." So we are required to be strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might, (Eph. 6. 10.) and to be strong in the grace which is in Christ Jesus; (2 Tim. 2. 1.) and we are strengthened with might by his Spirit in the inner man, Eph. 3. 16. The word in the original is a participle of the present tense, το ἄχρηστα προσχεδεῖται, and denotes a present and continued act; "Through Christ, who is strengthening me, and does continually strengthen me; it is by his constant and renewed strength I am enabled to act in every thing; I wholly depend upon him for all my spiritual power."

2. It did not come from covetousness, or an affection to worldly wealth; Not because I desire a gift; (v. 17.) that is, "I welcome your kindness, not because it adds to my enjoyments, but because it adds to your account." He desired it not so much for his own sake, but theirs; I desire fruit that may abound to your account, that you may be enabled to advertise of such a good use of your kindness as you have made of it. Thus you may give an account of them with joy. It is not with any design to draw more from you, but to encourage you to such an exercise of beneficence as will meet with a glorious reward hereafter. For my part," says he, "I have all, and abound, v. 18. What can a man desire more than enough? I do not desire a gift for the gift's sake, for I have all, and abound." They sent him a small token, and he designed no more. He was not covetous of superfluities, or a future supply; I am full, having received from Euphrohodius the things which were sent from you. Note, A good man will soon have enough of the world; not only of living in it, but of receiving from it. A covetous worldling, if he has ever so much, would still have more; but a heavenly Christian, though he has little, has enough.

V. The apostle assures them, that God did accept, and would from henceforth, their kindness to him. 1. He did accept it; It is an odour of a sweet smell; a sacrifice acceptable, well-pleasing to God. Not a sacrifice of atonement, for none makes atonement for sin but Christ; but a sacrifice of acknowledgment, and well-pleasing to God. It was more acceptable to God as it was the fruit of their grace, than it was to Paul as it was the supply of his want
EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS,
OF THE
EPISTLE OF ST. PAUL TO THE COLOSSIANS.
Completed by Dr. W. Harris.

COLOSSE was a considerable city of Phrygia, and, probably, not far from Laodicea and Hierapolis; we find these three mentioned together, ch. 4. 13. It is now buried in ruins, and the memory of it chiefly preserved in this epistle. The design of the epistle is to warn them of the danger of the Jewish zealots, who pressed the necessity of observing the ceremonial law; and to fortify them against the mixture of the Gentile philosophy with their Christian principles. He professes a great satisfaction in their steadfastness and constancy, and encourages them to perseverance. It was written about the same time with the epistle to the Ephesians and Philippians, Anno Domini 62, and in the same place, while he was now prisoner at Rome. He was not idle in his confinement, and the word of God was not bound. This epistle, like that to the Romans, was written to those whom he had never seen, or had any personal acquaintance with. The church planted at Colosse was not by Paul’s ministry, but by the ministry of...
COLOSSIANS, I.

Epaphras or Epaphroditus, an evangelist, one whom he delegated to preach the gospel among the Gentiles; and yet,

I. There was a flourishing church at Colosse, and one which was eminent and famous among the churches. One would have thought none would have come to be flourishing churches but those which Paul himself had planted; but here was a flourishing church planted by Epaphras. God is sometimes pleased to make use of the ministry of those who are of less note, and lower gifts, for doing great service to his church. God uses what hands he pleases, and is not tied to those of note, that the excellence of the lower may appear to be of God, and not of men, 2 Cor. 4. 7.

II. Though Paul had not the planting of this church, yet he did not therefore neglect it; nor, in writing his epistles, does he make any difference between that and other churches. The Colossians, who were converted by the ministry of Epaphras, were as dear to him, and he as much concerned for their welfare, as the Philippians, or any others who were converted by his ministry. Thus he put an honour upon an inferior minister, and teaches us not to be selfish, or think all that honour lost, which goes beside ourselves. We learn, in his example, not to think it a disparagement to us to water what others have planted; or build upon the foundation which others have laid: as he himself, as a wise master-builder, laid the foundation, and another builded thereon, 1 Cor. 3. 10.

COLOSSIANS, I.

CHAP. I.

We have here, I. The inscription, as usual, v. 1, 2. II. His thanksgiving to God for what he had heard concerning them; their faith, love, and hope, v. 3, 8. III. His prayer for their knowledge, fruitfulness, and strength, v. 9–11.

IV. An admirable summary of the Christian doctrine concerning the operation of the Spirit, the person of the Redeemer, the work of redemption, and the preaching of it in the gospel, v. 12–28.

1. PAUL, an apostle of Jesus Christ, by the will of God, and Timotheus our brother, 2. To the saints and faithful brethren in Christ which are at Colosse: Grace be unto you, and peace, from God our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ.

The inscription of this epistle is much the same with the rest; only it is observable,

1. That he calls himself an apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God. An apostle is a prime-minister in the kingdom of Christ, immediately called by Christ, and extraordinarily qualified; his work was peculiarly to plant the Christian church, and confirm the Christian doctrine. He attributes this not to his own merit, strength, or sufficiency; but to the free grace and good-will of God. He thought himself engaged to do his utmost, as an apostle, because he was made so by the will of God.

2. He joins Timothy in commission with himself, which is another instance of his humility; and though he elsewhere calls him his son (2 Tim. 2. 1.) yet here he calls him his brother; which is an example to the elder and more eminent ministers, to look upon the younger and more obscure as their brethren, and to treat them, accordingly, with kindness and respect.

3. He calls the Christians at Colosse saints, and faithful brethren in Christ. As all good ministers, so all good Christians, are brethren one to another, who stand in a near relation, and owe a mutual love. Toward God they must be saints, consecrated to his honour, and sanctified by his grace; bearing his image, and aiming at his glory. And in both these, as saints to God, and as brethren to one another, they must be faithful. Faithfulness runs through every character and relation of the Christian life, and is the crown and glory of them all.

4. The apostolical benediction is the same as usual; Grace be unto you, and peace, from God our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ. He wishes them grace and peace, the free favour of God, and all the blessed fruits of it; all kind of spiritual blessings, and that from God our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ; jointly from both, and distinctly from each; as in the former epistle.

3. We give thanks to God and the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, praying always for you, 4. Since we heard of your faith in Christ Jesus, and of the love which ye have to all the saints; 5. For the hope which is laid up for you in heaven, whereof ye heard before in the word of the truth of the gospel; 6. Which is come unto you, as it is in all the world; and bringeth forth fruit, as it doth also in you, since the day ye heard of it, and knew the grace of God in truth: 7. As ye also learned of Epaphras our dear fellow-servant, who is for you a faithful minister of Christ; 8. Who also declared unto us your love in the Spirit.

He here proceeds to the body of the epistle, and begins with thanksgiving to God for what he had heard concerning them, though he had no personal acquaintance with them, and knew their state and character only by the reports of others. He gave thanks to God for them, that they had embraced the gospel of Christ, and given proofs of their fidelity to him. Observe, In his prayers for them he gave thanks for them. Thanksgiving ought to be a part of every prayer; and whatever is the matter of our rejoicing, ought to be the matter of our thanksgiving.

Observe, 1. Whom he gives thanks to; To God, even the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. In our thanksgiving we must have an eye to God as God, (he is the object of thanksgiving as well as prayer,) and as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, and through whom all good comes to us. He is the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ as well as our Father; and it is matter of encouragement in all our addresses to God, that we can look to him as Christ's Father and our Father, as his God and our God, John 20. 17. Observe, II. What he gives thanks to God for; for the graces of God in them, which were evidences of the grace of God toward them; Since we heard of your faith in Christ Jesus, and of the love you have to all the saints: For the hope which is laid up for you in heaven, v. 4. 5. Faith, hope, and love, are the three principal graces in the Christian life, and proper matter of our prayer and thanksgiving. 1. He gives thanks for their faith in Christ Jesus: that they were brought to believe in him, and take upon them the profession of his religion, and venture their souls upon his undertaking. 2. For their love. Besides the general love which is due to all men, there is a peculiar love owing to the saints, or those who are of the Christian brotherhood, 1 Pet. 2. 17. We must love all the saints, hear an extensive kindness and good-will to good men, notwithstanding lesser points of difference, and many real weaknesses. Some understand it of their charity to the saints in necessity, which is one branch and evidence of Christian love. 3. For their hope; the hope which is laid up for, v. 5. They have heard of the word of the gospel, of heaven is called their hope, because it is the thing hoped for; looking for the blessed hope, Tit. 2. 13. What is laid out upon believers in this world, is much; but what is laid up for them in heaven, is much more. And we have reason to give thanks to God for the hope of heaven, which good Christians have; or their well-grounded expectation of the future glory. Their faith in Christ, and love to the saints, have an immediate and constant hope in their eternal heaven. The more we fix our hopes on the recompense of reward in the other world, the more free and liberal shall we be of our earthly treasure upon all occasions of doing good.

Having blessed God for these graces, he blesses God for the means of grace which they enjoyed: Wherein ye heard before in the word of the truth of the gospel. They had heard of the word of the gospel, and this hope laid up for them in heaven. Observe, (1.) The gospel is the word of truth, and what we may safely venture our immortal souls upon: it proceeds from the God of truth, and the Spirit of truth, and is a faithful saying. He calls it, the grace of God in truth, v. 6. (2.) It is a great mercy to hear this word of truth; for the great thing we learn from it, is, the happiness of heaven. Eternal life is brought to light by the gospel, 2 Tim. 1. 10. They heard of the things which are laid up in heaven in the word of the truth of the gospel; "Which is come unto you, as it is in all the world, and bringeth forth fruit, as it doth also in you," v. 6. This gospel is preached, and bringeth forth fruit in other nations; it is come to you, as it is in all the world, according to the commission, Go preach the gospel in all the nations, and to every creature." Observe, [1.] All who hear the word of the gospel, ought to bring forth the fruit of the gospel, be obedient to it, and have their principles and lives formed according to it. This was the doctrine first preach'd; Bring forth therefore fruits meet for repentance, Matt. 3. 8. And our Lord says, If ye know these things, happy are ye if ye do them, John 13. 17. Observe, [2.] Wherever the gospel comes, it will bring forth fruit in knowledge and glory of God. It bringeth forth fruit, as it doth also in you, v. 6. We must take, if we think to monopolize the comforts and benefits of the gospel to ourselves. Does the gospel bring forth fruit in us? So it does in others. He takes this occasion to mention the minister by whom they believed; (v. 7. 8.) As ye also learned of Epaphras, our dear fellow-servant, who is for you a faithful minister of Christ. He mentions him with great respect, not only as a minister, but as one was an apostle, and the other an ordinary minister. Secondly, He calls him his dear fellow-servant; all the servants of Christ ought to love one another, and it is an endearing consideration, that they are engaged in the same service. Thirdly, He represents him as one who was a faithful minister of Christ to them, who discharged his trust, and fulfilled his ministry among them. Observe, Christ is our proper Master, and we are his ministers. He does not say, who is your minister; but who is the minister of Christ for you. It is by his authority and appointment, though for the people's service.

Fourthly, He represents him as one who gave them a good word; Who also declared unto us your love in the Spirit, v. 8. He recommends him to their affection, from the good report he made of their sincere love to Christ and all his members, which was wrought in them by the Spirit, and is agreeable to the Spirit of the gospel. Faithful ministers are glad to be able to speak well of their people.

9. For this cause we also, since the day we heard it, do not cease to pray for you, and to desire that ye might be filled with the knowledge of his will in all wisdom and spiritual understanding; 10. That ye might walk worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing, being fruitful in every good work, and increasing in the knowledge of God; 11. Strengthened with all might, according to his glorious power, unto all patience and long-suffering with joyfulness:

The apostle proceeds in these verses to pray for them. He heard that they were good, and he prayed that they might be better. He was constant in his prayer: We do not cease to pray for you. It may be, he could hear of them but seldom, but he constantly prayed for them—And desire that ye might be filled with the knowledge, &c. Observe what it is that he begs of God for them.

1. That they might be knowing, intelligent Christians; filled with the knowledge of his will, in all wisdom and spiritual understanding. Observe, (1.) The knowledge of our duty is the best knowledge. Wherever we entend to go, we must be well informed of the way there. The more we know of things, the more we shall be in the way of doing them. Significant. Our knowledge of the will of God must be always practical: we must know it, in order of do it. (2.) Our knowledge is then a blessing indeed, when it is in wisdom, when we know how to apply our general knowledge to our particular occasions, and to suit it to all emergencies. (3.) Christians should endeavour to be filled with knowledge; not only to know the will of God, but to know more of it, and to increase in the knowledge of God, (as it is, v. 10.) and to grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour, 2 Pet. 3. 18.

2. That their conversation might be good. Good knowledge, without a good life, will not profit. Our understanding is then a spiritual understanding, when we exemplify it in our way of living—That ye might walk worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing, v. 10. That is, as become the vocation that we stand in to him, and the profession we make of him. The agreeableness of our conversation to our religion is pleasing to God as well as to good men. We walk unto all well-pleasing, when we walk in all things according to the will of God—being fruitful in every good work. This is what we should aim at. Good words will not do without good works. We must abound in good works, and in every good work; not in some only, which are more easy, and suitable and safe, but in all, and in every instance of them. There must be a regular, uniform regard to all the will of God. And the more fruitful we are in good works, the more we shall increase in the knowledge of God. He who doth his will, shall know of the doctrine whether it be of God, John 7. 17.
3. That they might be strengthened; strengthened ed with all might, according to his glorious power, (v. 11.) fortified against the temptations of Satan, and furnished for all their duty. It is a great comfort to us, that he who undertakes to give strength to his people, is a God of power, and of glorious power. Where there is spiritual life, there is never spiritual strength; and strength in all the actions of the spiritual life. To be strengthened, is to be furnished by the grace of God for every good work, and fortified by that grace against every evil one: it is to be enabled to do our duty, and still to hold fast our integrity. The blessed Spirit is the Author of this strength: for we are strengthened with might:
by his Spirit in the inward man, Eph. 3. 16. The word of God is power, and he that believeth in it receiveth it; and it must be fetched in by prayer. It was an answer to earnest prayer that the apostle obtained sufficient grace. In praying for spiritual strength we are not straitened in the promises, and therefore should not be straitened in our own hopes and desires. Observe, (1.) He prays that they might be strengthened with might: that seems a tautology; but he means, that they might be mightily strengthened, or overshadowed with a power derived from heaven.
(2.) It is with all might. It seems unreasonable that a creature should be strengthened with all might, for that is to make him almighty; but he means, with all that might which we have occasion for, to enable us to discharge our duty or preserve our innocence; that grace which is sufficient for us in all the trials of life, and able to help us in time of need. (3.)
It is according to his glorious power. Here, not as the patience of a poor man, but according to the grace of God; but the grace of God in the hearts of believers is the power of God; and there is a glory in this power; it is an excellent and sufficient power. And the communications of strength are not according to our weakness, to whom the strength is communicated, but according to his power, from whom it is received. When God gives, gives like himself; and when he strengthens, he strengthens like himself. (4.) The special use of this strength was for suffering work; That ye may be strengthened unto all patience and long-suffering with joyfulness. He prays not only that they might be supported under their troubles, but strengthened for them: the reason is, there is work to be done even eny. not even when we are suffering. And they who are strengthened according to his glorious power, are strengthened, [1.] To all patience. When patience helps us, and finds us, and keeps us, we are strengthened to all patience; when we not only bear our troubles patiently, but receive them as gifts from God, and are thankful for them. To you it is given to suffer, Phil. 1. 29. When we bear our troubles well, though ever so many, and the circumstances of them ever so aggravating, then we bear them with all patience. And the same reason for bearing our troubles, will hold for bearing another, if it be a good reason. All patience includes all the kind of it; not only bearing patience, but waiting patience.
[2.] This is even unto long-suffering, patience drawn out to a great length: not only to bear for a while, but to bear it as long as God pleases to continue it. [3.] It is with joyfulness: to rejoice in tribulation, to take joyfully the spoiling of our goods, and rejoice that we are counted worthy to suffer for his name; to have joy in our suffering in the troubles of life. This we could never do by any strength of our own, but as we are strengthened by the grace of God.

12. Giving thanks unto the Father, who hath made us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light: 13. Who delivered us from the power of darkness, and hath translated us into the kingdom of his dear Son; 14. In whom we have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins; 15. Who is the image of the invisible God, the first-born of every creature: 16. For by him were all things created, that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be principalities, or powers: all things were created by him, and for him: 17. And he is before all things, and by him all things consist: 18. And he is the head of the body, the church; who is the beginning, the first-born from the dead; that in all things he might have the pre-eminence. 19. For it pleased the Father that in him should all fulness dwell; 20. And, having made peace through the blood of his cross, by him to reconcile all things unto himself; by him, I say, whether they be things in earth, or things in heaven. 21. And you that were sometime alienated and enemies in your mind by wicked works, yet now hath he reconciled. 22. In the body of his flesh through death, to present you holy and unblameable and unreprensible in his sight: 23. If ye continue in the faith grounded and settled, and be not moved away from the hope of the gospel, which ye have heard, and which was preached to every creature which is under heaven; whereof I Paul am made a minister; 24. Who now rejoice in my sufferings for you, and fill up that which is behind of the afflictions of Christ in my flesh for his body's sake, which is the church; 25. Whereof I am made a minister, according to the dispensation of God which is given to me for you, to fulfil the word of God; 26. Even the mystery which hath been hid from ages and from generations, but now is made manifest to his saints: 27. To whom God would make known what is the riches of the glory of this mystery among the Gentiles; which is Christ in you, the hope of glory: 28. Whom we preach, warning every man, and teaching every man in all wisdom; that we may present every man perfect in Christ Jesus: 29. Whereunto I also laboure, striving according to his working, which worketh in me mightily.

Here is the summary of the doctrine of the gospel concerning the great work of our redemption by Christ. It comes in here not as the matter of a sermon, but as the matter of a thanksgiving: for our salvation by Christ furnishes us with abundant matter of thanking in every view of it; Giving thanks unto the Father, v. 12. He does not discourse of the work of redemption in the natural or order of it; for then he should speak of the purchase of it first, and afterward of the application of it.
But here he inverts the order; because, in our sense and feeling of it, the application goes before the purchase. We first find the benefits of redemption in our own hearts, and then are led by those streams to the Original and Fountain-head. The Grace and Consecration of the Apostile's discourse may be considered in the following manner.

I. He speaks concerning the operations of the Spirit of grace upon us. We must give thanks for them, because these are qualified for an interest in the mediation of the Son; Giving thanks to the Father, &c. v. 12, 13. It is spoken of as the work of the Father, because the Spirit of grace is the Spirit of the Father, and the Father works in us by his Spirit. They in whom the work of grace is wrought, must give thanks unto the Father. If we have the comfort of it, we must have the glory of it. Now what is it which is wrought for us in the application of redemption?

1. "He hath delivered us from the power of darkness, v. 13. He hath rescued us from the state of heathenish darkness and wickedness. He hath saved us from the dominion of sin, which is darkness; (1 John 1. 6.) from the dominion of Satan, who is the prince of darkness; (Eph. 6. 12.) and from the damnable hell, which is utter darkness, Matt. 25. 30. They are called out of darkness," 1 Pet. 2. 9.

2. "He hath translated us into the kingdom of his dear Son, brought us into the gospel-state, and made us members of the church of Christ, which is a state of light, and a kingdom of glory and of peace. We are now "ye light in the Lord, Eph. 5. 8. Who hath called you out of darkness into his marvellous light," 1 Pet. 2. 9. They were made willing subjects of Christ, who were the slaves of Satan. The conversion of a sinner is the translation of a soul into the kingdom of Christ out of the kingdom of the Devil. The power of sin is shaken off, and the power of Christ submitted to. The law of the Spirit of life is in me, but the law of sin and death is in me; Rom. 7. 22. It is the kingdom of his dear Son, of the Son of his peculiar love, his beloved Son, (Matt. 3. 17.) and eminently the Beloved, Eph. 1. 6.

3. "He hath not only done this, but hath made us meet to partake of the inheritance of the saints in light, v. 12. He hath prepared us for the eternal happiness of heaven, as the Israelites divided the Promised Land by lot; and hath given us the earnest of the inheritance of all things, that we might be heirs of the glory of God; Eph. 1. 14. And it is an inheritance of the saints; proper to sanctified souls. They who are not saints on earth, will never be saints in heaven. It is an inheritance in light; the perfection of knowledge, holiness, and joy, by communion with God, who is light, and the Father of lights, Jam. 1. 17. 1 John 1. 5. (2.) What this grace is. It is a meekness for the inheritance. He hath made no meet to be partaking, salted and fitted to be the state by a upright temper and habit of soul; and he must not meet by the powerful influence of his Spirit." It is the effect of the divine power to change the heart, and make it heavenly. Observe, All who are designed for heaven hereafter, are prepared for heaven now. As they who live and die unsanctified, go out of the world with their hell about them; so they who are sanctified and renewed, go out of the world with their heaven about them. They who have the inheritance of sons, have the education of sons and the disposition of sons: they have the Spirit of adoption, whereby they cry, Abba, Father, Romans 8. 15. And because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father, Gal. 4. 6.

This number for us is the earnest of the Spirit in our heart; which is part of payment, and assures the full payment. They who are sanctified, shall be glorified, (Rom. 8. 30.) and will be for ever indebted to the grace of God, which hath sanctified them.

II. Concerning the person of the Redeemer. Glorious things are here said of him; for blessed Paul was full for Christ, and took all occasions to speak honourably of him. He speaks of him distinctly as God, and as Mediator. As God he speaks of him, v. 15—17.

1. He is the Image of the invisible God. Not as man was made in the image of God, (Gen. 1. 26.) in his natural faculties and dominion over the creatures: no, he is the express Image of his person, Heb. 1. 3. He is so the Image of God, as the Son is the image of his Father, who has a natural likeness to him; and as he who has seen him, has seen the Father: and his glory was the glory of the only begotten of the Father, John 1. 14.—14. 9.

2. He is the First-born of every creature. Not that he is himself a creature; for it is ἐναρκτικός ὁ θεός ἡμῶν ἡμῶν—born or begotten before all the creation, or any creature, was made; which is the scriptur-way of representing eternity, and by which the variety of things is represented to us; I was set up from everlasting, from the beginning, or ever the earth was; when there was no depth, before the mountains were settled, while as yet he had not made the earth, Prov. 8. 23—26. It signifies his dominion over all things; as the first-born in a family is heir and lord of all, so he is the Heir of all things, Heb. 1. 2. The word, with only the change in the accent, ἐναρκτικός, signifies actively, the first begotten of all things, and so it well agrees with the following clause: Vid. Isidor. Pelus. epist. 30. lib. 3.

3. He is so far from being himself a creature, that he is the Creator: For by him were all things created, which are in heaven and earth, visible and invisible, v. 16. He made all things out of nothing; the highest angel in heaven, as well as men upon earth. He made the world, the upper and lower world, the part of the world, the world and its works. He was made by him, and without him was not any thing made, which was made, John 1. 3. He speaks here, as if there were several orders of angels; whether thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers—which must signify either different degrees of excellence, or different offices and employment. Angels, authorities, and powers, 1 Pet. 3. 22. Christ is the eternal Wisdom of the Father, and the world was made in wisdom. He is the eternal Word, and the world was made by the word of God. He is the Arm of the Lord, and the world was made by that arm. All things are created by him and for him; δι’ αὐτοῦ καὶ ἐν αὐτῷ. Being created by him, they were created for him; being made by his power, they were made according to his pleasure, and for his praise. He is the End, as well as the Cause of all things. To him are all things, Rom. 11. 36. συνάχθησαν ἐν αὐτῷ. 4. He is before all things. He had a being before the world was made; before the beginning of time, and therefore from all eternity. Wisdom was with the Father, and possessed by him in the beginning of his ways, before his works of old, Prov. 8. 22. And in the beginning the Word was with God, and was God, John 1. 1. He not only had a being before he was born of the virgin, but he had a being before all time.

5. By him all things consist. They not only sit in their beings, but consist in their order and de pendencies. He not only created them all at first, but it is by the word of his power that they are still upheld, Heb. 1. 3. The whole creation is kept together by the power of the Son of God, and made to consist in its proper frame. It is preserved from disputing, and running into confusion.

The apostle next shews what he is as Mediator, v. 18, 19. (1.) He is the Head of the body, the church: not only a Head of government and direction, as the king is the head of the state, and has right to prescribe laws, but a Head of vital influence, as the head in the natural body: for all grace and strength are derived from him; and the church is his body, the foundation of his fillet, 1 Cor. 12. 12, 23. (2.) He is the Head of the body, the First-born from the dead; the Principle, the First-born from the dead; the Principle of our resurrection, as well as the First-born himself. All our hopes and joys take their rise from him who is the Author of our salvation. Not that he was the first who ever rose from the dead, but the first and only one who rose by his own power, and was declared to be the Son of God, and Lord of all things. And he is the Head of the resurrection, and has given an example and evidence of our resurrection from the dead. He rose as the First-fruits, 1 Cor. 15. 20. (3.) He hath in all things the pre-eminence. It was the will of the Father that he should have all power in heaven and earth, that he might be preferred above angels, and all the powers in heaven; (he has obtained a more excellent name than they, Heb. 1. 4.) and that in all the affairs of God among men he should have the pre-eminence. He has the pre-eminence in the hearts of his people above the world and the flesh; and by giving him the pre-eminence we comply with the Father's will, That all men should honour the Son, even as they honour the Father, John 5. 23.

(4.) All fulness dwells in him, and it pleased the Father that he should so; (v. 19.) not only a fulness of abundance for himself, but redundancy for us; a fulness of merit and righteousness, of strength and grace. As the head is the seat and source of the animal spirits, so is Christ of all graces to his people. It pleased the Father that all fulness should dwell in him; and we may have free resort to him for all that grace which we have occasion for. He not only intercedes for it, but is the Trustee in whose hands it is lodged to dispense to us. Of his fulness we receive, and have free access to it; grace in us answering to that grace which is in him; (John 1. 16.) and he fills all in all, Eph. 1. 23.

III. Concerning the work of redemption. He speaks of the nature of it, or wherein it consists; and of the means of it, by which it was procured.

1. Wherein it consists. It is made to lie in two things. (1.) In the remission of sin; In whom we have redemption, even the forgiveness of sins, v. 14. It was sin which, sin which ensnared us: if we are redeemed, we must be redeemed from sin; and this is by forgiveness, or remitting the obligation to punishment. So Eph. 1. 7. In whom we have redemption, the forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of his grace. (2.) In reconciliation to God, God by him reconciled all things to himself, v. 20. He is the mediator of reconciliation, who procures peace between us and God, and reconciles us to him by a friendship and favour at present, and will bring all holy creatures, angels as well as men, into one glorious and blessed society at last: things in earth, or things in heaven. So Eph. 1. 10. He will gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven, and which are on earth. The word is derived—

he reconciled, v. 21. Here see what was their condition by nature, and in their Gentile state—estranged from God, and at enmity with God: and yet this enmity is slain, and, notwithstanding this distance, we are now reconciled. Christ has laid the foundation of our reconciliation; but he is the one mediator, the price of it, has purchased the proffer and promise of it, proclaims it as a Prophet, applies it as a King. Observe, The greatest enemies to God, who have stood at the greatest distance, and hidden themselves, may be reconciled, if it is not their own fault.

2. How the redemption is procured; It is through his blood, (v. 14.) he has made peace through the blood of his cross, (v. 20.) and it is in his body of his church, Eph. 5. 22. It is the blood of Christ; made an atonement, for the blood is the life; and without the shedding of blood there is no remission, Heb. 9. 22. There was such a value in the blood of Christ, that, on the account of Christ's shedding it, God was willing to deal with men upon new terms, and bring them under a covenant of grace; and for his sake, and in consideration of his death upon the cross, to pardon and accept to favour all who come with him.

IV. Concerning the preaching of this redemption. Here observe,

1. To whom it was preached; To every creature under heaven; (v. 23.) it was ordered to be preached to every creature, Mark 16. 15. It may be preached to every creature; for the gospel excludes none who do not exclude themselves. More or less it has been, or will be, preached to every creature; for in the church, and to the world, it has been a object of suspicion to some; and perhaps some have never yet enjoyed it.

2. By whom it was preached; Whereof I Paul am a minister. Paul was a great apostle; but he looks upon it as the highest of his titles of honour, to be a minister of the gospel of Jesus Christ. Paul takes all occasions to speak of his office; for he magnified his office, Rom. 11. 15. And again in v. 25. Whereof I am made a minister. Observe here, (1.) Whence Paul had his ministry; it was according to the dispensation of God which was given to him, (v. 25.) the economy or wise disposition of things in the house of the God. He was steward and master-builder, and this was given to him: he did not usurp it, or take it to himself; and he could not challenge it as a debt. He received it from God as a gift, and took it as a favour. (2.) For whose sake he had his ministry; for the world was his, and the word of God, which is our servants for Jesus' sake, Cor. 4. 5. We are Christ's ministers for the good of his people: to fulfil the word of God, fully to preach it, of which you will have the greater advantage. The more we fulfil our ministry, or fill up the parts of it, the greater will be the benefit of the people; they will be the more filled with knowledge, and furnished for service. (2.) What kind of preacher Paul was. This is particularly represented, Eph. 4. 11. He was a spiritual father; Who now rejoice in my sufferings for you, v. 24. He suffered in the cause of Christ, and for the good of the church. He suffered for preaching the gospel to them. And while he suffered in so good a cause, he could rejoice in his sufferings; rejoice that he was counted worthy to suffer, and esteem it an honour to him. And fill up that which is behind of the afflictions of Christ, (1.) He was suffering in the body of Paul, or any other, who were suffering for sin, as the sufferings of Christ were. There was nothing wanting in them; nothing which needed to be filled up: they were perfectly sufficient to answer the intention of them, the satisfaction of God's justice, in order to the salvation of his people. But the sufferings of Paul and other good ministers made them conformable to Christ; and they fell all in his suffering state: so they are said to fill up what was behind of the sufferings of Christ, as the wax fills up the vacancies of the seal, when it receives the impression of it. Or it may be meant not of Christ's sufferings, but of his suffering for Christ. He filled up that which was behind. He had a certain rate and measure of suffering for Christ assigned him; and as his sufficiency was given, so was an appointed portion, so he was still filling up more and more what was behind, or remained of them to his share.

[2.] He was a close preacher: he preached not only in public, but from house to house, from person to person; Whom we preach, warning every man, and teaching every man in all wisdom, v. 28. Every man has need to be warned and taught, and therefore let every man have his share. Observe, We must teach them what they do amiss, we must teach them to do better: warning and teaching must go together. Secondly, Men must be warned and taught in all wisdom. We must choose the fittest seasons, and use the likeliest means, and accommodate ourselves to the different circumstances and capacities of those we have to do with, and teach them as they are able to bear. That which he aimed at, was to make a strong impression on his hearers; and accordingly he enlarged, and diversified his discourse, making it as perfect as the knowledge of the Christian doctrine; (Let us therefore, as many as are perfect, be thus minded, Philip. 3. 15. 2 Tim. 3. 17.) or else crowned with a glorious reward hereafter, when he will present himself a glorious church, (Eph. 5. 27.) and bring them to the spirits of just men made perfect, Heb. 12. 23. Observe, Ministers ought to aim at the improvement and salvation of every soul that hears person who has an opportunity. Thirdly, He was a laborious preacher, and one who took pains: he was no loiterer, and did not do the work of the Lord negligently; (v. 29.) Whereunto I also labour, striving according to his working, which worketh in me mightily. He laboured and strove; used great diligence, and contended with many difficulties, according to the measure of grace afforded to him, and the extraordinary presence of Christ which was with him. Observe, As Paul did apply himself to do much good; so he had this favour, that the power of God wrought in him the more effectually. The more we labour in the work of the Lord, the greater measure of help we may expect from him in it; (Eph. 3. 7.) According to the gift of the grace of God given unto me, by the effectual working of his power.

Let us consider, The gospel which was preached. We have an account of that; even the mystery which hath been hid from ages, and from generations, but is now made manifest to his saints, v. 26, 27. Observe, (1.) The mystery of the gospel was long hidden: it was concealed from ages and generations, the several ages of the church under the Old Testament-disposition. They were in a state of minority, and training up for a more perfect state of things, and could not look for the event of this perfect in Christ. Observe, 2 Cor. 3. 13. (2.) This mystery now, in the fulness of time, is made manifest to the saints, or clearly revealed and made apparent. The veil which was over Moses' face, is done away in Christ, 2 Cor. 3. 14. The meanest saint under the gospel understands more than the greatest prophets under the law. He who is least in the kingdom of heaven, is greater than they. The mystery of Christ was never so publicly known, as it is now revealed unto his holy apostles and prophets by the Spirit, Eph. 3. 4, 5. And what is this mystery? It is the riches of God's glory among the Gentiles. The peculiar doctrine of the gospel was a mystery which was before hid, and is now made manifest and made known. But the great mystery here referred to, is, the breaking down the partition-wall between the Jew and Gentile, and preaching the gospel to the Gentile world, and making them partakers of the privileges of the gospel-state who before lay in ignorance and idolatry; that the Gentiles should be fellow-heirs, and of the same body, and partakers together of his promise in Christ by the gospel, Eph. 3. 5. Which mystery, thus made known, is Christ in you the hope of glory, or among you. Observe, Christ is the hope of glory. The object of our hope is Christ in the word, or the gospel-revelation, declaring the nature and methods of obtaining it. The evidence of our hope is Christ in the heart, or the sanctification of the soul, and its preparation for the heavenly glory.

4. The duty of those who are interested in this redemption; If ye continue in the faith, grounded and settled, ye shall not be moved away from the hope of the gospel which ye have heard, and have believed, and do observe, We must continue in the faith grounded and settled, and not be moved away from the hope of the gospel, that is, we must be so well fixed in our minds, as not to be moved from it by any temptations. We must be steadfast and unmovable, (1 Cor. 15. 38.) and hold fast the profession of our faith withoutwavering, Heb. 10. 23. Observe, Then only can we expect to see the end of his kingdom, to beget a seed, to reign in the faith, and are so far grounded and settled in it, as not to be moved from it. We must not draw back unto perdition, but believe unto the saving of the soul, Heb. 10. 39. We must be faithful to death, through all trials, that we may receive the crown of life, and receive the end of our faith, the salvation of our souls, 1 Pet. 1. 9.

CHAP. II. 1. The apostle expresses concern for the Colossians, v. 1. 4. II. He repeats it again, v. 5. He cautions them against false teachers among the Jews, v. 6. 7. and against the Gentile philosophy, v. 8. 12. IV. He represents the privileges of Christians, v. 13. 15. And concludes with a caution against the judaizing teachers, and those who would introduce the worship of angels, v. 16. 29.

I. FOR I would that ye knew what great conflict I have for you, and for them at Laodicea, and for as many as have not seen my face in the flesh; 2. That their hearts might be comforted, being knit together in love, and unto all riches of the full assurance of understanding, to the acknowledgment of the mystery of God, and of the Father, and of Christ; 3. In whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge.

We may observe here the great concern which Paul had for these Colossians, and the other churches, which he had not any personal knowledge of. The apostle had never been at Colossae, and the church planted there was not of his planting; and yet he had as tender a care of it, as if it had been the only people of his charge; (v. 1.) For I would that ye knew what great conflict I have for you, and for them at Laodicea, and for as many as have not seen my face in the flesh. Observe, (1.) Paul's care of the church was such as amounted to a conflict. He was in a sort of agony, and had a constant fear respecting what would become of them. Herein he was a follower of his Master, who was in an agony for us, and was heard in that he feared. Observe, (2.) We may keep up a communion by faith, hope, and holy love, even with those churches and fellow-Churchians, of whom we have no personal knowledge, and with whom we have no conversation. We can think, and pray, and be concerned for one another, at the greatest distance; and those we never saw in the flesh, we may hope to meet in heaven.

But what was it that the apostle desired for them?
COLOSSIANS, i.

v. 2. That their hearts might be comforted, being knit together in love. It was their spiritual welfare that he was solicitous about. He does not say, that they may be healthy and merry, and rich and great, and prosperous; but that their hearts may be comforted. Note, The prosperity of the soul is the best prosperity, and what we should be most solicitous about for ourselves and others. We have here a description of soul-prosperity.

1. When our knowledge grows to an understanding of the mystery of God, and of the Father, and of Christ; then the soul prospers, when we come to have a distinct, mechanical knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus. To understand the mystery, either what was before concealed, but is now made known concerning the Father and Christ; or, the mystery before-mentioned, of calling the Gentiles into the Christian church, as the Father and Christ have revealed it in the gospel; and not barely to speak of it by rote, or as we have been taught by our catechisms, but to be led into it, and enter into the meaning and design of it. This is what we should labour after, and then the soul prospers.

2. When our faith grows to a full assurance, and bold acknowledgment of this mystery. (1.) To a full assurance, or a well-settled judgment, upon their proper evidence, of the great truths of the gospel; without doubting, or calling them in question, but embracing them with the highest satisfaction, as faithful sayings, and worthy of a Christian. (2.) When it comes to a free acknowledgment; and we not only believe with the heart, but are ready, when called to it, to make confession with our mouth; and are not ashamed of our Master and our holy religion, under the frowns and violence of their enemies. This is called the riches of the full assurance of understanding. Great knowledge and strong faith make a soul rich. This is being rich toward God, and rich in faith, and the true riches, Luke 12. 21. John 2. 5.

3. It consists in the abundance of comfort in our souls; That their hearts might be comforted. The soul then prospers, when it is filled with joy and peace, (Rom. 15. 13.) and has a satisfaction within, which all the troubles without cannot disturb; and is able to joy in the Lord, when all other comforts fail, Hab. 3. 17. 18.

The more intimate communion we have with our fellow-Christians, the more the soul prospers; Being knit together in love. Holy love knits the hearts of Christians one to another; and faith and love both contribute to our comfort. The stronger our faith is, and the warmer our love, the more will our comfort be.

Having occasion to mention Christ; (v. 2.) according to his usual way, he makes this remark, to his honour; (v. 3.) In whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge. He had said, (ch. 1. 19.) That all fulness dwells in him; here he mentions particularly the treasures of wisdom and knowledge. There is a fulness of wisdom in him, as he has perfectly revealed the will of God to mankind. Observe, The treasures of wisdom are hid, not from us, but for us, in Christ. They who would be wise and knowledgeable must look to Christ. We must spend upon the stock which is laid up for us in him, and draw from the treasures which are hid in him. He is the Wisdom of God, and is of God made unto us Wisdom, &c. 1 Cor. 1. 24. 30.

His concern for them is repeated; (v. 5.) Though I am absent in the flesh, yet am I with you in the spirit; justifying them that are led, and the strengthening of your faith in Christ. Observe, (1.) We may be present in spirit with those churches and Christians from whom we are absent in body; for the communion of saints is a spiritual thing. Paul had heard concerning the Colossians, that they were orderly and regular; and though he had never seen them, nor was present with them, he tells them he could easily think himself among them, and look with pleasure upon their good behaviour. Observe, (2.) The order and steadfastness of Christians are matter of joy to ministers; they joy when they behold their order, their regular behaviour, and steadfast adherence to the Christian doctrine. Observe, (3.) The more steadfast our faith in Christ is, the better order there will be in our whole conversation; for we live and walk by faith, 2 Cor. 5. 7. Heb. 10. 38.

4. And this I say, lest any man should beguile you with enticing words. 5. For though I be absent in the flesh, yet am I with you in the spirit, joying, and beholding your order, and the steadfastness of your faith in Christ. 6. As ye have therefore received Christ Jesus the Lord, so walk ye in him; 7. Rooted and built up in him, and stablished in the faith, as ye have been taught, abounding therein with thanksgiving.

5. Beware lest any man spoil you through philosophy and vain deceit, after the tradition of men, after the rudiments of the world, and not after Christ. 9. For in him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily. 10. And ye are complete in him, who is the head of all principality and power. 11. In whom also ye are circumcised with the circumcision made without hands, in putting off the body of the sins of the flesh by the circumcision of Christ: 12. Buried with him in baptism, wherein also ye are risen with him through the faith of the operation of God, who hath raised him from the dead.

The apostle cautions the Colossians against deceivers; (v. 4.) And this I say, lest any man should beguile you with enticing words; and v. 8. Least any man spoil you. He insists so much upon the perfection of Christ and the gospel-revelation, to preserve them from the insnaring insinuations of those who would corrupt their principles. Note, 1. The way in which Satan spoil souls, is, by beguiling them. He deceives them, and by it slays them. He is the old serpent who beguiled Eve through his subtlety, 2 Cor. 11. 3. He could not ruin us if he did not cheat us; and he could not cheat us but by our own fault and folly. 2. Satan's agents, who aim to spoil them, beguile them with enticing words. See the danger of enticing words; how many are ruined by the flattery of those who lie in wait to deceive; and by the false disguises and fair appearances of evil principles and wicked practices. By good words, and fair speeches, they deceive the hearts of the simple, Rom. 16. 18. 3. We ought to stand upon your guard against enticing words, and be aware and afraid of those who would entice you to any evil; for that which they aim at, is, to spoil you. If sinners entice thee, consent thou not, Prov. 1. 10. Observe, 1. A sovereign antidote against seducers; (v. 6, 7.) As ye have therefore received Christ Jesus the Lord, so walk ye in him, rooted and built up, &c. Here note, 1. All Christians have, in profession at least, received Jesus Christ the Lord; received him as Christ, the great Prophet of the church, anointed by God to reveal his will; as Jesus the great High Priest, and Saviour from sin and wrath, by the expiatory sacrifice of himself; and as Lord, or Sovereign and King, whom we are to obey and be subject to.

11. The King, whom we are to obey and be subject to.

2. The great concern of those who have received Christ, is, to walk in him; to make their practices conformable to their principles, and their conversations agreeable to their engagements. As we have received Christ, or consented to his institution in us, we must walk in him; and, therefore, take that course, and keep up our communion with him. 5. The more closely we walk with Christ, the more we are rooted and established in the faith. A good conversation is the best establishment of a good faith. If we walk in him, we shall be rooted in him; and the more firmly we are rooted in him, the more closely we shall walk in him; rooted and built up. Only in the name of the Lord, are the roots first rooted in him. We must be united to him by a lively faith, and heartily consent to his covenant; and then we shall grow up in him in all things; "As ye have been taught; according to the rule of the Christian doctrine, in which ye have been instructed."

Observe, A good education has a good influence upon our establishment. We must be established in the faith, as we have been taught, abounding therein. Being established in it, we must abound therein, and improve in it more and more; and this with thanksgiving. Again, The way to have the benefit and comfort of God's grace, is, to be much in giving thanks for it. We must join thanksgiving to all our improvements, and be sensible of the mercy of all our privileges and attainments.

Observe II. The fair warning given us of our danger; (v. 8.) Beware lest any man spoil you through philosophy and vain deceit, after the tradition of men, after the rudiments of the world, and not after Christ. There is a philosophy which is a noble exercise of our reasonable faculties, and highly serviceable to religion; such a study of the works of God as leads us to the knowledge of God, and confirms our faith in him. But there is a philosophy which is vain and deceitful; which is prejudicial to religion, and sets up the wisdom of man in competition with the wisdom of God; and while it pleases men's fancies, ruins their faith; as nice and curious speculations about things above us, or of no use and concern to us; or a care of words and terms of art, which have only an empty, and often a cheating, appearance of knowledge. After the tradition of men, after the rudiments of the world: this plainly reflects upon the Jewish philosophy or economy, as well as the Pagan learning. The Jews governed themselves by the traditions of their elders, and the rudiments or elements of the world, the rites and observances which were only preparatory and introductory to the gospel-state: the Gentiles mixed their maxims of philosophy with their Christian principles; and both alienated their minds from Christ. They who pin their faith on other men's sleeves, and walk in the way of the world, are turned away from following after Christ.

The deceivers were especially the Jewish teachers, who endeavoured to keep up the law of Moses in conjunction with the gospel of Christ, but really in competition with it, and contradiction to it. Now here the apostle shews 1. That we have in Christ the substance of all the shadows of the ceremonial law: for example, (1.) Had they then the Shechinah, or special presence of God, called the glory, from the visible token of it? So have we now in Jesus Christ; (v. 9.) For in him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily. Under the law, the presence of God dwelt between the cherubims, in a cloud which covered the mercy-seat; but now it dwells in the person of our Redeemer, who partakes of our nature, and is Body of our bones, and Flesh of our flesh; and has more clearly declared the Father to us. It dwells in him bodily; not as the body is opposed to the spirit, but as the body is opposed to the shadow. The fulness of the Godhead dwells in Christ really, and not figuratively; for he is both God and Man. (2.) Had they circumcision, which was the seal of the covenant? In Christ we are circumcised with the circumcision made without hands (v. 11.) by the work of regeneration in us, which is the spiritual or Christian circumcision, and is a Jew, who is one inwardly; and circumcision is that of the heart, Rom. 2. 29. This is owing to Christ, and belongs to the Christian dispensation. It is made without hands; not by the power of any creature, but by the power of the blessed Spirit of God. We are born of the Spirit, John 3. 5. And the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Spirit; that there is no other; putting off the body of the sins of the flesh; and that we may be holy and reforming our lives, not in mere external rites. It is not the putting away the filth of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience toward God, 1 Pet. 3. 21. And it is not enough to put away some one particular sin, but we must put off the whole body of them. The old man must be crucified, and the body of sin destroyed. Rom. 6. 6. Christ was circumcised, and by the power of his death, to him, we partake of that effectual grace which puts off the body of the sins of the flesh. Again, The Jews thought themselves complete in the ceremonial law; but we are complete in Christ, v. 10. That was imperfect and defective; if the first covenant had been faultless, there should no place have been sought for the second; (Heb. 8. 7.) and the law was but a shadow of good things, and could never, by those sacrifices, make the carpenters perfect, Heb. 10. 1. But all the defects of it are made up in the government of Christ, by the complete sacrifice for sin and revelation of the will of God; which is the head of all principality and power. As the Old Testament priesthood had its perfection in Christ; so likewise had the kingdom of David, which was the eminent principality and power under the Old Testament, and which the Jews valued themselves so much upon. And he is the Lord and Head circumcisions in heaven and earth, of angels and men. Angels and authorities and powers are subject unto him, 1 Pet. 3. 22.

2. We have communion with Christ in his whole undertaking; (v. 12.) Buried with him in baptism, wherein also ye are risen with him. We are both buried and rise with him, and both are signified by our baptism. This is figuratively represented by our being buried and rising, more any more than the crucifixion of Christ is represented by any visible resemblance in the Lord's supper: and he is speaking of the circumcision made without hands; and says, it is through the faith of the operation of God. But the thing signified by our baptism, is, that we are buried with Christ, as before; and it is the seal of the covenant, and an obligation to our dying to sin, and being risen with Christ, as it is a seal and obligation to our living to righteousness, or newness of life. God in baptism engages to be to us a God, and we become engaged to be his people, and by his grace to die to sin, and to live to righteousness, or put off the old man, and put on the new.

13. And you, being dead in your sins and the uncircumcision of your flesh, hath he quickened together with him, having forgiven you all trespasses; 14. Blotting out the hand-writing of ordinances that was against us, which was contrary to us, and took it out of the way, nailing it to his cross: 15. And having spoiled principalities and powers, he made a shew of them openly, triumphing over them in it.

The apostle here represents the privileges we Christians have above the Jews, which are very great.

1. Christ's death is our life; (v. 13.) And you, being dead in your sins and the uncircumcision of your flesh, hath he quickened together with him. A state of sin is a state of spiritual death. They who are in sin, are dead in sin. As the death of the body consists in its separation from the soul, so the death of the soul consists in its separation from God and the divine favour. As the death of the body is the corruption and putrefaction of it, so sin is the corruption or deprivation of the soul. As a man who is dead is unable to help himself by any power of his own, so an habitual sinner is morally impotent: though he has a natural power, or the power of a reasonable creature, he has not a spiritual power, till he has the divine life, or a renewed nature. It is principally to be understood of the Gentile world, who lay in wickedness. They were dead in the uncircumcision of their flesh, being aliens to the covenant of promise, and without God in the world, Eph. 2. 12. Their nature, and their condition, were dead in their sins. It may be understood of the spiritual uncircumcision or corruption of nature; and so it shews that we are dead in law, and dead in state.

Dead in law, as a condemned malefactor is called a dead man because he is under a sentence of death; so sinners by the guilt of sin are under the sentence of the law, and condemned already, John 3. 18. And dead in state, by reason of the circumcision of our flesh. An unspiritual heart is called an uncircumcised heart: this is our state.

Now through Christ, we, who were dead in sins, are quickened; effectual provision is made for the taking away the guilt of sin, and breaking the power and dominion of it. Quickened together with him; by virtue of our union to him, and in conformity to him. Christ's death was the death of our sins; Christ's resurrection is the quickening of our souls.

2. Through him we have the remission of sin; Having forgiven you all trespasses. This is our quickening. The pardon of the crime is the life of the criminal: and this is owing to the resurrection of Christ, as well as his death; for as he died for our sins, so he rose again for our justification, Rom. 4. 25.

3. Whatever is in force against us, is taken out of the way. He has obtained for us a legal discharge from the hand-writing of ordinances, which was against us; (v. 14.) which may be understood, (1.) Of that obligation to punishment, in which consists the guilt of sin. The curse of the law is the hand-writing against us, like the hand-writing on Bel shazzar's wall. Cursed is every one who continueth not in every thing. This was a hand-writing which was against us, and contrary to us; for it threatened our eternal ruin. This was removed when he redeemed us from the curse being a curse for us, Gal. 3. 13. He cancelled the obligation for all who repent and believe. "Upon me be the curse, my father." He vacated and disannulled the judgment which was against us. When he was nailed to the cross, the curse was as it were nailed to the cross. And our indwelling corruption is crucified with Christ, and by the virtue of his cross. When we remember the death of the Lord Jesus, and see him nailed to the cross, we should see the hand-writing against us taken out of the way. Or rather, (2.) It must be understood of the ceremonial law; the hand-writing of ordinances, the ceremonial institutions or the law of commandments contained in ordinances, (Eph. 2. 15.) which was a yoke to the Jews, and a partition-wall to the Gentiles. The Lord Jesus took it out of the way, nailing it to his cross; disannulled the obligation of it, that all might see and be satisfied it was no more binding. When the substance was come, the shadows flee away. It is abolished; (2 Cor. 3. 13.) and that which decayeth and waxeth old, is ready to vanish away, Heb. 8. 13. The expressions are in allusion to the ancient method of canceling a bond, either by crossing the writing, or striking it through with a nail.

4. He has obtained a glorious victory for us over the powers of darkness; And having spoiled principalities and powers, he made a shew of them openly, triumphing over them in it, v. 15. As the curse of the law was against us, so the power of Satan was against us. He treated with God as the judge, and redeemed us out of the hands of his justice by a price; but out of the hands of Satan the executioner he redeemed us by power and with a high hand. He led captivity captive. The Devil and all the powers of hell were conquered and disarmed by the dying Redeemer. The first promise pointed at this; the bruising of the heel of Christ in his sufferings, was the breaking the serpent's head, Gen. 3. 15. The oppressions are lofty; and magnified; let us turn aside, and see this great sight. The Redeemer conquered by dying. See his crown of thorns turned into a crown of laurels. He spoiled them, broke the Devil's power, and conquered and disabled him, and made a shew of them openly; exposed them to public shame, and made a shew of them to angels and men. Never had the Devil's kingdom such a mortal blow given to it, as was given by the Lord Jesus. He tied them to his chariot-wheels, and rode forth conquering and to conquer; alluding to the custom of a general's triumph, who returned victorious, triumphing over them in it, either in his cross and by his death; or, as some read it, in himself, by his own power; for he trod in the vine-press alone, and of the people there was none with him.

16. Let no man therefore judge you in meat, or in drink, or in respect of a holyday, or of the new moon, or of the sabbathdays: 17. Which are a shadow of things to come; but the body is of Christ. 18. Let no man beguile you of your reward in a voluntary humility and worshiping of angels, intruding into those things which he hath not seen, vainly puffing up by his fleshly mind. 19. And not holding the Head, from which all the body, by joints and bands, having nourishment ministered, and knit together, increaseth with the increase of God. 20. Wherefore if ye be dead with Christ from the rudiments of the world, why, as though living in the world, are ye subject to ordinances? 21. (Touch not; taste not; handle not;) Which all are to perish with the using; after the commandments and doctrines of men? 22. Which things have indeed a shew of wisdom in will-worship, and humility, and neglecting of the body; not in any honour to the satisfying of the flesh.

The apostle concludes the chapter with exhortations to proper duty which he infers from the foregoing discourses.
COLOSSIANS, III.

I. Here is a caution to take heed of judaizing teachers, or those who would impose upon Christians the yoke of the ceremonial law; Let no man therefore judge you in meat or in drink, &c. v. 16.

Much of the ceremonies of the law of Moses consisted in the distinction of meats and days. It appears by Rom. 14. there were such who were for keeping up those distinctions: but here the apostle shews, that since Christ is come, and has cancelled the ceremonial law, it is not meet to keep up. "Let no man impose those things upon you, for God has not imposed them: if God has made you free, be not you again entangled in that yoke of bondage." And this the rather, because these things were shadows of things to come; (v. 17.) intimating, that they had no intrinsic worth in them, and that they are now done away. But the body is of Christ: the body, of which they were shadows, is come; and practices, which the ceremonial law allowed, were only types and shadows of Christ and the gospel, carries an intimation that Christ is not yet come, and the gospel-state not yet commenced. Observe the advantages we have under the gospel, above what they had under the law: they had the shadows, we the substance.

II. He cautions them to take heed of those who would introduce the worship of angels as mediators between God and them, as the Gentile philosophers did; Let no man beguile you of your reward in a voluntary humility, and worshipping of angels, v. 18. It looked like a piece of modesty to make use of the mediation of angels, as conscious to ourselves of our unworthiness to speak immediately to God: but though it has a show of humility, it is a voluntary, not a commanded humility; and therefore it is not receivable, yea, it is not warrantable. It is taking that honour which is due to Christ only, and giving it to a creature. Besides, the notions upon which this practice was grounded, were merely the inventions of men, and not by divine revelation; the proud conceits of human reason, which makes men presume to dive into things, and determine them, without sufficient knowledge and warrant; intruding into those things which he hath not seen, v. 19. The apostle, in this passage, goes on to shew that he really despises the order of angels, and their respective ministries, which God has hidden from us; and therefore, though there was a show of humility in the practice, there was a real pride in the principle. They advanced those notions to gratify their own carnal fancy, and were fond of being thought wiser than other people. Pride is at the bottom of a great many errors and corruptions, and even of many evil practices, and nourishes the worship of angels as mediators with God and man. They who do, do not hold the Head, v. 19. They did, in effect, disclaim Christ, who is the only Mediator between God and man. It is the highest disparagement to Christ, who is the Head of the church, for any of the members of it to make use of any intercessors with God but him. When men let go their hold of Christ, they catch at that which is not. They, in them, among which all the body, by joints and bands, having nourishment ministered, and knit together, increase with the increase of God. Observe, 1. Jesus Christ is not only a Head of government over the church, but a Head of vital influence to it. They are knit to him by joints and bands, as the several members of the body are united to the head, and receive life and nourishment from him. Observe, 2. The increase of Christ is an increase body is increase with the increase of God. The new man is increasing, and the nature of grace is to grow, where there is not an accidental hinderance. With the increase of God; with an increase of grace which is from God as its Author; or, in a usual Hebraism, with a large and abundant increase. That ye may be filled with all the fulness of God, Eph. 3. 19. See a parallel expression, Which is the Head, even Christ, from whom the whole body, fitly joined together, maketh increase of the body, Eph. 4. 15, 16.

He takes occasion from hence to warn them again; Wherefore, if ye be dead with Christ from the rudiments of the world, why, as though living in the world, are ye subject to ordinances? v. 20. If as Christians ye are dead to the observances of the ceremonial law, why are ye subject to them? Such observances, Touch not, taste not, handle not," v. 21, 22. Under the law there was a ceremonial pollution contracted by touching a dead body, or any thing offered to an idol; or by tasting any forbidden meats, &c. which all are to perish with the using; having no intrinsic worth in themselves to support them; and they who used them saw them perishing and passing away: or, which tend to corrupt the Christian faith, having no other authority than the traditions of men, and traditions of men. Which if ye have indeed a shew of wisdom in will-worship and humility. They thought themselves wiser than their neighbours, in observing the law of Moses together with the gospel of Christ, that they might be sure in one at least, to be in the right; but alas, it was but a shew of wisdom, a mere invention and pretence. So they seem to neglect the body, by abstaining from such and such meats, and mortifying the body, as if there were nothing of true value in these things, for the gospel teaches us to worship God in spirit and truth, and not by ritual observances; and through the mediation of Christ alone, and not of any angels. Observe, 1. (1.) Christians are freed by Christ from the ritual observances of Moses's law, and delivered from that yoke of bondage which God himself had laid upon them. (2.) Subjection to ordinances, or human appointments in the worship of God, is highly blameable, and contrary to the freedom and liberty of the gospel. The apostle requires Christians to stand fast in the liberty with which Christ hath made them free, and not be entangled again with the yoke of bondage, Gal. 5. 1. And the imposition of them is invading the authority of Christ, the Head of the church, and introducing another law of commandments contained in ordinances, when Christ has commandments of his own, Gal. 5. 1. Observe, 2. (1.) Such things have only a shew of wisdom, but are really folly. True wisdom is, to keep close to the appointment of the gospel; and an entire subjection to Christ, the only Head of the church.

CHAP. III.

I. The apostle exhorts us to set our hearts upon heaven, and take them off from this world, v. 1 . . 4. II. He exhorts to the mortification of sin, in the various instances of it, v. 5 . . 11. III. He earnestly presses to mutual love and compassion, v. 12, . 17. And concludes with exhortations to relative duties; of wives and husbands, parents and children, masters and servants, v. 18 . . 25.

1. If ye then be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God.
2. Set your affection on things above, not on things on the earth. 3. For ye are dead, and your life is hid with Christ in God. 4. When Christ, who is our life, shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory.

The apostle, having described our privileges by Christ in the former part of the epistle, and our discharge from the yoke of the ceremonial law, comes here to press upon us our duty inferred from thence. Though we are made free from the obligation of the ceremonial law, it does not therefore follow that we live as we list. We must walk the more closely with God in all the instances of evangelical obedience. He begins with exhorting them to set their hearts on heaven, and take them off from this world; If ye then be risen with Christ. It is our privilege, that we are risen with Christ, have benefit by the resurrection of Christ; and by virtue of our union and communion with him are justified and sanctified, and shall be glorified. From hence he infers that we must seek those things which are above. We must mind the concerns of another world more than the concerns of this. We must make heaven our scope and aim, seek the favour of God above, keep up our communion with the upper world by faith, and hope, and holy love, and make it our constant care and business to secure our title to the heavenly bliss. And the reason is, because Christ was raised from the dead life, and death is the entrance upon our country, and of our functions here below. We are not only to lay our affections on things above, but to set our affections on heavenly things, as those things which are above. We are to set our affections on things above, not on things on the earth. We observe, To set our affections on heavenly things, is, to set our affections upon them, to love them, and let out our desires toward them. Upon the wings of affection the heart soars upward, and is carried forth toward spiritual and divine objects. We must acquaint ourselves with them, esteem them above all other things, and lay out ourselves in preparation for the enjoyment of them. David gave this proof of his loving the house of God, that he diligently sought after it, and prepared for it, Ps. 27. 4. This is to be spiritually minded, (Rom. 8. 6.) and to seek and desire a better country, that is, a heavenly, Heb. 11. 14, 16. Things on earth are here set in opposition to things above. We must not dote upon them, or expect too much from them, that we may set our affections on heaven; for heaven and earth are contrary one to the other, and the value of the one is more than the weight of the other, and the prevalence of our affection to one will proportionably weaken and abate our affection to the other. He assigns three reasons for this, v. 3, 4.

1. That we are dead; that is, to present things, and as our portion. We are so in profession and obligation; for we are buried with Christ, and planted into the likeness of his death. Every Christian is crucified unto the world and the world is crucified unto him, Gal. 6. 14. And if we are dead to the earth, and have renounced it as our happiness, it is absurd for us to set our affection upon it, and seek it. We should be like a dead thing to it, unmoved and unaffected towards it.

2. Our true life lies in the other world; Ye are dead, and your life is hid with Christ in God, v. 5. The life that is now hid in him has its livelihood from thence. It is born and nourished from it. The perfection of its life is reserved for that state. It is hid with Christ: not hid from us only, in point of secrecy, but hid for us, denoting security. The life of a Christian is hid with Christ. Because I live, ye shall live also, John 14. 19. Christ is at present a hidden Saviour, or one whom we have not seen; but this is our comfort, that Christ is hid with him, and laid up safe with him. As we have reason to believe things we have not seen, (1 Pet. 1. 8.) so we may take the comfort of a happiness out of sight, and reserved in heaven for us.

3. Because at the second coming of Christ we hope for the perfection of our happiness. If we live a life of Christian purity and devotion now, when Christ, who is our Life, shall appear, we shall also appear with him in glory, v. 4. Observe, (1.) Christ is a believer's life; I live, yet not I, but Christ lives in me. Gal. 2. 20. He is the Principle and End of the Christian's life. He lives in us by his Spirit, and we live to him in all we do. To me to live is Christ, Phil. 1. 21. Observe, (2.) Christ will appear again. He is now hid; and the heavens must contain him; but he will appear in all the pomp of the upper world, with his holy angels, and his own glory, and his Father's glory. Mark 8. 38. Luke 9. 26. Observe, (3.) We shall then appear with him in glory. It will be his glory to have his redeemed with him; he will come to be glorified in his saints; (2 Thess, 1. 10.) and it will be their glory to come with him, and be with him for ever. At the second coming of Christ there will be a general meeting of all the saints; and they whose life is now hid with Christ, shall then be seen in that glory which he himself enjoys, John 17. 24. Do we look for such a happiness as that, and should we not set our affection upon that world, and live above this? What is there here to make us fond of it? What is there not there to draw our hearts to it? Our Head is there, our home is there, our treasure is there, and we hope to be there for ever.

5. Mortify therefore your members which are upon the earth: fornication, uncleanness, inordinate affection, evil concupiscence, and covetousness, which is idolatry: 6. For which things' sake the wrath of God cometh upon the children of disobedience; 7. In which ye also walked sometime, when ye lived in them. 3. But now ye also put off all these; anger, wrath, malice, blasphemy, filthy communication out of your mouth. 9. Lie not one to another, seeing that ye have put off the old man with his deeds; 10. And have put on the new man, which is renewed in knowledge after the image of him that created him: 11. Where there is neither Greek nor Jew, circumcision nor uncircumcision, Barbarian, Scythian, bond nor free: but Christ is all, and in all.

The apostle exhorts the Colossians to the mortification of sin, the great hindrance to seeking the things which are above. Since it is our duty to set our affections upon heavenly things, it is our duty to mortify our members which are upon the earth, and which naturally incline us to the things of the world: "Mortify them, subdue the vicious habits of mind which prevailed in your Gentile state. Kill them, suppress them, as you do weeds or vermin which spread and destroy all about them, or as you kill an enemy which fights against you and wounds you. Your members which are upon the earth: either the members of the body, which are the earthly part of us, and were curiously wrought in the lower parts of the earth; (Ps. 139. 15.) or the corrupt affections of the mind, which lead us to earthly things; the members of the body of death, Rom. 7. 24. He specifies: The lusts of the flesh, for which they were before so very remarkable; fornication, uncleanness, inordinate affection, evil concupiscence; the various workings of the carnal appetite and fleshly impurities, which they indulged in their former course of life, and which were so contrary to the Christian state and the heavenly hope: 11. The love of the world; and covetousness, which is in nature; an inordinate love of present good and outward enjoyments, which proceeds from too high a value in the mind, puts upon too eager a pursuit, hinders the proper use and enjoyment of them, and creates anxious fear and inordinate sorrow for the loss of them. Observe, Covetousness is spiritual idolatry: it is giving that love and regard to worldly wealth, which is due to God only; and carries a greater degree of malignity in it, and is more highly provoking to God, than is commonly thought. And it is very observable, that among all the other instances of sins which good men are recorded in the scriptures to have fallen into: if there be not corporally any but some or other, in one or other part of their life, have fallen into; there is no instance in all the scripture of any good man charged with covetousness.

He proceeds to shew how necessary it is to mortify sins, v. 6, 7.

1. Because if we do not kill them, they will kill us; (v. 6.) For which things sake the wrath of God cometh on the children of disobedience. See what we all are by nature more or less: we are children of disobedience; not only disobedient children, but under the power of sin, and naturally prone to disobey. The wicked are estranged from the womb; they are astray as soon as they are born, speaking lies, Ps. 58. 3. And being children of disobedience, we are children of wrath, Eph. 2. 3. The wrath of God appears in those things which are done by them.

They who do not obey the precepts of the law, incur the penalties of it. The sins he mentions were their sins in their heathen and idolatrous state, and they were then especially the children of disobedience; and yet these sins brought judgments upon them, and exposed them to the wrath of God.

2. We should mortify these sins, because they have lived in us; (v. 7.) In the which ye also walked some time, when ye lived in ignorance and unlearnedness. I consider that we have formerly lived in sin, is a good argument why we should now forsake it. We have walked in by-paths, therefore let us walk in them no more. If I have done iniquity, I will do no more, Job 34. 32. The time past of our lives may suffice us to have wrought the will of the Gentiles, when we walked in lasciviousness, 1 Pet. 4. 3. Where ye lived among them who did such things, (so some understand,) or who were learned in them. The evil practices are a hard thing to live among that which is the works of darkness, and not have fellowship with them, as it is to walk in the mine, and contract no soil. Let us keep out of the way of evil-doers, and as we are to mortify inordinate appetites, so we are to mortify inordinate passions; (v. 8.) But now ye also put off all these; anger, wrath, malice: for these are contrary to the design of the gospel, as well as grosser impurities; and though they are more spiritual wickedness, have not less malignity in them. For the gospel religion introduces a change of the higher as well as the lower powers of the soul, and supports the dominion of right reason and conscience over appetite and passion. Anger and wrath are bad; but malice is worse, because it is more rooted and deliberate; it is anger heightened and hardened.

And as the corrupt principles in the heart must be cut off, so the product of them in the tongue: as blasphemy, which seems here to mean, not so much speaking ill of God, as speaking ill of men; giving all language to them, or raising ill reports of them, and injuring their good name by any evil arts and filthy communication; all lewd and wanton discourse, which comes from a polluted mind in the speaker, and propagates the same defilements in the hearers. Lying; Lie not one to another, (v. 9.) for it is contrary both to the law of truth and the law of love; and is both unjust and unkind, and naturally tends to destroy all faith and friendship among mankind. Lying makes us like the Devil, who is the father of lies,) and is a prime part of the Devil's image. If we are to be of the children of God, we are cautioned against this sin by that general reason; seeing ye have put off the old man with his deeds, and have put on the new man. The consideration that we have by profession put away sin, and espoused the cause and interest of Christ; that we have renounced all sin, and stand engaged to Christ; should fortify us against this sin of lying. They who have put off the old man, have put it off with its deeds: and they who have put on the new man, must put on all its deeds: not only espouse good principles, but act them in a good conversation.

The new man is said to be renewed in knowledge; because an ignorant soul cannot be a good soul. Without knowledge the heart cannot be good, Prov. 19. 2. The grace of God works upon the will and affections by renewing the understanding. Light is the first thing in the new creation, as it was in the first; after the image of him who created him. It was the honour of man in innocence, that he was made after the image of God; but that image was defaced and lost by sin, and is renewed by sanctifying grace; so that a renewed soul is something like what Adam was in the day he was created.

In the privilege and duty of sanctification there is neither Greek nor Jew, circumcision nor uncircumcision, Barbarian, Scythian, bond nor free, v. 11. There is now no difference arising from different country, or different condition and circumstance of life: it is as much the duty of the one as of the other, to be holy; and as much the privilege of the one as of the other, to receive from God the grace to be so. Christ came to take down all partition-walls, that all might stand on the same level before God, both in duty and privilege. And for this reason, because Christ is all in all, Christ is a Christian's all, his only Lord and Saviour, and all his Hope and Happiness. And to those who are sanctified, one as well as another, and whatever they are in other respects, he is All in all, the Alpha and Omega, the Beginning and the End: he is All in all things to them.

12. Put on therefore, as the elect of God, holy and beloved, bowels of mercies, kindness, humbleness of mind, meekness, long-suffering; 13. Forbearing one another, and forgiving one another, if any man have a quarrel against any: even as Christ forgave you, so also do ye. 14. And above all these things put on charity, which is the bond of perfectness. 15. And let the peace of God rule in your hearts, to which also ye are called in one body; and be ye thankful.

16. Let the word of Christ dwell in you richly in all wisdom; teaching and admonishing one another in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs, singing with grace in your hearts to the Lord.

17. And whatsoever ye do in word or deed, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus, giving thanks to God and the Father by him.

The apostle proceeds to exhort to mutual love and compassion; Put on therefore bowels of mercy, v. 12. We must not only put off anger and wrath, (as v. 8.) but we must put on bowels of kindness; not only cease to do evil, but learn to do well; not only do not hurt any, but do what good we can to all. The argument here used to enforce the exhortation, is very affecting; Put on, as the elect of God, holy and beloved. Observe, 1. They who are holy, are the elect of God; and they who are the elect of God, are holy, and beloved; beloved of God, and ought to be so of all men. 2. They who are the elect of God, holy and beloved, ought to conduct themselves in every thing as becomes them, and so as not to lose the credit of their holiness, or the comfort of their being chosen and beloved. It becomes those who are holy toward God, to be lowly and loving towards all men. Observe, What we must put on in particular. (1.) Compassion toward the miserable. They who owe so much to mercy, ought to be merciful to all who are proper objects of mercy. Be ye merciful, as your Father is merciful, Luke 6. 36. (2.) Kindness toward our friends, and those who love us. A courteous disposition becomes the elect of God; for the design of the gospel is not only to soften the minds of men, but to sweeten them, and to make them good. (3.) Long-suffering. Long-suffering toward others. (5.) Long-suffering toward those who continue to provoke us. Charity suffereth long, as well as is kind, 1 Cor. 13. 4. Many can bear a short provocation, who are weary of hearing when it grows long. But we must suffer long both the injuries of men and the rebukes of Divine Providence. If God is long-suffering to us, under all our provocation of him, must we thus exercise long-suffering to others, in like cases. (6.) Mutual forbearance, in consideration of the infirmities and deficiencies which we all labour under; forbearing one another. We have all of us something which needs to be borne with; and that is a good reason why we should bear with others in what is disagreeable to us. We need the same good turn from others, which we are obliged to shew them. (7.) A readiness thereby to obey God in every one of his ordains. If right, we must, and if wrong, we may, and for the reproof of it, if necessary, as the cases require, we may, whether we are in the world, or in any other way. While we are in this world, where there is so much corruption in our hearts, and so much occasion of difference and contention, quarrels will sometimes happen, even among the elect of God, who are holy and beloved; as Paul and Barnabas had a sharp contention, which parted them another from the other, (Acts 15. 39.) and Paul and Peter, Gal. 2. 11. But it is our duty to forbear, to forbear one another in such cases; not to bear any grudge, but put up with the affront, and pass it by. And the reason is; Even as Christ forgave you, so also do ye. The consideration that we are forgiven by Christ so many offences, is a good reason why we should forgive others. It is an argument of the divinity of Christ, that he had power on earth to forgive sins. And besides, it is a branch of his example which we are obliged to follow, if we ourselves would be forgiven. Forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them who trespass against us, Matt. 6. 12.

Now, in order to all this, we are exhorted here to several things.

1. To clothe ourselves with love; (v. 14.) Above all things put on charity; over all things, put on love. And note; but must most carefully avoid, if we ourselves would be forgiven. Forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them who trespass against us, Matt. 6. 12. 1. 5—7. He lays the foundation in faith, and the top-stone in charity, which is the bond of perfectness, the cement and centre of all happy society. Christian unity consists in unanimity and mutual love.

2. To subdue ourselves to thegovernment of God, the peace of God; (v. 15.) Let the peace of God rule in your hearts, that is, God's being at peace with you, and the comfortable sense of his acceptance and favour: or, a disposition to peace among yourselves, a peaceable spirit, that keeps the peace, and makes peace. This is called the peace of God; because it is of his working in all who are his. The kingdom of God is righteousness and peace, Rom. 14. 17. "Let this peace rule in your heart; prevail and go where you happen, and on special occasions, instead of their lawful and profane songs in their idolatrous worship. Religious poetry seems comenanced by these expressions, and is capable of great edification. But when we sing psalms, we make no melody, unless we sing with grace in our hearts, unless we are suitably affected with what we sing, and go beyond it, with some deep notion and understanding. Singing of psalms is a teaching ordinance as well as a praising ordinance; and we are not only to quicken and encourage ourselves, but to teach and admonish one another, mutually excite our affections, and convey instructions.

V. All must be done in the name of Christ; (v.
17.) And whatsoever ye do in word or deed, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus: according to his command, and in compliance with his authority; by strength derived from him; with an eye to his glory; and depending upon his merit for the accepting of what is good, and pardon of what is amiss; Giving thanks always for all things. 2. We must give thanks in all things; whatsoever we do, we must still give thanks, Eph. 5. 20. Giving thanks always for all things. 2. The Lord Jesus must be the Mediator of our praises as well as of our prayers; We give thanks to God and the Father in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, Eph. 5. 20. They who do all things in Christ's name, will never want matter of thanksgiving to God, even the Father.

18. Wives, submit yourselves unto your own husbands, as it is in the Lord. 19. Husbands, love your wives, and be not bitter against them. 20. Children, obey your parents in all things: for this is well-pleasing unto the Lord. 21. Fathers, provoke not your children to anger, lest they be discouraged. 22. Servants, obey in all things your masters according to the flesh; not with eye-service, as men-pleasers; but in singleness of heart, fearing God: 23. And whatsoever ye do, do it heartily, as to the Lord, and not unto men; 24. Knowing that of the Lord ye shall receive the reward of the inheritance: for ye serve the Lord Christ. 25. But he that doeth wrong, shall receive for the wrong which he hath done: and there is no respect of persons.

The apostle concludes the chapter with exhortations to relative duties, as before, in the epistle to the Ephesians. The epistles which are most taken up in displaying the glory of the divine grace, and magnifying the Lord Jesus, are the most particular and distinct in pressing the duties of the several relations. We must never separate the privileges and duties of the gospel-religion.

I. He begins with the duties of wives and husbands; (v. 18.) Wives, submit yourselves unto your own husbands, as it is fit in the Lord. Submission is the duty of wives, exceeded not. It is the same word which is used to express our duty to magistrates, (Rom. 13. 1. Let every soul be subject to the higher powers,) and is expressed by subjection and reverence, Eph. 5. 24, 33. The reason is, that Adam was first formed, then Eve: and Adam was not deceived, but the woman, being deceived, was in the transgression, 1 Tim. 2. 13, 14. He was first in the creation, and in the image of God. And the head of the woman is the man; and the man is not of the woman, but the woman of the man; neither was the man created for the woman, but the woman for the man, 1 Cor. 11. 3, 8, 9. It is agreeable to the order of nature and the reason of things, as well as the appointment and will of God. But then it is submission, not to a rigorous lord or absolute tyrant, who may do his will and is without restraints; but to your own husband, who stands in the nearest relation, and is under strict engagements to proper duty too. And this is fit in the Lord: it is becoming the relation, and what they are bound in duty to do, as an instance of obedience to the authority and law of Christ.

On the other hand, husbands must love their wives, and not be bitter against them, v. 19. They must love them with tender and faithful affection, as Christ loved the church, and as their own bodies; and even as himself; (Eph. 5. 25, 28, 33,) with a love peculiar to the nearest relation and the greatest comfort and blessing of life. And they must not be bitter against them; or use them unkindly, with harsh language or severe treatment; but be kind and obliging to them in all things: for the woman was made for the man, not the man for the woman, and the man also is by the woman, 1 Cor. 11. 9, 10, 11.

II. The duties of children and parents; Children, obey your parents in all things, for this is well-pleasing unto the Lord, v. 20. They must be willing to do all their lawful commands, and be at their direction and disposal, as those who have a natural right, and are fitter to direct them than themselves. The apostle (Eph. 6. 2.) requires them to honour as well as obey their parents; but says, of those who are disobedient, that they and their lives must proceed from the esteem and opinion of their minds. And this is well-pleasing to God, or acceptable to him; for it is the first commandment with promise, (Eph. 6. 2.) with an explicit promise annexed to it, That it shall be well with them, and they shall live long on the earth. Dutiful children are the most likely to prosper in the world, and enjoy long life.

And parents must be tender, as well as children obedient; (v. 21.) "Fathers, provoke not your children to anger, lest they be discouraged. Let not your authority over them be exercised with rigour and severity; but with kindness and gentleness; lest you raise their passions, and discourage them in their duty, and by holding the reins too strict make them fly out with the greater fierceness. The ill temper and example of imprudent parents often prove a great hindrance to their children, and a stumbling-block in their way; see Eph. 6. 4. And it is by the tenderness of parents, and dutifulness of children, that God ordinarily furnishes his church with a seed to serve him, and propagates religion from age to age.

III. Servants and masters; Servants, obey your masters in all things according to the flesh, v. 22. Servants must do the duty of the relation in which they stand, and obey their masters' commands in all things which are consistent with their duty to God their heavenly Master. Not with eye-service, as men-pleasers; not only when their master's eye is upon them, but when they are from under their master's eye. They must be both just and diligent. In singleness of heart, fearing God: without selfish designs, or hypocrisy and disguise, as those who fear God, and stand in awe of him. Observe, The fear of God, ruling in the heart, will make people good in every relation. Servants who fear God, will be just and faithful when they are from under their master's eye, because they know they are under the eye of God; (Gen 20. 11.) Because I thought, Surely the fear of God is not in this place. Neh. 5. 15, But so did not I, because of the fear of God. And whatsoever do of their hearts, God regardeth, with diligence, not idly and slothfully: or, "Do it cheerfully, not discontented at the providence of God which put you in that relation," As to the Lord, and not as to men. It sanctifies a servant's work when it is done as unto God; with an eye to his glory, and in obedience to his command, and not merely as unto men, or with regard to them only. Observe, We are really doing our duty to God, when we are faithful in our duty to men. And for this encouragement, let them know, that a good and faithful servant is never the further from heaven for his being a servant; "Knowing that of the Lord ye shall receive the reward of the inheritance, for ye serve the Lord Christ, v. 24. Serving your masters according to the command of Christ, you serve Christ, and he will be your Paymaster; you will have a glorious reward at last. Though you are now servants, you shall receive the inheritance of sons. But, on the other hand, He who doeth wrong, shall receive for the wrong which he hath done," v. 25. There is a righteous God, who, if servants wrong their masters, will reckon with them for it, though they may conceal it from their notice. And he will be sure to punish the unjust as well as reward the faithful servant; and so if masters wrong their servants. And there is no respect of persons with him. The righteous Judge of the earth will be impartial, and carry it with an equal hand toward master and servant; not swayed by any regard to men's outward circumstances and condition of life. The one and the other will stand upon a level at his tribunal.

It is probable that the apostle has a particular respect, in all these instances of duty, to the case mentioned, 1 Cor. 7. of relations of a different religion, as a Christian and heathen, v. 11. He exhorts to the duty of prayer, (v. 2. 4.) and to a prudent and decent conduct toward those with whom we converse, v. 5. 6. III. He closes the epistle with the mention of several of his friends, of whom he gives an honourable testimony, v. 7. 18.

CHAP. IV.

1. MASTERS, give unto your servants that which is just and equal; knowing that ye also have a Master in heaven.

The apostle proceeds with the duty of masters to their servants, which might have been joined to the foregoing chapter, and is a part of that discourse. Here observe,

1. Justice is required of them; "Give unto your servants that which is just and equal; (v. 1.) not only strict justice, but equity and kindness. Be faithful to your promises to them, and perform your agreements; not defrauding them of their dues, or keeping back by fraud the labourers' wages, Lam. 5. 4. Require no more of them than they are able to perform; and do not lay unreasonable burdens upon them, and beyond their strength. Provide for them what is fit, supply proper food and physic, and allow them such liberties as may enable them the better for cheerful service, and make it the easier to them: and this, though they are employed in the meanest and lowest offices, and are of another country and a different religion from yourselves.

2. A good reason for this regard; "Knowing that ye also have a Master in heaven. Ye who are masters of others, have a Master yourselves, and are servants of another Lord. Ye are not lords of yourselves, and are accountable to one above you. Do ye deal with your servants as you expect God should deal with you; and as those who believe you may give an account. Ye are both servants of the same Lord in the different relations in which you stand, and are equally accountable to him at last. Knowing that your Master also is in heaven, neither is there respect of persons with him," Eph. 6. 9.

2. Continue in prayer, and watch in the same with thanksgiving; 3. Withal praying also for us, that God would open unto us a door of utterance, to speak the mystery of Christ, for which I am also in bonds: 4. That I may make it manifest, as I ought to speak.

If this be considered as connected with the foregoing verse, then we may observe, that it is part of the duty which masters owe their servants, to pray with them, and to pray daily with them, or continue in prayer. They must not only do justly and kindly by them, but act a Christian and religious part, and be concerned for their souls as well as their bodies; "as parts of your charge, and under your influence. Be concerned for the blessing of God upon them, as well as the prosperity of your affairs in their hands." And this is the duty of every one; to continue in prayer. "Keep up your constant times of prayer, without being diverted from it by other business; keep your hearts close to the duty, without wandering or deadness; and even to the end of it: watching in the same." Christians should lay hold on all opportunities for prayer, and choose the fittest seasons, which are least liable to disturbance from other things, and keep their minds lively in the duty, and in suitable frames. With thanksgiving, or solemn acknowledgment of the mercies received. Thanksgiving must have a part in every prayer.

Withal praying also for us, v. 3. The people must pray particularly for their ministers, and bear them upon their hearts at all times at the throne of grace. "Do not forget us, whenever you pray for yourselves," Eph. 6. 19. 1 Thess. 5. 25. Heb. 13. 18. "That God would open to us a door of utterance; either afford opportunity to preach the gospel; (so he says, a great door and effectual is opened to me, 1 Cor. 16. 9.) or else give me ability and courage, and enable me with freedom and faithfulness; so Eph. 6. 19. And for me, that utterance may be given to me, that I may open my mouth boldly, to speak the mystery of Christ, for which I am also in bonds; that is, either the deepest doctrines of the gospel with plainness, of which Christ is the principal Subject; (he calls it, the mystery of the gospel, Eph. 6. 19.) or else he means the preaching of the gospel to the Gentile world, which he calls the mystery hid from ages, (ch. 1. 26.) and the mystery of Christ, Eph. 3. 4. For this he was now in bonds. He was a prisoner at Rome, by the violent opposition of the malicious Jews. He would have them pray for him, that he might not be discouraged in his work, or driven from it by his sufferings; "That I may make it manifest, as I ought to speak, v. 4. That I may make this mystery known to those who have not heard of it; and make it plain to their understanding, in such a manner as I ought to do." He had been particular in telling them what he prayed for them, ch. 1. Here he tells them particularly what he would have them pray for him. He knew as well as any how hard he had suffered, and yet he begs their prayers for him, that he might be taught to speak. The best and most eminent Christians need the prayers of meaner Christians, and are not above asking them. The chief speakers need prayer, that God would give them a door of utterance, and that they may speak as they ought to speak.

5. Walk in wisdom toward them that are without, redeeming the time. 6. Let your speech be alway with grace, seasoned with salt, that ye may know how ye ought to answer every man.

The apostle exHORTs them further to a prudent and decent conduct towards all those with whom they conversed: toward the heathen world, or those out of the Christian church, among whom they lived; (v. 3.) Walk in wisdom toward them who are without. Be careful, in all your converse with them, to get no hurt by them, or contract any of their customs; for evil communications corrupt good manners; and to do no hurt to them, or increase their prejudices against religion, and give them an occasion of dislike. Yea, do them all the good you can, and by all the fittest means; and in the proper seasons recommend religion to them. Redeeming the time; either improving every opportunity of doing them good, and making the best use of your time in proper duty; (diligence in redeeming time very much recommends religion to the good opinion of others;) or else, walking cautiously and with circumspection, to give them no advantage against you, or expose yourselves to their malice and ill-will, Eph. 5. 15, 16. *Walk circumspectly, redeeming the time, because the days are evil, dangerous, or times of trouble and suffering.
